"What is called 'good living' eventually brought me to a condition quite the reverse of good health," writes a New York merchant.

"Improper eating told on me till my stomach became so weak that food nauseated me, even the lightest and simplest lunch, and I was much depressed after a night of uneasy slumber, unfitting me for business.

"This condition was discouraging, as I could find no way to improve it. Then I saw the advertisement of Grape-Nuts food, and decided to try it, and became delighted with the result.

"For the past three years I have used Grape-Nuts, and nothing else, for my breakfast and for lunch before retiring. It speedily set my stomach right and I congratulate myself that I have regained my health. There is no greater comfort for a tired man than a lunch of Grape-Nuts. It insures restful sleep, and an awakening in the morning with a feeling of buoyant courage and hopefulness.

"Grape-Nuts has been a boon to my whole family. It has made of our 2-year-old boy, who used to be unable to digest much of anything, a robust, healthy little rascal weighing thirty-two pounds. Mankind certainly owes a debt of gratitude to the expert who invented this perfect food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. "There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true and full of human interest.

Plan Important Church Changes

Committee of Congregational Body at Detroit May Help Bring Denomination Toward Presbyterianism—No Lenten Services.

DETROIT—"The commission of nineteen" appointed by the Congregational Council in 1910 recently met here. This commission is to report to the Council at Kansas City next October on plans to give to the Council larger representative functions and to unify the various missionary organizations. Inquiring of the pastor of First Congregational church, J. Percival Huget, D. D., who was formerly a Presbyterian, whether the purpose was not a Presbyterianizing of Congregationalism, the answer received was: "In a sense, yes, but not seriously, as the movement is entirely in the line of improved administrative efficiency and not with any idea of judicial functions." Dr. Nehemiah Boynton and Samuel B. Capen were prominent in the discussions.

Rev. John Brittan Clark, pastor of Westminster church, after an absence of six months in Europe, Asia and Africa, is again occupying his pulpit. He followed the route of some of Paul's journeys and is delivering a weekly lecture at the Y. M. C. A. embodying observations and conclusions.

Ladies of Jefferson Avenue church gave a reception Jan. 30 to Rev. J. Frederick Fitschen, Jr., and wife, and invited many guests. Nearly twenty of the Presbyterian ministers, together with their wives, were present.

For three years Detroit has enjoyed union Lenten services at noon at the Detroit opera house, in which the leading denominations were represented by the ablest preachers that could be secured from all over the country. The work has been carried on at a financial loss, and it has been decided that as the churches are not sufficiently interested to pay the expenses the meetings should be discontinued.

John Clark Hill, D. D., until recently pastor at Springfield, Ohio, will supply Trumbull Avenue church indefinitely during the vacancy caused by Dr. W. T. Jaquess's resignation.

Young People Will Help China

Sixty-Two from Kansas City Volunteer for Service—Dedicate New East End Church—Meetings at Independence.

KANSAS CITY—Following the mass meeting for young people in First church Sunday afternoon during the China campaign sixty-two young people dedicated themselves to foreign missions. Twenty of this number were from Park College. There were 1,000 present and Dr. Robert E. Speer, who spoke, was at his best. The campaign in this city and vicinity was carried out in detail as planned.

General Assembly's evangelistic committee is to hold an evangelistic institute in this city Feb. 23-25 for Missouri and Kansas. Doctors Mahy, Davies and Stone are expected to conduct the institute. The home mission committee is making arrangements.

The new East Side church, recently completed, was dedicated Feb. 9. Dr. William H. Black, president of Missouri College, assisted. This church and the pastor, Rev. Daniel Martin, have worked hard to get a commodious building.

A series of successful meetings have recently closed in First church, Independence. The pastor was assisted by Dr. William R. Dobyns of St. Joseph. The cooperative union between the two churches in Independence is working splendidly, and will doubtless result in an organic union in the near future. When this is accomplished this church will have more than 500 members.

Westport church, of which Dr. George P. Baity has been pastor for nineteen years, has become one of the strongest and most active churches in the city. At Christmas time the Sunday school made a special offering of $100 to foreign missions.

Mellier Place church has called Rev. Joseph H. Curry of Dallas, Texas. He is already here.

As a result of the recent China campaign in this city Grace church, Rev. Charles A. Arnold pastor, has raised $1,500 and is to have its own foreign missionary.

Oversubscribe Aid to Church

Berean Congregation Assured New Home—Wycliffe Club Entertained by Westminster Pastor—Washington Park to Build.

MILWAUKEE—The canvass to raise funds for the new Berean church came to a glorious conclusion Feb. 2, when the pastor, Rev. Samuel P. Todd, announced that more than the $1,000 required to secure Immanuel church's gift of $500 had been obtained. The membership is now 160, and growing.

Two lots have been donated as a new site for West Allis church.

Jan. 13 the Wycliffe Club met at Westminster church and listened to a stereopticon lecture on "Oxford and Wycliffe," by Dr. L. P. Cain, pastor of Edgewater church, Chicago. After the lecture Dr. and Mrs. Cutler entertained the members of the club at dinner in their home.

Washington Park church, Rev. Lyle Wilson Ewing pastor, has decided to build and a canvass for funds for a $12,000 edifice is now under way.

Waukesha Congregational church, of which Professor W. A. Ganfield of Carroll College is the acting pastor, celebrated the seventy-fifth anniversary of its organization Jan. 20.

Bethany church, Rev. W. O. Wallace pastor, will move to a site about two squares from its present location.

Rev. H. C. Ramsay of Packwaukee, Wis., a returned missionary from China, conducted a most interesting "Chinese pageant" in Westminster church Jan. 28 and in Perseverance church Jan. 29. Twelve people assisted him.

Graphic Lesson in Church Music

Seminary Gives Ideas to Ministers in Recital —Sunday Meetings Still Producing Results —Bible Conference Well Attended.

PITTSBURG—Western Theological Seminary has been placing great emphasis on church music. Monday evening, Feb. 3, the St. Cecelia choir, under the direction of Professor Charles N. Boyd, gave a recital in the seminary chapel illustrating desirable and undesirable music. The recital was open to the public and was attended by a number of ministers and church people of the city.

The Interchurch Federation of McKeesport, organized since the Sunday meetings, is making a strenuous effort to enforce the laws. The three or four people who refused to close their stores on Sunday were arrested and fined Feb. 3. In Braddock, Pa., the school board is waging a war against the selling of cigarettes to children. Led by a Presbyterian elder, Attorney Samuel McClure, the board has served notice on all stores selling cigarettes that prosecutions will follow continued violation.

The annual winter conference under auspices of the young people's societies of Allegheny county was held in Second church Feb. 2 to 9. An excellent program was carried out and much interest was manifested in the lectures and conferences. The conference was opened Sunday by Dr. George W. Shelton, pastor of Second church. The evening service was addressed by Rev. William R. Hall of Philadelphia, acting superintendent of young people's work. Among the local speakers were Dr. David R. Breed, of Western Seminary; Dr. R. C. Wylie of the Reformed Presbyterian Seminary, Rev. W. H. Claggett, Grace church, Rev. W. A. Jones, Knoxville church and president Pennsylvania Christian Endeavor Union, and Dr. James Moffatt, president of Washington and Jefferson College.

Knoxville church held its congregational meeting Jan. 29, and surprised the pastor, Dr. W. A. Jones, by voting an addition of $300 to his salary. Dr. Jones has been pastor for twenty-four years, and his salary has been increased twelve times.

Presbytery met in First church Feb. 11. Dr. J. K. McClurkin of the U. P. church has been invited to take charge of the devotional hour, and deliver the address.

The Presbyterian Union of Pittsburg is arranging for a popular meeting Friday evening, Feb. 21, at McCreery's dining hall. The address is to be made by Dr. Mark A. Matthews, moderator.

Plan to Organize New Church

Philadelphia Congregations Are Growing—Will Fight Sunday Baseball—Dr. Janvier Presides at Anti-Liquor Meeting.

PHILADELPHIA—Presbytery Feb. 3 licensed as a local evangelist Elder Joseph A. Hamilton of Tabor church and upon petition of fifty-two persons granted permission for the organization of Knox church at 25th street and Indiana avenue.

Rev. C. A. R. Janvier, M. J. Hyndman, J. S. Clark and Elder H. W. Lambirth were appointed to oppose legislation for legalizing Sunday baseball. The overtures for denominational federation of churches and for the reduction of the Assembly were negatived. Presbytery seems to favor Assembly reduction through making communicant membership the basis of representation and an overture along this line will be sent to Assembly.

MAY WATCH MORMON CUSTOMS

At a recent meeting of the Woman's home missionary societies of three presbyteries Mrs. S. T. Banes of Central North Broad Street church, in announcing a special study class on Mormonism, by Miss Peacock of the normal school, suggested that public school teachers attending the National Education convention in Salt Lake City the coming summer should have their eyes open regarding the facts about Mormonism.

John R. Davies, D. D., of Bethlehem church during February will address presbyterial evangelistic institutes in St. Paul, St. Louis, Muskogee, Kansas City and Cleveland.

"The Latest in Summer Bible Schools, or the Church's Problem" was discussed by Rev A. L. Latham before the ministers Feb. 10. On Feb. 17 Rev. F. J. Milman will present, with illustrations, "Mining Anthracite Coal," and on Feb. 24 Moderator Dr. Mark A. Matthews will speak.

On Feb. 21 Mrs. J. F. Clark will speak on "The Chinese Woman," and on Feb. 28 Mrs. B. B. Comegys on "The Educational Revolution," in Westminster hall in the series on "China's New Day" by the foreign missionary women.

Charges that the church is holding aloof from civic conditions, especially in the large cities, were made by Dr. Graham Taylor of Chicago at a luncheon given him by the Interchurch Federation at the City Club.

START WORK FOR POLES

The church extension committee of Philadelphia North has started religious work among the thousands of Poles living in the vicinity of Bridesburg. Rev. Paul Fox of Baltimore will give a series of lectures on Polish work illustrated by stereopticon views.

Second church is holding Lenten services on Wednesdays at 5 p. m. and on Friday afternoons at 5 p. m. the pastor, Dr. MacColl, conducts a class for Bible study.

A reception was recently given to Rev. Z. H. Copp and family by the officers of Cohocksink church.

Dr. C. A. R. Janvier, pastor of Hollond Memorial, presided over a large assembly of ministers at the Y. M. C. A. to hear S. B. Scott of Germantown explain his legislative bill putting social clubs that sell liquor upon the same basis as saloons.

Very decided dissent has been expressed by Dr. W. H. Roberts and other prominent ministers of Philadelphia to the statement of Bishop Garland of the P. E. church that more people have been converted to Socialism the past four years than to Christianity.

Dr. W. W. Heberton, treasurer of the Board of Relief, is improving from the illness that has confined him to his home for more than a month.

The 25th anniversary of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip will be celebrated May 4. The general secretary, Rev. J. Howard Taylor, reports a substantial growth of the movement in New York, Baltimore and centers of Eastern Pennsylvania.

A meeting of Reformed churches was recently held in commemoration of the 350th anniversary of the Heidelberg catechism. Among the speakers were Dr. L. Y. Graman, pastor emeritus of Olivet Covenant Presbyterian church.

John Calhoun, D. D., pastor of Mount Airy church, is spending several weeks in Florida.

The Tusculum Type of Education

There are 4,000,000 people in the mountain section of our Southland.

They are Scotch-Irish by descent—of the purest American stock—absolutely unmixed. They are for the most part poor and have had little chance for 150 years.

But they are genuine, quick and responsive; given the opportunity to develop, their ambition rapidly awakens. To the task of educating these mountain peoples Tusculum is dedicated; and their responsiveness justifies the existence of Tusculum.

Tusculum equips its students with a splendid education. But it gives more than education—the Tusculum student is a professed Christian.

Every graduate leaves with a respect for the Christian life and becomes a center of Christian influence in the world about him.

Tusculum is giving an opportunity to poor young men and women to better themselves, to go into the world well equipped with education. More than this, Tusculum fits them to carry a message of Christian life into the world; so the world is better for every Tusculum graduate.

Last year 51 students were converted to the Christian life. Already this year 32 have taken the stand for Christianity; 12 recent graduates are in preparation for the ministry; 86 graduates have entered the ministry; 18 are doing other religious work.

At an expenditure of $100 to $125 per year (including board) Tusculum offers to young men and women of the mountains of the South a Christian education.

Many hundreds are dependent upon Tusculum for their chance. Others will be able to draw their opportunity from Tusculum when a modestly planned endowment enlarges the possibilities of the college.

Open Club for Working Girls

Church Women Serve Lunch Each Noon—Brick Church Raises $25,378 in One Offering—New Rochelle Church Active.

NEW YORK—West Twenty-Third Street church, Dr. Mendenhall pastor, will open a lunch club Feb. 14 in the new parish house. A noon meal six days of the week will be served for the working women of the neighborhood of this business section, who will thus have a home in which to eat and rest. The women of the congregation will serve the luncheon. The ladies' guild opened the parish house a fortnight ago by entertaining at supper. The lecture room of this church is being repaired and repainted. Many friends of the church have come forward with financial aid.

New York Presbytery will hold a special devotional meeting in Fourth church March 10, to which the 400 elders, deacons and trustees and the almost 200 ministers will be invited.

At Christ church, Rev. Theodore F. Savage pastor, there has been organized the Richards Social Club in honor of the late Dr. William R. Richards of Brick church, of which Christ church is a branch. Two new groups of boys, not previously connected with the church house, have come asking for a place of meeting, almost overcrowding the building. An illustrated story hour for children is held once a week for all the little people of the neighborhood. The first week the attendance was sixty; the second week 160, the third week 338.

Fifth Avenue church, Dr. John Henry Jowett pastor, is arranging to install two new organs at a cost of $35,000 to take the place of the present two instruments, which have been in use thirty-eight years.

Record Offering at Brick Church

Dr. William P. Merrill of Brick church asked his parishioners on the last Sunday of January to contribute $27,250 for the annual expense of running the two affiliated churches—the Church of the Covenant and Christ church. The offering was $25,378.25. This is more than any single collection for this purpose ever has amounted to in Brick church. The rest will be forthcoming. Most of this was given in small contributions, only three persons contributing $1,000 or more. Dr. Merrill is giving a series of five lecture discussions in the chapel Tuesday afternoons on "Fundamental Beliefs in the Light of Today."

George W. Perkins, who is a member of the Home Board and who attends Riverdale church, has consented to lead a campaign in New York to raise $4,000,000 for the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. jointly.

Miss Julia Dalton terminated her services with the New York Presbyterian Social Union Feb. 3. For years she was secretary to the late Dr. John Bancroft Devins.

Dr. Henry Evertson Cobb has completed two decades as minister of West End Collegiate Reformed church. The parishioners presented to Dr. and Mrs. Cobb a solid silver after-dinner coffee set and also a set of dinner table platters of silver.

At the Classon Avenue church, Brooklyn, Dr. Joseph D. Burrell is conducting a series of seven studies of the penitential psalms Wednesday evenings as Lenten meetings.

Mrs. Charles W. Welch, wife of the minister of First Union church, is dead after a long and painful illness. The bereaved husband and his little son took the remains to Mrs. Welch's girlhood home at Clarksville, Tenn.

Raised Money Rapidly

A remarkable debt-raising campaign is going on in New Rochelle, where the members of North Avenue church, Dr. Robert Gardner McGregor pastor, started Jan. 20 to raise $25,000 toward the $48,000 debt on the church property. A committee of thirty-six men was appointed under the direction of the pastor, together with the financial committee, to collect this amount. They gave themselves nine weeks to complete the canvass. In the first week $22,000 of the $25,000 was pledged and the committee now has eight weeks to raise the other $3,000. Of the $22,000 no particularly large subscription forms any part, practically all of it having come in small amounts.

First church of Newtown, L. I., organized in 1652, one of the four oldest Presbyterian churches of the country, is becoming reinvigorated by the transfusion of new blood from the incoming suburban population. The region, which until quite recently was occupied chiefly by market gardens, is rapidly bulding up into an exclusively residential section. During 1912 the beneficent offerings increased 100 per cent and pledges for church support were increased 75 per cent.

The church paper and all church advertising used by Olmstead Avenue church, recently dedicated, is printed in the basement of the church. The building is considered the last word in church accommodations. It contains twenty-seven rooms for specific purposes. Some of its features are: Lunchroom for business men, shower baths for boys and girls, gymnasium, branch of public library, nursery, and club rooms for boys and girls. Rev. C. E. B. Ward, pastor, is just concluding a three years' ministry.

Several thousand girls, most of them under twenty years of age, have had their headquarters at Labor temple the past four weeks. These girls are on strike in the white goods industry. The superintendent of the temple has spoken to thousands of workers in their various meeting places in the East side of New York.

Will Put College Men at Work

Plans to Use Graduates in Churches and Social Service Centers—Many Hear Dr. van Dyke—Moral Consciousness Awaking.

CHICAGO—An effort is being made in this city to capitalize for the benefit of society the higher education of college graduates. Last week Dr. John Timothy Stone was one of the speakers at the first meeting of the Chicago alumni committee. This organization hopes to enlist the aid of college men in church and social service work. Already 536 requests for volunteer service have been received from churches and other institutions. Alfred T. Carton of Fourth church is president and information may be obtained through the Central Y. M. C. A.

Lawyers representing the Law and Order League have asked the mayor to prosecute thirteen hotels and cafes said to have violated the 1 o'clock closing law on New Year's eve. Alderman Tearney, a saloonkeeper, has been convicted on one charge of late closing and has pleaded guilty in two other cases. Formal charge is now made that on sixteen other occasions his saloon was open after legal hours. A total of 116 violations has been reported by the police of the district. Pressure has been brought to bear on the city prosecutor for some time to bring these cases to trial, the violations having been reported several months ago. Epworth Leaguers of the city at a banquet recently united in asking the mayor to revoke the liquor license of the alderman.

Dr. van Dyke in the City

Dr. Henry van Dyke, who stopped in Chicago on his way to California, addressed the Sunday Evening Club last Sabbath. Orchestra hall was filled in fifteen minutes after the doors were open and over an hour before the opening of the service. Dr. van Dyke will deliver the Founder's Day address at Leland Stanford University while on the coast.

Founder's Day at Moody Bible Institute was celebrated last week by services in the institute. Several speakers discussed phases of the life of D. L. Moody.

The national council of the Presbyterian Brotherhood met here last Tuesday to discuss the future work of the brotherhood in the light of present developments.

Monday noons at room 901 Masonic temple a prayer service is held each week for stewards and workers in "The World in Chicago."

Belden Avenue church recently held its semi-annual dinner for new members.

Report of the work of the Midnight mission was made Feb. 5 at anniversary services held at Kenwood Evangelical and St. James M. E. churches. Short addresses were made by officers of the mission.

Irving Park church recently burned a mortgage which has been on the church for some time. F. J. Cushing, who has been a member of the church since 1874, took a prominent part in the exercises.

Harry Monroe, who more than thirty years ago turned from the saloon to the pulpit, last week celebrated the thirty-third anniversary of the opening of Pacific Garden mission in Van Buren street. The services were similar to those held every night of each year. It was Mr. Monroe who aided in the regeneration of "Mel" Trotter and Billy Sunday.

Rev. David Hugh Jones of Evanston First church is one of the speakers at the state convention of the Y. M. C. A. at Elgin Feb. 27 and 28.

Dr. Fox Meets the Pastors

Dr. Francis M. Fox, formerly of Iowa City, Iowa, who is to be at the call of local pastors for assistance with men's work, met members of presbytery Friday afternoon at Assembly hall. A number of the pastors told of their success or failure with various types of men's clubs and all expressed satisfaction at the prospect of being able to have additional help for that phase of their church work.

Christian Endeavorers of the city have started a campaign to prevent the legalizing of boxing in the state.

Clergy and Laity

Dr. W. W. Heberton, treasurer of the Board of Relief and Sustentation, is very sick with pneumonia at his home at Wayne, a suburb of Philadelphia.

Dr. E. Trumbell Lee has been removed from the hospital at Clifton Springs, N. Y., to his home in Wilkinsburg, Pa. There is little hope of his ever being able to assume active pastoral duties.

Dr. and Mrs. Clarence G. Reynolds of Madison Avenue church, Elizabeth, N. J., are deeply bereaved in the death of their eldest daughter Mary, formerly instructor in Latin at Blair Academy, Blairstown.

The Doctor's Advice

Your family doctor sustains peculiarly intimate relations to your family. He is generally a friendly counselor in all sorts of family affairs as well as medical adviser. He knows more about you and your children than any other person outside of the home circle. Your dependence upon him at critical times has developed a relation of trust and confidence.

And these are the reasons you go to him every time you have a little stomach ache, every time your digestive organs rebel against misuse or bad treatment. This is a wise proceeding on your part, but it is well to remember that the doctor does not know nearly as much as you do about your stomach for the reason that he hasn't lived with it as long as you have.

If your doctor is a wise counselor he will not be content with giving you medicine. He will tell you that the practice of eating a well cooked cereal food every morning for breakfast will not only strengthen digestion but will keep the bowels healthy and active. A good cereal, in fact, will keep the entire alimentary tract clean and healthy.

The best cereal for this purpose is shredded wheat biscuit, because it not only contains all the body-building material in the whole wheat grain in its most digestible form but also contains the outer bran coat of the wheat in such a form that it stimulates peristalsis (bowel exercise) without irritating the intestines. Many persons whose stomachs will not digest ordinary foods or will not even retain ordinary foods, have no difficulty in digesting and assimilating shredded wheat. It is the whole wheat steam cooked and drawn out into filmy, porous shreds and then twice baked. It is not only the most strengthening and the most easily digested of all the cereals but being made in biscuit form it is so easy to prepare a deliciously nourishing meal with it in a few moments in combination with stewed prunes, sliced bananas, baked apples, canned peaches or other stewed or preserved fruits. Two of these biscuits, eaten with hot milk for breakfast, will supply all the strength-giving nutriment needed for a half day's work or play.

Helping Solve Foreign Problem

San Francisco Churches Unite in Work for Italians—Longest Pastorate Ended—Merced Plans New Building.

SAN FRANCISCO—The problem of what to do for and with foreign immigrants is one of the most serious and difficult that the churches of the San Francisco district have to meet, and its solution becomes more difficult as the time of the Panama exposition draws near. A union effort is being made in Green Street Congregational church in the heart of the Italian population. The Congregationalists and Presbyterians have united to direct and support this work, and they have secured Rev. Robert Walker, a Baptist minister, to superintend it. Mr. Walker spent twenty-seven years in Italy and began work here Sept. 1, and already good results are seen. The attendance at the morning service is more than fifty and at the evening over 100. About thirty young people attend the gymnasium, fifty the Tuesday evening Bible class and song service, and forty the class for the study of English.

Rev. J. K. Stage of Emmanuel church, Oakland, lost the use of his voice about four months ago. Recently he has been in Arizona with the hope of recovery, but failing in this he has offered his resignation.

Recently First church and former Cumberland church of Merced united under the name of Central Presbyterian church. They are planning to erect a new house of worship, and have called Rev. J. Robertson Macartney of Bellingham. He enters upon his duties March 1.

F. S. Brush, D. D., who recently resigned after almost nineteen years as pastor of First church, Alameda, will soon go to Europe with his family. His is the longest pastorate in Oakland Presbytery. He has not been well for some time.

Confer on Work for Students

Delegates from Eighteen States Meet at Kansas University—Division of Responsibility Outlined—Task Is a Large One.

Church workers in state universities met in annual conference at Kansas University, Lawrence, Feb. 4 to 6. Seventy-four delegates from eighteen states representing eight denominations at work for the students in twenty state institutions of higher learning came together to consider under the general subject of "Cooperation for Efficiency" the methods and the results in the evangelizing of students in state universities.

It was not a popular convention of another "movement," but an informal face to face conference of the workers. Some of the topics indicate the type of work discussed:

"A Survey of the Cooperating Agencies in the Various University Communities;" "The Determination of a Unified Program for the Religious Life of a State University;" "The Relation of the Minister of the Local Church to the Student Problem;" "The Cooperation of Denominational Colleges with Religious Agencies at State Universities;" "The Christian Associations in Relation to Other Agencies Active in Student Communities."

Marked progress has been made in defining the responsibility and the limitations of the several agencies at work, the church, the university and student initiative as expressed in student associations. It is generally understood that it is the business of the university to provide dormitories and to conduct all instruction in religious education for which university credit is given. In some instances the university conducts chapel prayers and it is recommended that this custom be maintained and the service developed in efficiency wherever it is possible.

It is the province of the church to provide adequate pastoral oversight for her own students, to bring them into the life, work and worship of the church and to provide for the voluntary instruction in the Bible, missions and training for all forms of social service.

It is the province of the Christian associations to cooperate with the several churches in reaching their own students, especially to look after the large number of unchurched, to provide office room and clearing house facilities for the cooperative work of the churches and for all social and guild hall activities not provided in the churches.

Officers for the year are: President, Rev. Dean R. Leland, Lincoln, Neb.; vice president, Rev. Howard Gold, Madison, Wis,; Secretary, Rev. Joseph C. Todd, Bloomington, Ind. The next conference will be held in the University of Indiana, Bloomington.

The real size of the task before all churches is indicated by the fact that the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., is operating in twenty-four state universities and state colleges with a total number of students from Presbyterian homes of 10,000.

Churches Study to Be Efficient

Experts Talk on Problems of Finances—Buffalo Presbytery Will Consider Efficiency of Sessions—Federation Is Formed.

BUFFALO—The quest for greater efficiency by churches has been showing itself in various ways.

"How to Finance a Church" is the general topic of a course of eight evening studies based on accomplishments. Experts are presenting such topics as "Institutional Efficiency," "Scientific Survey Methods," "Church Budgets," "Endowment Funds," and "Advertising." An admission of $3 for the course is charged. One church has paid for six of its trustees.

The Presbyterial committee of education has sent out a letter offering churches the free service of men who are qualified to speak as semi-experts on practical church problems. The same committee is also making preparations for the second annual exhibition of Sunday school work.

The executive commission of presbytery has directed that the evening popular session of the spring meeting of presbytery be given to a conference on "Sessional Efficiency." Samuel V. V. Holmes, D. D., will lead the conference. A questionaire will be sent to all churches accompanying a request that there be a large lay representation present.

A movement has been inaugurated for the federation of the churches of Buffalo and Rev. E. C. Fellowes of Providence, R. I., has been chosen as executive secretary of the federation.

Will Support Filipino Evangelist

Manila Presbytery met in Tondo church, Manila, Dec. 3 and 4. Rev. Charles N. Magill of Lucena was elected moderator. There were interesting reports and discussions on home missions, Sabbath observance, Christian morals, Sabbath schools, church erection and evangelism. The home mission committee reported sufficient funds raised on the field to support a Filipino traveling evangelist for the coming year. The church erection committee is devising plans to help the weaker churches erect and improve their chapels. Strong resolutions were passed lamenting the fact that baseball and cock fighting were permitted on the Sabbath, and asking the authorities to take steps to prevent them. Presbytery has about 6,000 members, 400 having been added during the past year. The Synod of the Philippines has about 13,000 members.

During the sessions of presbytery the annual commencement exercises of Ellinwood School for Girls were held in the assembly room of the school. A well trained chorus sang. Rev. W. B. Cooke and Rev. M. Estrella spoke.

Dec. 1 and 2 the commencement of Union Bible Seminary for young men took place. Eleven were graduated. These young men and women, who have had special training according to modern methods, are helping to usher in a new era of evangelization in the Philippines.

Recent Christian Endeavor Activities

The annual dinner of the Superior, Wis., young people's union attracted 250 members recently at Hammond Avenue church.

Walter D. Howell of St. Paul, Minn., field secretary of the Minnesota Christian Endeavor Union, has recently been conducting meetings in various towns in the southern part of the state.

At a recent meeting in Broadway church, Rock Island, Ill., the Presbyterian Young People's Union was organized, to include the young people's societies of Central, South Park, U. P. and Broadway churches.

A sign of success

When any educational institution can say that all of its students are offered positions of responsibility before they graduate, it may be assumed that the work of that college is recognized as of the highest type. Employers watch the senior classes and vie with each other for an opportunity to hire the honor men. Students seek such institutions. They know they will be well trained for the work they have selected.

And So at Dubuque

Each member of the graduating class of Dubuque German College and Seminary already has been invited to be pastor of a church. Some of the young men have had three churches offered them. Employers — foreign speaking congregations—look to Dubuque for spiritual leaders. Students look to Dubuque for training — every room in Severance Hall is occupied. This dormitory was finished last fall and men who had been rooming in the city came to the new building. The beginning of another semester has brought many more students. Two have come direct from foreign countries, and are unable to speak English. They want to be preachers to their fellow countrymen in America. Complete information of the work of this institution will be sent on request to Dr. C. M. STEFFENS, President, Dubuque, Iowa

It is difficult to find a class of readers of The Continent who will not be intensely interested in the story of Dr. S. Hall Young, "An Alaskan 'Mush' to Presbytery." The evident joy of a man well past the "retiring" age who walked or ran through snow for 500 miles during an Alaskan winter is inspiring. Verily this is a tale of achievement and interest. Even the prosaic proofreader was moved to speak of its gripping power. Of course you will read it.

Don't miss that talk to the women of the church by Mrs. Montgomery, page 218. She has a way of stating facts in a most telling fashion. Perhaps you are out of a job and don't know it.

"Wash" Sales Barred in New York Stock Exchange—Vermont Banks Increase Holdings of Mortgages—Big Oil "Melon."

The action of the governors of the New York Stock Exchange in adopting a rule prohibiting anyone connected with a stock exchange firm giving or executing sales which do not involve actual changes of ownership came with great suddenness. Whether the seven bills presented to the New York legislature limiting the functions of the exchange had anything to do with the haste has not been admitted by brokers. The rule against "wash" sales has been urged since the Hughes investigation several years ago. It is designed to prevent manipulation, and its adoption is a very broad acknowledgment that such fictitious, if not dishonest, transactions have been freely indulged in in the past.

If such transactions have been allowed in stocks about which the public is permitted to know something definite, the conditions on the curb market must be fully as bad as insiders have claimed. It is here that stocks are bought and sold concerning which the public knows nothing more than the promoters volunteer.

According to one of the bills recently introduced into the New York legislature at the instance of Governor Sulzer, the pretended purchase or sale of stocks is made presumptive evidence of intent to defraud. By the stock exchange new rule a "wash" sale is punishable by expulsion from the exchange. Another bill provides a maximum of 15 per cent for call loans. Other bills cover the relation of a broker to his customers.

May Make Business More Stable

Business men will rejoice that the great market place for securities is to be cleaned up, but the average small investor will feel more than ever the necessity of putting his money into securities which cannot be influenced by fictitious values. Bonds and real estate mortgages will acquire additional prominence in the minds of most men.

Mortgages are becoming more popular constantly according to available records of the amount of money invested by various concerns. It has been shown, for instance, that the savings banks of Vermont have nearly $37,000,000 in farm mortgages, an increase of more than 50 per cent in the last five years. The absolute stability of principal of mortgages and the certainty of income are urged by friends of this form of investment.

Brief Bits of Business News

Money has been easy and activity in stocks has not been large. The demand for bonds, however, continues strong.

The size of the shipments of farm implements into the Northwest is breaking records. The farmers are preparing for big crops again this year.

The charge was made in Washington recently by a New Orleans banker that many national banks in the South openly violate the national banking act by loaning money on real estate mortgages. He used this fact as an argument

A Tribute to Dr. W. H. Hubbard

As the successor of the late William H. Hubbard, D. D., of the First church of Auburn, N. Y., to which he had given a quarter century of self-sacrificing service, I want to bear witness to the truly marvelous character of his ministry. His was a genius of a rare order and in his death the church of Christ has lost a valued servant and the present generation one of the most striking examples of passionate devotion to a single cause. This is the common thought of all who had even a casual acquaintance with his work. But for the audience that packed the auditorium of First church at the hour of the service on February 4—rich and poor alike—there was one common sorrow in the loss of a great friend of the people.

In the past year and a half I have visited scores and hundreds of homes in this city that gratefully confess their debt to him for whatever of happiness and prosperity they may have known. Like his Master, "he went about doing good" and also like Him he never spared himself. He literallly wore himself out in the service of others, but his memory shall continue to lend hope and inspiration to all who knew him.

May the mantle of this truly great man of God and simple-hearted servant of Christ rest abundantly upon all young men in the ministry of our church today.

CHARLES GORMAN RICHARDS.

The remains of Dr. W. H. Hubbard were removed from New York City after brief funeral services had been held at the home of his brother-in-law, William Skinner, by Dr. Mackenzie, Dr. McLeod and Dr. Wylie. When the funeral party reached Dr. Hubbard's home town, Auburn, N. Y., a large crowd of citizens met them at the station. The body was carried to First church and there lay in state while thousands passed by the coffin. The funeral was appointed for 2:30 on Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 4, and at 2 o'clock the auditorium was overcrowded. Thirty city firemen sat together in a block of seats near the door, so that they might get out quickly in case of an alarm of fire. Dr. Charles G. Richards conducted the services and memorial addresses were made by Dr. George P. Stewart of Auburn Seminary and Dr. W. H. Foulkes, secretary of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation. A noticeable feature of the funeral was the number of poor people of Auburn who came weeping to the church to tell of Dr. Hubbard's charity to them in privation or affliction.

Dr. Joseph W. Cochran of the Board of Education spent the first week in February with the students of Carroll College, Waukesha, Wis., in religious meetings and conferences. Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, author of "In His Steps," will address the college students Feb. 19.

¶ The three or four per cent the savings bank pays does not fairly represent your money's earning ability. Is is simply the small end of the profits. The bank keeps the big share as their fee for re-investment—RE-INVESTING YOUR MONEY IN MORTGAGES—something you refuse to do for yourself. By investing direct you can at least double the profits of your savings as they now accrue to you. Oklahoma first mortgages—amply secured by two to four times the amount of the loan—make this possible—the same kind the banks and insurance companies buy.

Why Insurance Companies Buy Oklahoma Mortgages

Experience showed them that in order to meet competition they must secure as high a rate per dollar as sound business judgment allowed. Investigation proved that Oklahoma offered a choice field for investments of this kind. Approximately $415,000,000.00 is now invested by the insurance companies in farm mortgages—and a good share of this in Oklahoma mortgages. Surely you can't do better than follow the example of these trained buyers of conservative investments. So decide now to give your money a chance to make good fory ou.

Tell of Pioneer Mission Work

Men who are on the firing line of the church organizing Sunday schools and churches in the West met in Chicago this week for the largest conference of home missionaries ever held. It is the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work. There were present seventy missionaries, pastor-evangelists and educational superintendents from thirty-two states.

Headquarters of the conference was in Second church, which was turned over to the delegates for their use. Meetings were held there morning and afternoon, with special services of one sort and another in the evenings. A more complete account of the meetings will be printed next week.

Stories of the swimming of rivers in flood times, the braving of bullets of cowboys bent on breaking up a meeting and the hauling of lumber thirty miles for a mission building were included in the tales related by the missionaries at the experience meeting Monday morning in Second church. Several of the missionaries also gave touches of their work at the ministers' meeting Monday morning at Assembly hall.

The conference was devoted to the consideration of practical questions with a series of educational lectures by Rev. E. Morris Fergusson of the board. Among others who took part in the early days of the conference, which closed Thursday morning, were Dr. Gerrit Verkuyl, Rev. James M. Bain, R. F. Sulzer, Rev. Henry W. Bainton, Rev. Ralph H. Houseman and Dr. S. R. Ferguson.

Services in Second church Sunday were in honor of the visitors, many of whom occupied pulpits about the city in the morning. Monday evening there was a banquet to the visitors given by Chicagoans.

From Various Fields

Pennsylvania

Swarthmore church during the five years' work of Rev. William M. Woodfin has exactly doubled its membership.

Dr. A. L. Lathem, pastor of Third church, Chester, in one of a series of sermons on "The Slime Pits of Chester" maintained that the liquor interests control the city.

Mount Union church recently welcomed a number of members following two weeks of special services conducted by the pastor, Rev. C. W. Todd. The membership is now 350.

A whirlwind campaign was carried on last week in the Grove City congregation to raise $4,800 to complete the payment for the new parsonage purchased last May. The congregation was divided into ward committees, which met each evening, and in a few days the whole sum was more than subscribed. This church supports two foreign missionaries and two home missionaries, besides a number of native missionaries. The present pastor, Rev. Herbert Hezlep, came from Market Square church, Germantown, Philadelphia.

Massachusetts

Rev. J. A. McArthur of Sullivan, Ind., has been very acceptably supplying the vacant pulpit of First church, Haverhill.

First church, Newburyport, has been recently bereaved by the death of Mrs. Timothy Y. Cotton, who for twenty-five years has had charge of its Sunday school primary department.

After carrying a mortgage for eighteen years the congregation of First church, Lynn, last year succeeded in raising $4,000, which reduced the debt nearly two-thirds. The recent annual meeting was the most hopeful and enthusiastic in the history of the church. Rev. J. P. MacPhie is pastor.

Roxbury church closed its church year with the largest balance in the treasury in its history and opened the new year by receiving fifty members at the midwinter communion. In recognition of their work, the congregation tendered the pastor, Rev. Clarence A. Young, and his wife a reception Jan. 22 and presented them with a check for $300.

New York

Dr. and Mrs. William Rivers Taylor of Rochester celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their marriage Friday evening, Jan. 24, by inviting all the officials of Brick church to a reception at their home. Dr. Taylor will celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his becoming pastor of Brick church Feb. 16.

A week was appointed by Nassau Presbytery for special emphasis on missions through all the churches. Jan. 26 addresses by missionaries were made in the larger churches at one of their services, while the pastors thus freed visited the smaller churches to present the same theme. Through the week a series of conferences was held at group centers, to which the churches within each group sent delegates. The plan was arranged by the presbyterial committees on home and foreign missions.

Work is progressing on the new edifice of First church, Olean, Rev. Harry B. Boyd pastor. A communicants' class of thirty-six meets every week.

During the series of meetings by Dr. W. E. Biederwolf in Jamestown 3,000 persons walked down the aisle for Christ, among them many influential citizens. On Tuesday evening, Jan. 28, Dr. Biederwolf preached his sermon on popular amusements. Before 7 o'clock the tabernacle was packed with 6,000 people. The police turned away 5,000. The meetings closed Feb. 2.

New Jersey

Rev. William Hoppaugh has announced his intention to resign from Springfield church.

The past year has seen the establishment of a men's club and two missionary societies in Chelsea church, Atlantic City. Rev. Herbert R. Rundall is pastor.

Alterations are being made at Clinton Avenue church, Newark, so that the Sunday school can meet all at one time. Two sessions are now being held. There will be space for clubs for boys and girls in the addition.

A rule was adopted by New Brunswick Presbytery at a recent meeting that no pastorates shall be effected when the salary named is less than $800 and a house. Arrangements were completed for the holding of a China forward campaign, centering in Trenton, March 5 and 6. Overtures 1 to 6 were answered in the negative; 7 and 8 in the affirmative.

Maryland

The communion service Jan. 12 at Salisbury church was more largely attended than any communion in the last five years, due, it is believed, to the renewed interest in all church activities since the religious census, which was recently taken.

The Sunday school of First church, Havre-de-Grace, has increased from 125 to 195 during the past six months. A men's Bible class under the pastor, Rev. Alfred L. Taxis, is increasing in attendance. A new steam heating plant has recently been installed in the church.

District of Columbia

Dr. William Radcliffe, pastor of New York Avenue church, Washington, has converted the midweek service during February and March into a communicants' class. Dr. Radcliffe has also announced a series of Sunday evening sermons preceding Easter based on a young man's objection to joining church.

Kentucky

The new $50,000 building of Westminster church, Bowling Green, is nearing completion. It is expected that it will be occupied in March. Dr. R. W. Binkley is pastor.

Alabama

In Huntsville Presbytery among the congregations which are building new churches are the ones at Nebo, Mount Pleasant No. 2 and New Decatur West Side. Willoughby church at New Decatur has recently erected a modern manse for the pastor, Rev. J. T. Cotton.

The church at 83d street, Birmingham, under the care of Rev. S. C. McCluney, is building a brick veneer edifice.

Valley Grove church has completed an enlargement of its edifice, doubling the seating capacity. Rev. D. G. Orman is pastor.

Leeds church, Rev. R. P. Taylor pastor, has appointed a committee to raise funds for a new church and will soon be ready to begin building.

Oak Grove and Rosedale churches in Birmingham Presbytery have united and will build a modern church half way between the two former buildings.

A new church was recently organized at West End in Birmingham under the leadership of Rev. E. Frank Lee. Another new church has been organized at Marvel under Rev. J. S. Bridges.

Indiana

Dr. J. T. Henderson of Chicago, associate secretary of the National Brotherhood, was the speaker at a special service for men at Franklin church, Jan. 26.

A simultaneous campaign in nine churches of Shelbyville was recently held. Services were held each night in each of the churches, the pastor doing the preaching.

At a meeting of 100 farmers recently at a Presbyterian church several miles from Columbus a farmers' club was organized for the purpose of showing the young people of the country the advantages of staying on the farm and away from the cities.

Trinity church, South Bend, which last September had an average collection of $2.50 with five at the prayer meeting and was on the verge of dissolution, is now rapidly gaining strength. There are 110 in Sunday school and seventy-five at church. A large number recently united with the church and Rev. John S. Burns, pastor, hopes by April there will be fifty more additions.

Iowa

Elder Calvin Davis of Delmar church, 92 years old, has given $500 to the church with which to purchase pews.

At the meeting of the Cedar Rapids Ministerial Union a committee was appointed to arrange for services at Grace Episcopal church on Good Friday and for services during that week both on the East and West side similar to those held last year.

A Sabbath school and home missionary institute was held at California Junction Feb. 2-4. Professor Vaughn of the Iowa Agricultural College at Ames, Dr. C. H. Purmort, superintendent of home missions; Dr. S. R. Ferguson, with others, assisted in the program.

The Iowa State Sunday School Association has called W. D. Stem of Philadelphia, Pa., to be general secretary of the state work. Mr. Stem was formerly with the Pennsylvania State Sunday School Association and superintendent of the adult Bible class division work.

Wisconsin

The new church at Cornell in Chippewa county was organized with eighteen members Jan. 5 by Rev. Engvald Iverson of Eau Claire, assisted by Professor P. L. Lachy, a ruling elder of Chippewa Falls church. Professor Lachy has built up a Sunday school of fifty members. Plans are made for a suitable house of worship.

A series of rural life and country church conferences is arranged for the second week of March in Wisconsin. Rev. Matthew McNutt, for twelve years the successful pastor of DuPage church, near Naperville, Ill., will speak. The meetings begin at Neenah March 10 and continue at Packwaukee March 11, Marshfield March 12, Stanley March 13, Ashland March 14, closing at Superior on Sunday, March 16.

Colorado

Rev. W. L. Philips, pastor of Longmont church, is state superintendent of college and high school work for the State Sunday School Association and has under way a plan of Bible study approved by the State Teachers' Association, whereby students in the state university and State Teachers' College obtain credits for Bible study carried on under the auspices of the churches. This is to be extended to all the high schools of the state.

Orchard, one of a group of three churches under the care of Rev. H. S. McCutcheon, is putting up a very neat building to cost about $1,800. This will make the second church erected within the year on this field.

Evangelistic meetings Sunday evenings conducted by Dr. C. W. Weyer at First church, Pueblo, fill the church at each service. A large number of accessions have been made since the coming of the present pastor last August. The attendance of the Sunday school has doubled.

Oregon

The church at Burns has subscriptions made and plans for a new building costing, furnished, $12,000.

First church, Mount Vernon, was organized Jan. 23 by Pastor-Evangelist D. K. Laurie. Two elders were elected.

Rev. Joseph Herbert has taken up work under the home missionary committee of Grand Ronde Presbytery in Harney county.

Kansas

At a meeting of the home mission commission in Topeka Jan. 15 Walter Irwin, D. D., of Wichita was elected superintendent of missions in Kansas, with Rev. D. C. Smith and Rev. A. J. Gragg as assistants.

Florida

The new home mission church in Fort Lauderdale held its first communion Jan. 26, when a large number of persons were received. The outlook is full of promise. Dr. C. L. Work is acting pastor of the church.

Official Changes in Woman's Board

The February meeting of the Woman's Board of Home Missions was a decidedly depressing session on account of the resignations of its president, Mrs. Frank S. Bennett, and its secretary, Miss Julia Fraser. The resignation of the president was forced by her long continued siege of nervous prostration, which has prevented her taking much active part in the work of the board for over a year. The resignation of Miss Fraser followed, as the secretary regarded it as fair to a new administration to leave the way open to complete reorganization. The board was unwilling to consent to either resignation. Action on Mrs. Bennett's resignation was postponed for three months with the hope that she would be so much improved in strength in the meantime that it would be possible for her to go on with the work.

Miss Fraser was also asked to reconsider, but when she promptly declined, her resignation was accepted. She will continue in office, however, until May 1. She came from California a little over four years ago after conspicuously useful service as field secretary of the board of the Pacific coast. Her administration has been characterized by breezy Western push and has enlisted enthusiastic cooperation from the women's forces.

Around the Shop

The Around-the-Shop Man sat not long ago with a little group of men casually assembled at lunch in a Cincinnati hotel. One of them remarked, "I'm going to New York next week, and while there I'm going to find out about my trip to Europe next summer."

"What line will you take?" inquired his vis-a-vis.

"I don't know, I'm sure."

"Well, I should be very glad to give you a note to Mr. B. of the Blank Company. He'll give you the information you need, whether you go by his line or not."

The first speaker was greatly pleased to have this note, though he knew it would not mean any reduction in rate or special privilege. But it is a good rule in business that introductions made in good faith by those who have the right to give them are of value to all parties. There is a vast amount of such reciprocity.

Business houses and other institutions advertise in The Continent simply because they believe the people who read The Continent are the sort of folks they would like to do business with—not only the sort but the very pick of the sort. The Continent introduces them to you. And they like to know that they are dealing with a Continent reader. Even if you saw the announcement some time ago, and possibly also saw it elsewhere, remember it is your privilege to avail yourself of the introduction by simply saying, "I saw it in The Continent." That at once lifts you out of the mass and puts you with the other inquirers who are thus identified. The advertiser knows that you are A 1 just as definitely as if we had written a letter for you (which, by the way, we would do).

The advertisers in The Continent cover almost everything that good, sensible, thrifty people require. It will help you, and please them, if you will always say: "I'm a member of The Continent family."

What Lafayette College Is!

Founded in 1832

Situated at Easton, on the upper Delaware, among the Pennsylvania Hills—with forty-five buildings valued at $767,000.00. Its faculty numbers fifty-five and its present student body is five hundred seventy-eight. Its graduates and former students number more than five thousand.

Lafayette offers courses in the college leading to the degrees of A. B., Ph.B. and B. S., and in the Engineering School in Civil, Mining, Electrical and Mechanical Engineering and Chemistry.

It is exactly the place where a man who wants his boy educated in a quiet town, among beautiful natural surroundings, by men of a high type of culture, and above all with positive Christian influences daily surrounding him, would be likely to send his boy.

Putting God Away

"WHY DO YOU DO RIGHT?"

"Because God commands me to," would once have been the expected answer. It would have come out straightforwardly and would have seemed normal.

But today it would sound odd—like pious affectation.

For the world in late years has drifted in a direction which somehow makes it harder than it used to be for even a devout man to speak of himself as personally directed by God.

The age is not atheist. On theory of things very few twentieth-century men would deny a Creator and Governor of the universe.

But to feel him close at hand, dealing immediately with one's own inner self, is rare and becoming more rare. It is no longer a typical thought even for Christians. The Creator has become indeed "a God afar off"—a God associated with men and women by vague roundabout connections only, through laws and consequences.

America today is forfeiting God-sense. God-belief stands; perhaps is growing. But God-sense is fading out.

This is not referring to anything in the nature of mysticism or spiritual ecstasies. Raptures lifting the soul to celestial dreamlands have never been the experience of more than a few exalted saints. Doubtless they never will be ordinary to Christians.

But what is here meant was once almost universal with religious men—an everyday basis of life for the most prosaic lay people of the church. It was, in truth, counted the very essence of the thing called religion; a man was not supposed to have religion at all until he had some realization of personal dealings with his Maker.

Perhaps this realization was more an axiom assumed than a distinct consciousness. But howsoever the soul arrived at it, there came to dominate the Christian's whole mind a positive and never forgotten sense that life must be lived with God looking on—marking each action and the motive for it, approving each good deed, and reserving for judgment every evil work unrepented for.

"Him with whom we have to do"—in all the stern necessity and inevitableness of those majestic monosyllables—was, to men so living, just as vivid and pertinent a description of God as it was to the apostle who first penned the words.

God was to them the one unescapable fact of the universe.

Men strung to the tension of this vast thought might no doubt become fanatic, but they were for the most part protected from that excess because they never learned to think of themselves as enjoying any aristocratic spiritual privilege. They were not singled out for God's attention.

Instead they recognized themselves as dwelling only in the same infinite Eyesight which was bent as directly on all other humanity. They really believed in Omniscience, and made no artificial difficulty of faith by wondering, as moderns do, how God can find time to take account of men and women individually.

But the philosophy of Omniscience, or the psychology of a consciousness of God, is beside the point of observation here. The thing really important to think of, in an hour when such a sense of God seems liable to become a reminiscence, is the cost of losing it.

Can the God-sense of a generation fade out and not take with it that generation's vital moral strength?

In times past of Christian experience the main reason why men were strong to do what they understood to be right was their feeling that God would mark their failures if they fell short.

Doubtless it was fear in the first stages of Christian living—in the more seasoned of God's servants, it was loyalty—but whichever it was, the pleasing of an eternal Master was a compulsion which forbade men to shirk or cower or retreat and prevented their sneaking away to indulge the languors and appetites of the flesh.

Under that compulsion stout hearts went to the stake and welcomed slaughter rather than violate the least item of their opinion of truth and right. Under that compulsion men attempted enterprises of incredible hardship and apparently certain failure—just because they felt God expected it of them.

But now all this background of "God and I" has grown to be so unaccustomed that the average layman thinks it almost freakish for one to say that God expects of him anything at all.

The sense of God standing by and giving instructions for a man's life—even of God standing near to approve when he does right and condemn when he does wrong—is hardly to be found at all in the modern man's store of rational, down-to-the-fact ideas.

But has the modern man anything to put in place thereof which will give him equal steadiness in stalwart morality?

Ingrained respect for the eternal and immutable laws of right; beautiful sentiment about what a human being owes of fairness and sympathy to his fellow humans, and prudence which cannily sanctions the wisdom of the golden rule, are the safeguards on which the twentieth century imagines it can depend for ordered morality among men and for individual character fit to bear stress.

But these will not do for the long strain; they will not supply permanent moral motive power. Loss of God-sense means eventually the breakdown of right-doing wherever right-doing is difficult or against immediate apparent interest.

Obeying a law, keeping a principle, observing a prudence—these impersonal artifices in morality may make a fair showing for a while, but any life-and-death test will tell their failure.

A law cannot command a man forever; only a Person can impose a loyalty unflinchingly kept in the face of fire, flood and fury.

"For God's sake" is the ultimate, eternally abiding reason of righteousness. "God has made us for himself." Not only are we restless till we rest in him, as Augustine says; we are nerveless till by him we are nerved to be right.

Back to God's presence—that is the watchword of safe morality and enduring religion. Think yourself back to it; better, pray yourself back. It is only when you feel God searching you that you are sure to stand fast in his ways.

And the church—let it bestir itself to proclaim the reality of the onlooking Eyes—the Eyes of infinite knowledge and infinite justice and infinite love that look in every place of human life, "beholding the evil and the good."

If the church neglects that it will see the awful result at the end in a society where neither evil nor good is known in distinction from the ways of an aimless and reckless human vagrancy.

"Thou God seest me!" There's the encyclopedia of right

The World

Violent Governmental Crisis in Japan

Real democracy is at last stirring Japan—such is the interpretation put upon the serious riots and popular outbursts which have been occurring in Tokyo, Kobe, Osaka and other parts of the empire. Hundreds of persons were hurt in encounters with the police and it was necessary to call out troops to guard residences of the imperial family and officials. Officers of subsidized bureaucratic newspapers were demolished, police stations were attacked and street cars wrecked. The chief cause is said to be growing public dissatisfaction with militarism.

Evidences of unrest began to appear long before the fall of the Saionji cabinet early in December, brought about by machinations of the army clan, but it was expected that the policy of economy and military retrenchment announced by Premier Katsura would appease the growing resentment of the people against the genro or "elder statesmen," who dominated the reign of the last mikado and made and unmade cabinets. Under this system the Japanese have become one of the most heavily taxed peoples in the world, while at the same time the cost of living has risen until a considerable part of the population is hardly able to obtain the bare necessaries of life.

The superstitious veneration with which all Japanese citizens formerly regarded the emperor—a reverence which formed the basis for stalwart patriotism in more than one war—seems gradually to be weakening under the influence of western civilization, and the death of the old emperor and the succession of a weaker son came at an inopportune time for the admirers of the ancient regime.

Prince Katsura has been trying to organize a new parliamentary party similar to political parties in Great Britain, but popular clamor against the government, which vented itself in mob violence, forced him and his ministry to resign. Curiously enough, he was also opposed by the bigger army and navy advocates. The emperor had previously suspended the sittings of the diet after that body had passed a vote of lack of confidence in the government and refused a command to withdraw it. Count Gombei Yamamato on Saturday completed a new nonpartisan coalition cabinet. Viscount Chinda, at present ambassador to the United States, was named as minister of foreign affairs. With the situation as it is, observers say there need be no present apprehension of further territorial conquests by the island empire.

State of Affairs in Mexico Is Desperate

Chaos prevailed in Mexico last week, and on Monday the prospects of settlement were blacker rather than brighter. Felix Diaz and his forces had control of the national arsenal in Mexico City, while President Madero and the faithful General Huerta desperately held the government palace. The streets of the city became a battlefield, and cannon and machine guns were in almost continuous operation. A truce arranged last Sunday at the urgent request of the American ambassador, H. L. Wilson, was soon broken and the fighting resumed.

President Madero's resignation was demanded by Diaz and requested by the Mexican senate, and there was a suggestion that Francisco de La Barra, formerly ambassador at Washington, be made temporary chief executive, but Madero spurned the idea of retreat. Not less than 1,500 persons were killed during the first six days of fighting, including many Americans and other foreigners and noncombatants. The question of American intervention became a burning one, but President Taft and the cabinet steadily adhered to their previous policy of noninterference, except to send battleships to the Mexican ports. The Monroe doctrine is likely to be severely tested before peace is restored.

Turko-Balkan War—Greece Gets Island of Crete

Although the novelty has worn off the Turko-Balkan war, and the news from the battle lines has been scanty because of the enforced absence of war correspondents, the information which becomes public indicates the fierce and desperate nature of the struggle. The sorties of the Turks seem to have been almost uniformly unsuccessful, and the armies of the allies are gradually closing in on the various defenses. The Bulair line of fortifications on the Gallipoli peninsula was captured by the Bulgarians last week after a sharp resistance. The Montenegrins were fruitlessly aggressive at Scutari. It is reported by way of London that Turkish transports recently landed at Midia 15,000 Kourdish raiders, who were well armed but without provisions. They were ordered to scatter into bands throughout Thrace and maintain themselves at the expense of the country. Stories of massacre come from both the Turkish and the allied combatants.

Adrianople continued to be the chief bone of contention, but up to the first of the week had held out against the besiegers. Its commander, Shukri Pasha, sent a wireless message just before the resumption of hostilities, in which he was quoted as saying that he would rather sacrifice his last man than surrender, but if he found further resistance useless he would slaughter the 40,000 Bulgarians living in the city and then turn his guns on the chief buildings and reduce them to a gigantic rubbish heap. Between fire and sword his soldiers would fight their way out or perish in the attempt. Fortunately not many of the Turkish officers have his spirit of barbaric valor. Soldiers near the capital mutinied Monday.

Greece consummated a diplomatic victory on Saturday when the protecting powers, England, Russia, France and Italy, evacuated Crete, which they have occupied jointly with Turkey, and the Greek flag was officially hoisted over the island.

Relations between Russia and Austria are in a dangerous state of tension, according to advices from Vienna. Differences over the boundaries and control of Albania remain almost irreconcilable, although Prince Hohenlohe of Austria was sent to St. Petersburg with a personal letter from Emperor Francis Joseph to the czar.

Honors to Memory of Captain Scott and Companions

Rarely has a tragedy in which the victims were so few attracted the widespread attention given to the fate of Captain Scott and his four companions who perished in the Antarctic nearly a year ago. Pathetic, thrilling, courageous, inspiring—these are some of the adjectives that are being applied to the polar explorer's ill-fated exploit. Not only did Captain Scott leave behind him a record of scientific achievement but more than that he left a record of splendid heroism which has aroused the world's admiration. His dying message, found in his diary, explained the misfortunes which overwhelmed the party—the loss of the pony transport, the collapse of Seaman Evans, whose physical strength had been counted upon; the unexpectedly severe cold, from 20 to 47 degrees below zero; the sickening of Captain Oates, who went off by himself to die that he might not be a burden to the others; the shortage of fuel in the depots and finally the long, deadly storm which overwhelmed the three survivors only eleven miles from the last camp, when food and fuel and life itself gave out.

"For my own sake," wrote Captain Scott's numbed fingers, "I do not regret this journey, which has shown that Englishmen can endure hardships, help one another and meet death with as great a fortitude as ever in the past. . . . We bow to the will of Providence, determined still to do our best to the last.

"But if we have been willing to give our lives to this enterprise, which is for the honor of our country, I appeal to our countrymen to see that those who depend on us are properly cared for. Had we lived I should have had a tale to tell of the hardihood, endurance and courage of my companions which would have stirred the heart of every Englishman. These rough notes and our dead bodies must tell the tale."

Premier Asquith on behalf of the British nation was prompt to promise that the captain's appeal would not fall on deaf ears.

A great memorial service was held in St. Paul's cathedral, London, on Friday, attended by people in every walk of life, from King George down to common laborers. Memorial exercises were also held in other parts of the British empire. Captain Scott's wife was on midocean bound for New Zealand when the news of her husband's fate reached the world.

Officials and Directors Guilty Under Antitrust Law

No sooner had "big business"—meaning that variety of commerce which operates close to the edge of the Sherman law—been cheered by the decision of the United States supreme court in the United Shoe Machinery Company case, finding that the mere bigness of that combination was not "unreasonable," than an adverse verdict was rendered against the National Cash Register Company. A jury in the federal court at Cincinnati last Thursday found President John H. Patterson and twenty-eight other officials and former officials guilty under the criminal provisions of the antitrust law. Although a motion for a new trial or an appeal will be made, yet the twenty-nine are now facing the possibility of $5,000 fines and one year in jail. Technical appeals proved unavailing in the case of the convicted secretary of the sugar trust, who has petitioned for an executive pardon.

At Detroit last Friday another federal court jury found a dozen men connected with the so-called bathtub trust guilty of criminal conspiracy and they and their firms were fined. This was the second antitrust case decided in favor of the government at Detroit within a week, the other case being against the boot and shoe last trust.

West Virginia Has a Senatorial Scandal

It is West Virginia's turn this year to furnish an example of the evils possible under the present system of choosing United States senators. Five members of the legislature were arrested last week with several thousand dollars in marked bills in their possession, said to be the price of their votes in the senatorial contest. William Seymour Edwards, Republican-Progressive candidate for the senate to succeed Senator Watson, Democrat, who is seeking reelection, was later arrested on the charge of offering bribes. Mr. Edwards emphatically denied the charges against him. Rev. Thomas J. Smith of West Union, a member of the lower house of the legislature, had previously startled that body when he told from the floor that one of the members arrested had offered him $2,000 and had surreptitiously placed $500 in his pocket.

The Illinois legislature has been trying to elect two United States senators, one to take the place of the deposed Lorimer and another to succeed the veteran Senator Cullom. A bipartisan deadlock soon developed, but both houses and all parties interrupted the struggle last week long enough to ratify the proposed amendment to the federal constitution for the election of senators by direct vote of the people. This made the seventeenth state to approve the amendment. Another Lorimer scandal is improbable in Illinois, and apparently one has been nipped in the bud at the West Virginia capital, but even where there is no suspicion of corruption there is frequently an enormous waste of time and effort and energy on the part of legislators which should be devoted to consideration of state questions of importance often overlooked because of the demoralization caused by the senatorship scrambles.

President Taft Vetoes the Immigration Bill

After having passed both houses of Congress by large majorities the Dillingham-Burnett bill to restrict immigration was vetoed by President Taft Friday evening, almost at the last hour remaining for him to approve or disapprove the measure. The President based his disapproval solely upon the literacy test, as other provisions of the bill, which in effect codified existing immigration regulations, were regarded as most desirable. The President in his brief veto message referred to a lengthy written opinion by Secretary Nagel of the department of commerce and labor advising that the bill be rejected. Mr. Nagel argued that the ability or inability to read was not a fair criterion as to the merit of an individual immigrant, new arrivals frequently being illiterate because opportunities have been denied them. The secretary also asserts that insufficient consideration had been given to the industrial conditions of this country, which now require the presence of laborers who are willing to engage in certain kinds of toil shunned by natives.

A large number of representatives of Jewish, Polish and other organizations urged the President to veto the bill on the ground that its effect would be to shut out a great many healthy peasants and sturdy members of the honest working class, while admitting anarchists, "black hand" parasites and criminals. These latter almost without exception have at least a degree of education. It was contended that the bill in principle was a step in the direction of ultimate exclusion of aliens, some of its opponents declaring that its aim was not "to sift out but to shut out," a policy for which America as a whole is not yet ready to stand.

Richest Young Man to Be a Farmer

Vincent Astor, who is reputed to be the richest young man in the world—made such by the death of his father in the Titanic disaster—has chosen scientific agriculture as his life work, according to an announcement made a few days ago by Governor Sulzer of New York. The governor is given credit for having diverted the mind of the young multimillionaire from idleness and pleasure to a channel of great usefulness through the development of the Astor farm at Rhinecliff on the Hudson along new and experimental lines.

The governor appointed Mr. Astor chairman of the New York state delegation to the meeting of the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome next May. In addition to attending the convention the delegation is to investigate the European systems of agricultural credit or finance.

Fairer Trial than Before for Koreans

The second trial of the Korean Christians and others convicted of conspiracy to assassinate the Japanese governor general of "Chosen" has come to a close in appellate court at Seoul, and the announcement of a verdict from the presiding judge and his two associates is to be expected on any day. The missionaries who have been watching the trial are hopeful of a finding that will repair most of the injustice done by the grossly prejudiced verdict of the court of first instance. Certainly the appellate trial has been fairer in all particulars, and only the realization that the all-powerful police still exercise much control over even the superior court prevents confident hope of the acquittal of all defendants.

The one most grievous error of the lower bench—the refusal to hear any evidence for the defense—has been fully atoned for by the court of appeals. In this second trial practically all the testimony and documents which the defendants and their attorneys desired to present relative to their alibis has been received with respectful consideration. The attitude of the principal judge has also been vastly different from that of his sneering colleague who presided over the lower court. With what even the missionaries regard as remarkable patience, this superior judge has listened quietly to all the details of their prison experiences which the defendants desired to relate. His whole attitude has seemed very correct.

Under these conditions the prisoners' stories of the means by which their so-called confessions were obtained came out in greater detail and even more convincingly than in the court below. More strenuously than ever it was insisted that not one of the confessions was original information furnished by the accused. In every case the police made the statement and applied torture to the man under examination until he said "yes" to their questions whether the things alleged were so. And the defendants gave more precise descriptions than before of the forms of these tortures.

One man told how his thumbs were tied together behind his back—one arm over his shoulder and bent down, the other bent backward and up; in this position he was strung up until only his toes barely touched the floor. Another said his hands and feet were tied together and he was swung round and round like a trussed pig. Many were beaten with iron rods. Some stripped naked were exposed outdoors to winter cold and doused with ice water; others were baked over charcoal fires. But the favorite of all methods employed by the police seems to have been the scheme of forcing a prisoner underneath a shelf several inches too low for his stature.

Hope of Revising Criminal Court Method

During the second trial of Korean convicts for conspiracy at Seoul, the American leaders of the native church have enjoyed the invaluable counsel and support of three experienced missionaries to Japan, who, at the unanimous request of the workers in Korea, came over to watch proceedings and advise on the proper attitude of interested foreigners. These gentlemen are Reverends Albertus Pieters of Oita, J. G. Dunlop of Kanazawa and W. A. Wilson of Okayama.

Mr. Pieters, who has lived twenty-five years in Japan and is a hearty admirer of the nation, confesses that before going to Korea on this errand he considered the allegations of torture "wildly impossible." But what he has seen and heard in Seoul has quite changed his mind. He now considers that the abuses complained of are liable to befall any Korean who has the misfortune to become obnoxious for any reason to the police.

Yet these visitors from Japan have strong confidence that public opinion in Japan itself will end all this as soon as the policy of the governor general is fully apprehended there. Happily information on the subject seems to be gradually spreading in Japan, and one result hopefully anticipated is an early amendment to the Japanese penal code which will wipe out the practice of examining suspects secretly before the public procurator. At this examination the prisoner is questioned without friend or counsel present and is helplessly subject to whatever methods the procurator or his police assistants may wish to adopt. Yet the record which the procurator makes up from this inquiry is legally credited with more weight in court than any other form of evidence. This process was taken over by Japan from French precedents, yet as long ago as 1897 France abolished private examination on account of the obvious injustice of it. But Japan still sticks to an unrevised code.

Is Thy God Able?

THERE ARE LARGE dramatic possibilities in the scene at the mouth of the den of lions when the king, after a sleepless night, comes to see whether Daniel has been protected. Evidently he feels that the one under test is not Daniel, but Daniel's God. Daniel has made a good deal of his relation to God, and has allowed it to distinguish his life from others. Now came a test, not of Daniel but of his God. So the question of the king is not, "Are you alive? Have you survived?" but, "Is thy God able to deliver thee?"

That is the cry of the world still. "You say you believe in God; you talk bravely about his power; here are trying experiences, sorrow, hardship, calamity; does your faith count now? Is thy God able?" It is not so much a question as to whether believers are loyal to him, but whether there is really anything in what they are claiming. Is there any such God as they claim to believe in? Is there any real ground for the hope which they keep declaring?

When men without the Christian faith see believers break and fail and fall, see them devoured by the lions of sorrow, or adversity, or even of sin, the world does not stop with condemning them; it goes on to declare there is nothing in what they believe, after all. It persistently measures God by the men who claim to believe in him. So it becomes immensely important that men have such thought of God as sustains them in their adverse experiences. It throws us back upon asking ourselves whether God as we know him is really able to do what needs to be done in our lives.

Here are the great advances in science. Men are learning the truth about dark facts and are claiming to know the secrets of life. They talk learnedly about evolution and æons of time and unmeasured space. The world which once seemed so large has shrunk to a speck in the universe. Men are even saying that the secret of the origin of life is yet to be found, and that it will prove to be the result of certain chemical actions. You read all about that in the papers and magazines, or you hear it talked about in the circles of friends or unbelievers. What does that do to your faith?

Do you fear for the ark? Do you tremble for the future? Is thy God able? Are you sure that the outcome will be only so much clearer revelation of his glory? Many of us will have to admit down in our hearts that the question sometimes arises whether, after all, we may not be mistaken, whether we have not made too much of this matter of religion. So we talk fearfully, or we whistle to keep up our courage, or we try to make up by bluster for the real secret doubt that we have. That is, we are not sure of God. We do not know whether our God is able or not.

That is why faith fails in so many cases in the presence of scientific discoveries or speculations. The real, triumphant faith welcomes all these new things in the assurance that every one that is finally proved true will bring more glory to God, will make the Christian revelation so much the more beautiful; and every one that is not true will soon be disproved. Our God is able! Our Christ is equal to all the strain of all the new knowledge that can be found! It will all yet be a diadem of glory for him.

Here are great social evils. They flaunt themselves in the face of society, or they skulk in dark places and wait to strike the social order in its time of peril. After all these centuries the social order is far from being what it ought to be. The saloon is here, the brothel, gambling, frivolity, covetousness. You cannot be honest and blink them. You cannot get away from them. They are too obvious. What then?

Do you despair? Do you give up? Do you fight on in a dogged, hopeless fashion? Do you feel that they cannot be ended—that they are here to stay, and that any thought of driving them out is chimerical? Or is thy God able? Are you ready to enter the fight against any form of evil in the assurance that with such a God as you have any victory is possible and assured? Has humanity actually got the upper hand of your God, so that no matter how loyally his people serve him he and they are yet to be defeated? Is that the kind of God whom you are trusting? Is thy God able?

Here is your personal life, with all its struggles and defeats and failures. What is to be the outcome after all? That old habit of yours—are you never to conquer it? That temperamental defect of yours—is it never to be made good? Is thy God able? Do you go into the struggle with the conviction that such a one as he cannot be finally defeated—that because he is on the side of your best life, therefore your best life is assured the final victory?

There are three great texts which speak of the ability of God, which ought to come with great comfort to us in our personal lives. One is the familiar verse in the Hebrews (7:25): "He is able to save to the uttermost all who come unto God by him"—his ability meeting us at the entrance to the Christian life. Then the other Hebrews verse (2:18): "In that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted"—his ability going with us on the way. Then, finally, the verse with which Jude closes his epistle: "Unto him that is able to guard you from stumbling and to set you before the presence of his glory without blemish in exceeding joy"—his ability carrying the work through to completion.

Now, is thy God able at all these points? Is he able to conquer every peculiarity of yours, so that you can enter and follow and complete the Christian life? What is your real hope for final victory? What is your real ground of expecting to come out at the end without blemish? Certainly it can hardly be your own efforts. If not, then is thy God able?

Liquorites Squarely Met and Mightily Trounced

The surprisingly triumphant passage through Congress of the long delayed legislation stopping interstate shipments of liquor to points where state laws prohibit its sale, is the most spectacular victory—and in some respects the most significant one—that temperance sentiment ever obtained in this country. Some weeks ago The Continent reprinted certain warnings which the liquor dealers' agents in Washington had sent out to the trade. In these it was bluntly said that the enactment of this law would be the worst blow which the liquor traffic had yet received in America. By the opinion of their foes, therefore, the temperance forces of the nation are justified in unlimited rejoicing over their victory. They have not only damaged the liquor business at a vital point but must have demoralized the liquor men by beating the most active defense that could be put up on that side when a general alarm was out and everybody scared.

It is in truth an irresistible force which the temperance element of the nation has thus discovered in itself. Nothing ought to seem impossible now to men and women who have accomplished this victory. For it is a sheer, straight triumph of public sentiment over legislative reluctance. The well informed correspondent of The Chicago Tribune, John Callan O'Laughlin, does not hesitate to say that the majority sympathy of congressmen and senators ran with the opposition, but the accumulating popular demand for the law became at length too strong to resist. The outcome carried a certain element of broad farce, for the two houses, which during twenty years had persistently obstructed the measure, made ridiculous haste to obtain the virtuous appearance of willingness when at length the inevitable could be no longer resisted. The house and senate fell into an impromptu race to see which could first make merit of its necessity, the house winning, but the senate finishing only one legislative day behind. Individual members likewise came over to the victorious side with an alacrity not void of amusing features. Conversions at the hour of eleven and three-quarters, however, will be held by temperance people only as trophies of conquest, and credit will go to men like Representatives Webb of North Carolina and Sheppard of Texas—with Senator Kenyon of Iowa—who enlisted for the war when victory was most dubious.

The law awaits, of course, a test in the courts, and enormous effort will be put forth to prove it unconstitutional on the ground that it gives states the right to interrupt interstate commerce, which the constitution puts in the power of the federal government alone. But excellent constitutional lawyers have fully considered this point, and expect to show the courts without difficulty that the federal government resigns no vital power of its own when permitting states to deal by virtue of their reserved police powers with specified shipments within their own borders. If, however, the liquor lawyers should win, it would be a disastrous success for their clients, for a decision invalidating the new law will simply bring on a landslide public demand for prohibiting outright all shipments whatsoever which would carry intoxicants across state lines. Nobody questions the constitutionality of that.

A Miraculous Voice and Its Message

The most remarkable sound today in the world is the voice of Helen Keller. People who imagine it just a matter of curious wonder to hear her utter words fail to understand what the fact of her speaking means. It is not exaggeration for her teacher, formerly Miss Sullivan, now Mrs. Macy, to say that Helen's voice is a miracle. Certainly it is a phenomenon contrary to all human experience, unpredictable by science and unlikely to be repeated—which seems to constitute a sufficient definition of miracle. Till now it has never been known or even imagined that a person who hears no sound and sees no light should utter words comprehensible to hearing ears.

But the marvel of this achievement is not by any means all of the human interest of it. The utterance that comes from her lips—utterance of which she herself realizes nothing but the muscular motions—is, of course, far from perfect vocalization. It has a hollow sound, weird in quality and hauntingly suggestive of hoarse messages passing through thick walls out of the depths of some cavernous prison—as is, indeed, no remote metaphor of the literal fact. The pathos of those slow, struggling, ghostly tones is overwhelming, for every accent bespeaks the straining of a bound soul that can never be fully free.

Yet—here is the wonder greater than the scientific wonder of her speaking at all—the prisoner with the prisoner's voice echoing from the black silences of her prison house, speaks not of doleful things but of joys and hopes and confidences—even thanksgivings. She stops not a moment to dwell on her own limitations, but unwilling to use her gift of speech selfishly employs it to predict and plead for the lifting of limitations from those who in her estimation have never had her chance, or half of what would be a fair chance to anybody. The accusing truth in her voice, which at this point grows tender with feeling despite her inability to modulate its tones, is irresistible as she says: "If you do not see the sorrows of the people who surround you, you are more blind than I."

Miss Keller has gone on the lecture platform as a representative of the Socialist party. The politics of her brief address, however, amounts to little. To socialism as either an economic theory or a party policy she seems indifferent; manifestly it appeals to her only as an expression of fellow feeling with those whose labor in the world is hardest and least remunerated. And the touching spectacle of this eager soul asking sympathy for those whom she deems less fortunate than herself must disseminate, whenever she repeats her message, a mellowing and humanizing influence sorely needed today to melt the icy hardness of commercial calculation.

The Fall of Good Men

Almost every community is shocked from time to time by the breakdown of the character of a man who had been counted reliable. He was a minister or a Sunday school superintendent or a church officer. It is a distressing experience, but not so uncommon. At such times it is well to remember the familiar words of Paul about the two men whom he found within him. Neither one nor the other is entirely the real man. For most of us the good man is the one who appears when we have ourselves in hand, and the worse one appears when we let ourselves go. There is a kind of moral gravity that carries us down, if we are not held back. Peter denied his Lord when he let himself go; he went out and wept bitterly when he got himself in hand again.

When a good man falls, we are appalled. We say, "It shows that he has been bad all the time." So it does. But it does not show that he has not been good all the time also. Indeed, it may show that he has made all the harder fight to keep himself in hand. No one even guesses what it costs some men to keep the worse man within them under control. And when that worse man, in a moment, or through a period of years, is shown to have gained power, it should never be forgotten that the good man was a reality all the while.

We can afford to be very cautious in our charge of hypocrisy. There are doubtless hypocrites, whom our Lord could denounce; but a man is not proved to have been a hypocrite because after a long time of outwardly right living he is proved to have within him a bad man. Every one of us has those two men within himself. By God's grace we generally have ourselves in hand, so that the good man predominates; but most of us have lesser or larger occasions when we let ourselves go, and then the worse man within us asserts himself.

Those who have come near to good men who have fallen know very well that no one suffers in their fall more than themselves. They have known all the while what their peril was; they have made more successful fights than their friends suspect, and they know the meaning of the losing fight. When a good man fails it is the time for all his friends to bring to bear on him whatever influences are in their power to help him get himself in hand again.

—Eucken of Germany and Bergson of France are the preeminent names in philosophy today, and America has in this academic year enjoyed a personal introduction to both, as Professor Eucken has been lecturing at Harvard and Professor Bergson at Columbia. Various people who have different sorts of ears to hear with disagree as to whether these men are or are not teaching religion in their philosophy. But two things are very plain in their influential instruction: They are both against materialism and against the cold intellectual logic which would dispose of religion without giving the affections and aspirations of the soul a chance to be heard. And if teachings along these lines are not in and of themselves religious, they are certainly serviceable to religion in battering down two of the chief obstacles that hinder Christianity from getting at the heart of the twentieth century man. It takes a long time usually for philosophy to filter through from the mind of the university professor to the mind of the man in the street, but it always does penetrate from one to the other finally, if it is genuine philosophy, and eventually the visits of Bergson and Eucken to America will count for the aid of practical church workers laboring for men totally unacademic and unphilosophical.

—The Synod of Kentucky, in connection with the U. S. A. Assembly, is being stirred up on the subject of home missions as it never has been before. Dr. Reynolds of Lexington as chairman of a live campaign committee is crowding hard on the churches of the state a sense of their responsibility for sending into the mountains and other neglected rural districts a vital and enlightening gospel. As a sample of what can be done and ought to be done more widely in the mountains, the committee points to the work of Harvey S. Murdock at Buckhorn, where the Presbyterian church was strengthened last year by eighty-three additions on confession, and where there is maintained a complete school plant, running from kindergarten to high school and including domestic science and manual training, with a hospital, trained nurse and clinic besides.

—A good friend of The Continent in Washington thinks that editorial comment on the inaugural ball as printed in these pages a couple of weeks ago was too severe in implying that such events heretofore have detracted from the dignity of inauguration ceremonies. As a matter of fact, this friend assures us that in times past inaugural balls have not been balls at all. The crowds who attended them jammed the hall so solidly full that there was no room for anybody to dance; and the utmost that could be accomplished was to clear a space for the President, Vice-President and their wives, with the Washington committee, to walk around the floor, so that everybody could look at them. The event has thus turned out to be heretofore nothing much more than a band concert with a promenade.

—The credit of beating in the California legislature the bill to legalize racetrack gambling in that state is allotted by good observers largely to that fighting Canadian, Rev. D. M. Gandier, who for a good many years past has made California a lively tournament ground. When Mr. Gandier enlisted to smash the gamblers' bill practically everybody told him that he had a hopeless case. But two months sufficed to put the hopelessness of the situation on the other side. After all, the kind of champion that Christianity is always needing is somebody who, like Mr. Gandier, does not know a hopeless case when he sees it.

—News of the retirement of Dr. J. Monro Gibson from the pulpit of St. John's Wood Presbyterian church in London revives affectionate memories among Dr. Gibson's American friends who recall his pastorate over Second church in Chicago. Unanimously they wish him a quiet and happy evening hour for his useful life. Dr. Gibson's successor is Rev. Alexander M. MacIver, who has been preaching for five years in the remote islands of the Hebrides. The call to Mr. MacIver seems to prove that a country parish cannot hide a man who has a real message.

—John McNeill, the widely known Scotch evangelist, has made a most prominent start as the pastor of the big Cooke's Presbyterian church in Toronto. The audiences that come to hear him throng the immense sanctuary, and the eloquent and unconventional Scotchman swings them between extremes of tears and laughter quite at his will.

—A new Welsh revival is reported to be aflame in the coal mining country at the South of Wales. Two miners, Stephen Jeffries and John Griffiths, are its leaders, and the signs of religious fervor are said to be as remarkable as those that attended the preaching of Evan Roberts eight years ago.

—When Abdul Baha went to Edinburgh in January our excellent Presbyterian friends, Dr. Whyte and Dr. Kelman, pastors of St. George's, were his hosts. Dr. Kelman said that he and Dr. Whyte understood that Abdul is not trying to proselytize Christians, and they accepted him as a worker for the kingdom of God.

—When one can see no good in his fellow, he is either looking the wrong way, or is in need of an oculist.

—We doubt if Satan really cares how good a man is so long as no one knows it but himself.

DR. JOWETT'S MESSAGE

Rivers of Living Water

"HE THAT BELIEVETH on me, from within him shall flow rivers of living water." The springs of life are found in faith. Vital belief in the Lord Jesus brings the soul into communion with fountains of vitality. "All my springs are in thee." And we cannot have springs without streams. Fountains make rivers. When the divine life possesses the soul it flows over in gracious ministries among our fellow men. The affluence becomes an influence imparting itself to others. "From within shall flow rivers." And what shall be the character of the river?

The life filled with the Spirit of God is a minister of vitality. Wherever the figure of the river is used in the Scriptures it always implies the carriage and the impartation of life. "The river of water of life." "Everything shall live whither the river cometh." Those who are in communion with the Holy Spirit are to be the antagonists of death, and are to convey the life-giving powers of the eternal God.

Bringing Life to Dead Organisms

First of all, they will vitalize dead organizations. There is nothing more burdensome than an organization bereft of life. There is nothing more inert than machinery divorced from energy. The church is cumbered by dead and dormant institutions. Everywhere there is the incubus of institutionalism that has no inherent vitality. Now the disciples of the Lord Jesus are to bring the needful life. Their influence is to be that of a river upon a mill wheel. It changes the inactivity of death into beneficent motion, and things that were only impediments become ministers of progress.

And the disciples of Christ are also to vitalize dead dispositions. Everywhere in human life there are withered and withering things which need to be quickened. In some lives hopes are drooping like spring blossoms that have been nipped by the frost. In other lives desires are fading and are like plants that are suffering from thirst. And again in other lives the affections are ailing, and their strength is lapsing into perilous weakness. If we could only look into the secret places of the souls of men we should be amazed in how many lives there is the touch of death.

Now the friends of the Lord Jesus are to move about among these drooping people like "rivers of water of life." The withered heart is to be thrilled by our presence. The drooping faculty is to lift itself up in new strength by reason of the influence of our lives. We are to be the ministers of a mysterious but most real vitality. There is a significant passage in the book of Job, which always seems to me to lend itself to rich and far-reaching interpretations. "For there is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again and that the tender branch thereof will not cease. Though the root thereof wax old in the earth, and the stock thereof die in the ground, yet through the scent of water it will bud and spring forth boughs like a plant." The old stock withering in the ground scents the presence of the water and is quickened into newness of life. And so is it to be in the life of man. When the river of water of life comes near to souls that are drooping in disquietude and defeat, they are to become alive again and clothe themselves in strength and beauty.

Purifying Sinks of Corruption

But, in the second place, the life filled with the Spirit of God is to be a minister of purity. It is "clear as crystal," and in all its movements it is the enemy of all defilement. I have watched a strong and impetuous stream, born after heavy rains, pouring its fullness into a stagnant pool which had become the home of corruption. In the energy of its presence the corruption was unloosed and carried away, until the pool was left clean and clear as a sea of glass. And such is to be the influence of the disciples of Christ upon the established corruption of our day. The glorious energies of a redeemed life are to be poured into the settled defilement, to stir up and release it and to bear it entirely away.

Imagine a half dozen pure and strenuous moral rivers flowing strongly in every village in our land! Imagine 10,000 such rivers doing their purifying work in a great city! Think of such rivers moving in every human fellowship! I remember a town council which had come into the hands of men of common and questionable character, and the government of the town was becoming debased. And a number of men, in whom the Spirit dwelt mightily, and whose influence was like strong rivers, entered the council and made it clean. Who has not known a committee saved by the strength of one man's consecration? And this is suggestive of the possible influence of every life. If our souls, by faith in the Lord Christ, are in communion with the springs of life, then a river of pure and purifying influence will most assuredly flow in all our common intercourse.

And, thirdly, the life filled with the Spirit of God is a minister of refreshment. There are desert places in the life when the springs seem far away. I got a letter the other day in which my correspondent described what he called "a dry sorrow." The sorrow was so intense that he had lost the power to weep. It was grief that could not find relief in tears. It was "a dry and thirsty land where no water is." And everybody is familiar with such experiences, either in his own life or in the lives of others. Now what is needed in such drought is some refreshing river. The prophet Isaiah declares that the ideal man is like "a river of water in a dry place." He brings refreshment to the soul that is held in perilous dryness. And who is to bring this refreshment? It can only be brought by men and women who live at the springs, and whose very presence is "a river of water of life."

And, lastly, the life filled with the Holy Spirit is a minister of hilarity. What more fitting symbol of gladness can we find than a clear, bright stream, dancing and leaping in the sunshine? Just to look at it, just to listen to it, is to catch the contagion of its joyful movement. And "there is a river the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God." The river that takes its rise in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, that is born among the hills of grace, and flows in the sunshine of the eternal Love, is bound to be a minister of gladness and cheer.

The desponding and the melancholy and those whose faces are heavy with the gloom of fear, are to be heartened and cheered when the disciple of Christ draws near, for the life filled with the Spirit is like a dancing, joy-imparting and beauty-creating stream. How near do we come to this ideal? Perhaps we can give cups of cold water. But is our life richer than this, and is it suggestive of music and dancing? Is there anything hilarious in its influence? Is there the touch of joy, the gladdening ministry of those whose wills are in harmony with the King?

So perhaps instead of singing "Like a mighty army moves the church of God," it might be a healthier expression if we sang, "Like a mighty river moves the church of God"—a river carrying vitality, purity, refreshment and making the birds to sing in the trees that line its banks.

Efficiency in Service

BY JOHN TALLMADGE BERGEN

"EFFICIENT SERVICE," "getting busy," "everlastingly at it"—these are the ringing notes of exhortation that have been published far and wide as the churches entered upon the new year with a week of concerted prayer.

Let every servant of Jesus hear the call and obey, for the Spirit speaks through the mind of the church; but let everyone take heed how he obeys.

We can be of service only as Jesus gives us power. We can give out only as we receive from him. "Service" is a catchy word at the present time. There are scores of young men and women in our great cities who are enlisting in the popular "social service" of the present day. Their intent is to do something for defective or delinquent humanity; their impulse is noble; but they often are following some Christless leader, some sociological propagandist, who is only brushing the clothes of humanity instead of changing its heart.

The gift of eternal life through Jesus is being neglected by many of these modern social service centers, and only the external arrangements of our civilization are offered to dying souls. Let pastors of our city churches be watchful of their young, ardent members. With whom are they linking their lives and efforts in the work of social service?

Do we realize that we lose the young disciple the day that he begins to devote himself to the leadership of any reformer or uplifter who is laboring apart from Christ?

Bring them back! Oh, back again to the prayer meeting! Back to the mission! Back to the knee drill of secret prayer! Back to Jesus' words and the Holy Spirit whom he gives! Lead them, urge them, beseech them to take! take! take! Thus only, Christ-filled, can they do efficient service.

A Parable Picture

IF THE WORDS of our human speech are tools, then we may surely call our Lord a deft workman with the same. In no forms of his public speaking do more of his wonderful grace and power appear than in his parables. In these word pictures he is plainly a master of the art of rapid portraiture. He sketches a scene clear and free, with a brevity of speech that amazes men who stumble and prolong their words in order to clarity of statement. Jesus seemed able to spread an atmosphere over all his scenic descriptions and character sketches. This rare and inimitable quality is the envy of all story tellers. His parables are always as real and plausible as a vital human vocabulary can make them. They rise out of the daily life of men and walk down the roadway close to men's personal experiences. Their lessons are not remote, neither subtle nor evasive; for the most part they are obvious and easily related to matters of moral conduct and character. In this particular parable Jesus uses an Oriental wedding as a fine background of ample detail for the setting up of a moral lesson, teaching the necessity of watchfulness. The details as they move before us are in strict accord with cotemporary social customs and it is interesting briefly to review them.

While the Bridegroom Tarried They Slumbered and Slept
From the painting by Eugene Burnand

The bride on the day of her wedding goes to the home of the groom, where the marriage is to take place in the evening. There she is clad in her wedding garments and jewelry. The women relatives and friends who have joyfully arrayed the bride now sit down with her to spend the day, showering her with compliments and talking of her relatives and her approaching good fortune, partaking all the while of sweetmeats and other refreshments.

At the close of the long day the women find themselves exhausted, and in the early hours of the evening they sleep, waiting the coming of the groom. The groom in the meanwhile has spent the day feasting in the home of a friend. Soon after sunset the masculine friends of the happy man gather. They are dressed appropriately to the festive occasion and propose to spend the evening with the prospective groom and later escort him to his father's home for the marriage. During the evening the young men recite poetry in praise of the two families soon to be connected, and dwell particularly upon the virtues of the groom. Conversation and refreshments fill the hours.

When all have arrived and presented their congratulations, and midnight approaches, the groom intimates his readiness to proceed. Each guest is then given a lighted candle as he steps from the door. Flaming torches are held aloft by special helpers, and the procession winds its way through the crooked, narrow streets or over the sloping hillside to the paternal residence of the groom. Under the starry skies of the Orient this wedding march, with its torches and candles shining in the darkness, illumining the white-clad men, is a spectacle of great interest to the guests and to the community.

Throngs crowd the roadways and peer inquisitively into the faces of the wedding party. The joyful call of the women among the gazing crowds is passed on from one mouth to another, and thus the waiting bride and her maidens are made aware of the distant approach of the groom. All is excitement in the bridal party. The weary company of women arise to set their candles burning at the doorway, and go gayly forth a short distance to meet the groom and his escort of men.

It was at this point in the parable that the foolish virgins discovered their tragic situation. They had lamps, but in view of the fact that oil had not been provided, these lamps were but tantalizing burdens. With great hue and cry the wedding party arrives and enters the home for the wedding and the great feast that follows. The negligent maidens scurry away for oil, but return to find the door locked and the joy of the great occasion lost!

The pious imagination may make many interesting deductions from this parable. It very plainly has to do with the attitude of the disciples of Jesus toward his return, of the form or fashion of which he did not see fit to speak definitely. His followers have found great comfort in the liberty of interpretation permitted by the silence of Jesus on this point. We will seek lessons in which exegesis and the mysteries of eschatology are not involved.

Our Lord evidently is coming again.

He so suggests, his apostles so taught. The church has so held in her official deliverances, and in the body of her faithful membership. Her sacramental service is celebrated after there has been spoken the expectant phrase, "As often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup ye do show forth the Lord's death until he come." How? When? Whence? In a premillennial period of conquest and glory? In the presence of his Holy Spirit, of which the demonstration on Pentecost was a hint? In the personal experience of every saved sinner? In the triumphant death of every saint?

There is Scripture to satisfy men for all these inspiring inferences concerning our Lord's return. While we do not know the time nor place nor manner of his coming, all the more urgent is the parable's explicit lesson to watch.

Sleeping is not the sin for which the virgins should be reprimanded.

Serenity and quiet of soul is good, in fact the only consistent thing that follows the Christian faith. Christ's coming makes men rest in peace. There is to be a triumphant return of our Lord and in the joy and confidence of this expectation we rest in spite of turmoil and moral disorder. Earth cannot mar the equanimity which such hope begets.

It is sleeping when necessary work remains undone that constitutes the regrettable feature in this otherwise happy scene.

Those intrusted with obligation and charged with duty must not sleep till they have prepared to meet the possible exigencies. The virgins that were wise slept as soundly as the foolish. The conditions were favorable to sounder sleep in their case. It was the preparedness for instant working and immediate service likely to be called for on the happy occasion that made the difference in the sleepers. It is not necessarily the ever-wakeful, fussy, high-tensioned worker that gets largest results. The worker who sets everything in order to the best of his human ability, and pending the emergent moment rests, is the worker whose dependable efficiency helps most the kingdom of God, and one whom his Lord will find ready whenever and however he comes.

The lamps and wicks and general wedding paraphernalia were the same for wise and foolish.

The outward equipment was the same. The lamps were burnished and trimmed, and in possession of all, but the surprising difference, discovered too late, lay in the lack of the illuminant, the want of which made lamps mere mockery in the darkness.

People of great natural gifts, with knowledge and money and social influence, great accessories for a shining life, often are like the virgins with burnished lamps and no oil. The human gifts and powers lose brilliancy when the heart is dead. No pure light ever shines through the faculties and capacities of men till there is lighted within that holy fire of devotion to God and men that made Jesus "the Light of the world."

The Way One Church Does Business

BY OTIS GRANT DALE

> Management of the finances of a church is not usually on the plane of efficiency attained by the accounting departments of business enterprises. Operation of a church with the usual subordinate organizations is, however, a business of no mean proportions. This account of a church which has made giving a pleasure will attract the attention of all trustees. Perhaps your church can adopt a similar unified budget plan. Members of sessions will be interested in the idea that a church paper be sent to all subscribers to benevolences.

IT WAS THE night for the regular meeting of the trustees. At 7:30 sharp the seventh trustee entered the pastor's office at the church; one other trustee was reported out of the city, one had telephoned to the pastor two minutes before that a business engagement would detain him for half an hour. With the seven present out of a total of nine, the chairman told one joke and called the meeting to order. After prayer by the pastor the minutes of the last meeting were read and approved. The secretary reported the following bills, each bearing the O. K. and signature of the person, or officer of the organization, that contracted it: For Sunday school supplies, last quarter, $57.25; for minor repairs about the church building, O. K.'d by the property committee, $54.75; for ice cream and two cakes used by the aid society at a church social, $5.85; for flowers sent to the sick by the missionary society, $3; flowers sent to the sick by the Christian Endeavor society, 75 cents; printing advertising cards, $3; printing communion tokens, $2.50. After brief consideration these were all allowed and ordered paid. At the suggestion of the pastor a committee of two was appointed to review all the bills of expense for the past nine months, also to examine into the way in which the subscriptions were being paid, to find if it were possible or necessary to economize further in any branch of the work. The financial secretary was asked for a report on the present state of the treasury. He reported all current bills, including salaries, fuel, light and the monthly payment to the building and loan association on the manse, paid to date, and $125 in bank. The chairman told one more good joke and the meeting adjourned at 8:30 p. m.

What the Situation Was to Begin With

This meeting was held three months ago. It is now past the end of the fiscal year and the books are closed for the year. In order to understand the meaning of some things reported in this sample trustee meeting it must be explained that this is our first year's trial of what we call our "strictly business system" of church finance, of the "double budget system" thoroughly applied. To fully exhibit the results of the system it will be necessary to refer to the previous year's experience. During that period the congregation raised by all means, including some envelope subscriptions, special collections, suppers, "pay socials," etc., for current expenses $2,098 and for benevolences $173, and near the close of the year had a man employed to take special subscriptions in order to escape a threatened deficit of several hundred dollars. Besides, various and sundry bills were unpaid, some nearly two years old.

In view of this condition a joint meeting of trustees and elders decided to make a radical change in our financial system. The double budget system, with weekly duplex pay envelopes, was adopted and applied to the entire congregation, Sunday school, Endeavor society, aid and missionary societies. All treasuries were abolished except the treasury of the congregation for current expenses, and the treasury of benevolences. (This after approval of these organizations.) Every member of the church and every member of each auxiliary organization was asked for a definite subscription for current expenses and for benevolences. The response was good. Although our communicant roll was only 203, the financial secretary had personal accounts with 235 persons.

Standing rules were adopted by the congregation which contained the following sections: "All bills of expense incurred by auxiliary organizations shall be O. K.'d by the proper officers and transmitted to the secretary of the board of trustees within fifteen days of the time they were incurred. All regular expenses of the congregation and of all auxiliary organizations, together with all regular benevolences, having been provided for in the annual budget, no person or organization shall solicit subscriptions or raise money by any direct or indirect method among the members of the congregation, for any purpose, except by special permission of the session." These articles were strictly adhered to; not a cent was asked or received from any person outside the congregation, or from the general public in any direct or indirect way during the year.

It was also decided that hereafter all bills should be paid within thirty days if it required borrowing money at the bank to do it. It was thought as necessary for a church to maintain good credit as for any business house to do so.

But it was not necessary to borrow money; notwithstanding the necessity of paying some old bills, making considerable repairs upon the building, long negected, and increasing the pastor's salary to a figure $500 above that ever paid before, there was not a month during the year, not even in summer, when there was not sufficient money to the church's credit in the bank to pay all bills. The balance sheet for the year shows $3,391 expended for current expenses and $127.50 in bank. Besides this, $530 was contributed to benevolence, making a total for all purposes of $4,048 against $2,271 the previous year.

Advantages of Unified Budget System

Our experience has taught us the advantages of a unified budget system as follows:

1. When persons are asked to make one definite subscription to all objects, knowing there are no other collections, offerings, or specials of any kind for a year, they subscribe intelligently and liberally, and prefer the straightforward businesslike way. No special offering was taken, no appeal from the pulpit for money for any purpose was made during the entire year, with the above result. The nearest exception to this was on March 10, when at the close of his sermon the pastor called attention to the day as one named by the President for gathering China famine funds and announced that anyone desiring to give might hand the money to the treasurer of benevolences after service. As a result of this mere announcement we sent $56 to China. This ready response was due to the absence of any "holdups" during an entire year.

2. There is great advantage in having one financial directorate. The trustees know where every cent comes from and where it goes. This is simply business. The old method of many treasuries is practiced by no other institution on earth. It is little wonder that many church trustee bodies take little interest in their duties and fail. They have no way to get any intelligent grasp of their problem when they have half a dozen auxiliaries in the church over which they have no control, in sharp competition with them for the money of the same people to whom they must look for subscriptions Our trustees have taken a lively, intelligent, business interest in the whole church, and every one of their meetings has been a model of business methods.

3. The system takes care of the benevolences in fine fashion. From the total collected we first deduct 10 per cent for an emergency fund to be dispensed by the session toward special calls. Some of this goes to the poor, some to the university pastor, some to Anti-Saloon League. Next the women's missionary society's pledge to the presbyterial society is paid. The balance is divided among the boards on the basis suggested by the Assembly. Our increase this year, without the slightest special effort, was over 200 per cent.

How The Continent Reaches This Church

As a part of the system, sowing seeds for future harvest, the session sends The Assembly Herald to every person or family that gives 10 cents per week to the benevolent budget, simply deducting the cost from the total of the subscription. By this method we put in fifty copies where we had none; and the plan worked so well last year that now we have added The Continent and The Herald and Presbyter, giving a choice of the two weeklies when the subscription reaches 35 cents. This is giving us the largest subscription list to Presbyterian weeklies in the history of the church, and no one is put to any trouble in the matter.

4. The advantages are by no means all material. We have had a quiet but steady revival of interest in things spiritual. The midweek service has increased threefold in average attendance. The congregation has achieved the self-respect that a man always has when he can pay his bills without begging his neighbors to help. And the increasing respect of the public is shown by steadily increasing audiences. Through the blessing of God upon strictly business methods our church has marked a new era in its life and work.

The "Holy War": An Exploded Bugaboo

BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS, Editor Afield of The Continent

"A HOLY WAR" is a phrase which seems never to lose its charm, despite its shopworn character. More or less definitely it calls up visions of clashing Bedouins hastening out of the desert, of chivalrous Saladins, of white-turbaned fanatics on beautiful Arabian steeds, of zealous crusaders and of an imperiled Christendom. The possibility of the green flag of the prophet—that mysteriously potent emblem which can be seen from the remotest sands of Sahara or Arabia—being lifted by the sultan of Turkey, who is caliph of all Moslems, gives exciting thrills to the romantically inclined. That same green flag is one of the few vestiges left to this material age of "the brave days of old," when Frank fought Turk in the contest of the cross with the crescent.

Like many other of the vague and glamourful conceptions of the Orient, this one is rather dissipated by close scrutiny. The "odors of the East" really may not be talked about definitely in polite society. The beauties of the harem are oftener than not sallow-faced devotees of the cigarette. The minarets which loom so artistically on the skyline are frequently cracked and patched and otherwise in disrepair. The bazars are dirty and without any display of rich stuffs; all of Damascus cannot show as much of beauty and novelty as a single American department store. The caravansaries of the East are absolutely bare rooms, entirely too close to the animals which share the same roof, and the European traveler frequently is reminded of the need for a plentiful supply of Keating's powder. While "the East is the East," not a little of its allurement is due to western imagination and literature; as "The Bedouin Love Song" really represents the ideals of Bayard Taylor's Kennett square, and not of Arabia.

Looked into carefully, a holy war, as a practicable possibility, crumbles into nothingness. At least, careful investigation reveals that phrase no longer holds the ancient dread meaning which attached to it when the Moslem tribesmen threatened to overrun all of Europe. The whole science of war has changed since them. Society is differently organized. The machine gun has supplanted the horseman's sword and spear. The desperate courage of the fanatical and the shrinking cowardice of impressed legions are equally good targets for rapid-fire artillery. Armies must be met by armies, and there is now no Islamic army on earth, since the Christians were conscripted into the Turkish regiments. The wild and ignorant Bedouins are not an army; they could not even subsist long enough to reach Europe, had they the requisite ships. Any war with civilization must, nolens volens, be equipped with the resources of civilization, including a commissariat and a hospital corps.

It is perfectly clear that, despite all Moslem imaginings to the contrary, a general holy war is out of the question. That is not theory but history. There never has been, since Constantinople was conquered in 1453, such abundant provocation for the bringing out of the green flag and the proclamation of a jehad as have existed within a twelvemonth. Yet here is the caliph on his knees before the little Christian powers which once he ruled with contempt and oppression.

In truth, a holy war actually was proclaimed during the recent fighting. This fact and its immense significance have been rather lost sight of during the rush of military actions in the Balkan peninsula. Every newspaper reader will recall that, when the Turks were fleeing in rout before the Bulgarians and striving to make a last stand at Tchatalja, the sheik-ul-Islam, whose official function it is to be the voice of the caliph in proclaiming a holy war, did try to rally the broken spirits of the Islamic hosts by the issuance of a jehad, the last and most formidable weapon of Turkey. Mullahs were sent into the ranks of the dispirited soldiers to preach this most sacred command of the prophet's successor. The telegraph carried the news around the world. This was the tidings which Christendom had feared for centuries. Unsheathed now was the sword which had made the sultan formidable in the eyes of European diplomacy Myriads of persons watched aghast for a deluge of blood in all the parts of the earth where Islam and Christianity impinge.

But instead of high tragedy there followed opera bouffe. The anticlimax was ludicrous. So greatly have times changed that the powers which once trembled before the green flag straightway sent their ambassadors to the sublime porte to chide the sultan for daring to invoke religious fanaticism at such a time. Nothing could have more completely revealed the broken power of the caliph than this countermanding of his most solemn word by the representatives of despised Christian powers! Abjectly, the sheik-ul-Islam was obliged to issue a counter proclamation, within twenty-four hours, declaring that his jehad was not really a jehad, and that, anyhow, he withdrew it! Did any successor of Mohammed ever have to eat such a mouthful of dirt as this?

Thanks to the march of the centuries, the holy war bugaboo may now take its place in the chamber of used-to-bes, along with last year's birds' nests. It is as dead as a rusted and returned-to-dust door nail. It is "all feenish," as the pidgin English has it. The sword of the prophet has rusted to nothingness in its scabbard. The green flag of Islam is less potent today than the green flag of Ireland. Once a real "holy terror"—if I may descend to slang upon such a serious theme—the holy war is now not even a "holy show." Christendom has almost as much reason to fear an Assyrian invasion as it has to dread an armed onslaught by Islam. The Koran and the calendar have met; and the calendar has conquered.

Voters Fear to Be "Squeezed"

In America there are feeble-hearted citizens who abstain from voting or from allowing their names to get upon the poll lists for fear of being called to do jury service—a "dodge" which does not always succeed. In the new Chinese republic moderate property or educational requirements must be possessed by voters, and old experiences with rapacious tax gatherers made men reluctant to admit any ownership of wealth, and this fact has operated to keep qualified voters from coming forward. But a correspondent of The North China Herald in Szechuan sees signs of better things. He says:

"Public spirit is evidently gaining ground around us, though at present it is among a comparatively small number. The tide of interest in the parliamentary election is gradually rising. Yards upon yards of paper with names of eligible voters are now adorning the city gates and public offices. There is hesitation in claiming the vote on the part of many men who are afraid to make known their property qualifications, lest it should mean more 'squeeze' or taxation."

Abraham Lincoln and Liquor

BY DUNCAN C. MILNER

FRIENDS OF THE liquor traffic have gone to great pains to try to prove that Abraham Lincoln not only was a liquor seller but was also a drinker and an enemy of prohibition. As to his personal habits, we have not only his own statements and his refusing to furnish liquor when the committee notified him of his nomination but the testimony of lifelong and intimate friends as to his abstinence.

I wrote to John Hay, Lincoln's secretary and biographer, as to the charge that Mr. Lincoln drank and he replied: "Mr. Lincoln was a man of extremely temperate habits. He made no use of whisky or tobacco during all the years I knew him." The genuineness of this letter was challenged by the liquor league in one of their publications. I have the original in my possession, a copy of which is here shown.

Senator Cullom, who was an intimate friend, says: "Lincoln never drank, smoked, chewed tobacco or swore."

In an exciting campaign in Atlanta, Georgia, over local option the liquor men in trying to influence the negroes who were then allowed to vote issued a circular picturing Lincoln striking the chains from a slave and printing as Mr. Lincoln's words: "Prohibition will work great injury to the cause of temperance. . . . A prohibitory law strikes a blow at the very principles on which our government was founded." This has been repeated in many campaigns even as late as the past year. I wrote to John G. Nicolay, one of Mr. Lincoln's private secretaries and associated with Mr. Hay in the preparation of his great biography. He replied: "I am satisfied that the question of legal prohibition was never in Lincoln's whole career anywhere an issue on which he expressed an opinion." Mr. Nicolay, who spent years in gathering Mr. Lincoln's papers, speeches and writings of every kind, also says: "In all this vast collection there is nowhere any speech, letter or document or reported conversation by him on the subject of prohibition." Mr. Lincoln signed the bill prohibiting the liquor ration in the navy and also an act of Congress forbidding any person in the District of Columbia "to sell, give or administer to any soldier or volunteer in the service of the United States . . . any spirituous liquor or intoxicating drink."

Dear Sir

Mr. Lincoln was a man of extremely temperate habits. He made no use of either whisky or tobacco, during all the years that I knew him.

Yours very truly

Lincoln's Personal Habits—A Statement by His Secretary and Biographer

Mr. Lincoln not only signed the Washingtonian pledge of total abstinence but he made many speeches in the campaign called by that name. In his noted speech made on Washington's birthday, 1842, in Second Presbyterian church of Springfield, Illinois, he remarked: "Whether or not the world would be vastly benefited by a total and final banishment from it of all intoxicating drinks seems to me not an open question."

THE WAYFARER

THE MOUNTAIN goes to Mohammed nowadays; the world comes to the doors of the stay-at-home American. Of things curious and strange there may be little for the next generation to marvel over, since the camera, with color photography, the moving-picture machine, the phonograph and the printing press have laid earth's remotest corners under tribute to the eye and ear of twentieth century civilization. In certain particulars the Japanese exposition in London two years ago better represented Japan than a hurried tourist trip through the beautiful island empire. Now even the mission field is being robbed of its remoteness and strangeness by the modern scheme of carrying the world around America on exhibition, so that what was "The Orient in London" has become "The World in Boston," "The World in Cincinnati," "The World in Baltimore" and next "The World in Chicago."

World's Tour in Sixty Minutes

As there are fashions in hats, so there are also fashions in ideas. The day's vogue is "worldism." It is the thing to be interested in international topics. "World" is a word of magic today, a wand to conjure with and to conquer with.

* * * * *

The idea of creating a world exposition of missions is big and modern. It is one tangible evidence that the church is thinking of her task in great terms. New methods for the new times is the present program. Here is a plan for missionary education by the wholesale, and through the modern mediums of dramatic representation, or actual reproductions of mission surroundings, by costumed speakers. "The World in Baltimore"—for it was in that progressive city of audacious spirit that the Wayfarer was introduced to this innovation—is admirably calculated to arrest a city's attention, and to impart its teaching to a multitude of persons who would not otherwise come within the scope of the missionary message.

* * * * *

There are three distinct phases to this novel exhibit. One is the exposition proper. This is a series of booths or sections, in a large building, wherein scenes from mission lands are reproduced. The effort here is to convey through the eye some conception of what the natives look like and how they live. Volunteer helpers, or stewards, wear the native costume and explain the curios. Hourly lectures are given by returned missionaries. A visit to this exposition is like taking the whole world in tabloid form. The Chinese pagoda is in sight from the Eskimo village, and Arabia is around the corner from Japan. The Persian house, with its beautiful rugs, is within sound of the tomtom of the African village. Is it any wonder that the children throng to this alluring spectacle? The educational value of the exposition is officially recognized by public school officials, for it really does make the far seem near.

* * * * *

As an aside, it is the Wayfarer's opinion that the education in missions which the stewards receive through their preliminary training—thousands of young people set to studying mission textbooks for months—was perhaps the most valuable and definite single result of "The World in Baltimore."

* * * * *

The crown of all is the "Pageant of Darkness and Light." This is daring, for it is nothing less than a return to the church's ancient use of the stage as a teaching medium. Hidden behind the innocuous name of "pageant" is a real theatrical representation—with scenery, spotlight, costumes and all the usual paraphernalia of the stage. This is written in praise and not in condemnation; and the Wayfarer shares the widespread gratification that in this country the pageant has encountered practically no opposition on the ground that it is "play-acting." All the appliances of dramatic art, stage management and operatic music have been utilized to make vivid four episodes in the history of missions. Only thus could they be made real to the ordinary person. The greatness of the wonders wrought by the gospel call for all the forms of expression possessed by humanity in order to represent them with any degree of adequateness. The advent of the medical missionary in the north country; the finding of Livingstone by Stanley; the abolition of suttee in India, and the breaking of the dread power of the goddess Pele in Hawaii—these are missionary scenes worthy of a Shakespeare's art. The triumphant processional with which the pageant ends; the massing of the nations about the cross; the waving of the golden palms of victory in the hands of little children, the hallelujah chorus; and the—

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow"

by the actors and the audience, are a real triumph of dramatic skill.

Only such a big thing could impress a big city in a big way. This thing is not done in a corner. It is no mere sideshow of the churches, to be mentioned patronizingly among the religious notices. The whole city talks about it. Thousands of visitors from neighboring towns and cities make long journeys to see it. The world becomes the vogue, to the enhancing of men's respect for the church as well as to the enlightenment of their minds concerning the church's mission. And nothing that exalts the church and her work and her Lord can be too "advanced" for the taste of

BRADFORD HORTON, MAN

BY RICHARD S. HOLMES

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS—Bradford Horton is working his way through Prestonbury Theological Seminary. A fellow student, Austin Sleighton, becomes his loyal friend; but Oren-Toole, a jealous fellow bank employee, attempts to involve him in a money theft, using as his tool an old beggar, Andrew Drum, who proves to be Horton's own father. Miss Elmore, daughter of the bank's president, to whom Horton is greatly attracted, believes in his innocence, which is finally proved. Oren-Toole and Drum, however, are incriminated. Drum dies before his trial, and Horton begs that the case against Oren-Toole be dropped. This angers Mr. Elmore, and he writes Horton a note which causes him to resign from the bank and to give up his position as tutor to Mr. Elmore's grandson. Mr. Elmore still believes Horton an impostor. Sleighton tries to persuade him to clear himself. This Horton refuses to do because of a last promise to Drum that he would not reveal the latter's identity as the man of whom, in his youth, Prestonbury had prophesied ill, and whose marriage was opposed by his bride's family. Horton, because of the president's hostility, declines the cashier's invitation to return to the bank. Finally Mr. Elmore, realizing the need of the young man's assistance and admitting to himself that his prejudice is due solely to the fact that he fears his daughter may succumb to Horton's manifold attractions, decides to apologize for his note and offer Horton the position of teller. Horton, accepting the apology, declines the position, also a handsome offer to sing in a New York City church. A note from Miss Elmore, however, changes his decision, and he not only goes back to the bank but again becomes tutor for Charlie Elmore. The Elmores soon leave for prolonged travel abroad, and Horton, invited by Charlie's mother to make his home with her, concludes to do so.

CHAPTER XVI.

A DAUGHTER'S REPROACHES

THE ELMORES were in Japan—old Japan, new Japan, curio shop of the world; nation young, alert, ambitious to know the things known by the great world; open-eyed, open-eared to the sights and sounds visible and audible to seeing, hearing nations. She had not yet taught China how strong she was, though small; had not yet told the Russian bear he could not at will trample down every right of Asia; had not yet become overlord of Korea. It was not yet even the Japan of the little brown man striving to stretch himself to the measure of a statesman. It was still the Japan of the little brown child, but destined to be at some day one of the mighty forces of the earth.

When the Elmores entered Yokohama some twenty years had passed since Commodore Perry had performed his world-famous deed. Americans had not yet been drawn thither in great numbers. True, America had opened the door of the old empire; but the feet of the throng that first entered the portal were European, and for the major part British. The arrival of three such Americans as the Elmores, with their cards of introduction to diplomatic circles, was an event for the world of foreign social life in Yokohama, and Eleanor found herself almost at once the center of attraction for young British officers, ambassadorial men and untitled tourists. They were a high-bred, polite company, and the vivacious spirit of the girl soon felt a larger zest in life than she had ever known before. She was discovering what her shielded life in a provincial city had only hinted to her, that she possessed an almost unlimited power to attract.

The gold lace and the buttons, the swords and the sashes, really thought that they were making a conquest of the handsome American girl with the glorious eyes and bewitching hair, but no one of them ever received the opportunity to prove it. Many an enamored swain found the fabric of his vision baseless, when he dreamed of a quiet corner with her alone, or of a walk on the veranda, or of a tour among the shops. She outclassed them all, and played a tantalizing game of battledore and shuttlecock with their hopes.

Among them was a Scotchman, whose home was beside the North sea. He was tall, blue-eyed, well built, with sweet voice and pure diction, a university man, who never tired of talking about that strange new American institution, a college for women. With him Eleanor was well pleased.

"Can girls learn science, now? Can they learn astronomy and philosophy? Tell me that! Do they ever marry? Tell me that!"

And Eleanor answered with a mixture of earnestness and banter that delighted him. His name was Malcolm Stuart. Asked once if his name ran back to the royal Stuarts, he answered, "Yes, I suppose. I'm not particularly proud of that, but it's a good name, a very good name."

"It is a great thing to have a name, Mr. Stuart," answered Mr. Elmore. "There are men in our country who do not know what their names are."

Like a flash Eleanor spoke. "But we do not know any such, Mr. Stuart; not any." Her father, comprehending her meaning, frowned.

An obsession is doubly unfortunate when it so possesses a man as to make him unfair, ungenerous, unkind. Mr. Elmore would have resented the idea that the battle between Bradford Horton and William Drum in his brain was hardening his finer sensibilities. Yet the edge of his mortification at having been forced into advances to this low-born student constantly irritated his better nature, and the breadth of the Pacific had not brought him forgetfulness.

Mr. Stuart left Yokohama in advance of the Elmores, but took with him vivid memories of the fascination of the bright American girl. He remembered also that in all their interviews he had not once been alone with her. Some of the other young men had noticed the same thing in their own cases.

Eleanor had a happy time in Yokohama. She made the acquaintance of an English girl who had been resident in Japan for some years, from whom she took her cue as to what she might and might not do. They put on the Japanese dress and the rickshaw men took them far and wide in the city. Laughter and gayety were unending, and the college girl seemed to have been transformed into a butterfly.

All this troubled Mrs. Elmore. She remonstrated, but the daughter answered, "I'm all right, mommsy. Miss Chisholm knows."

At length the mother went to her husband. "Richard," she complained, "our girl troubles me. I never acted so."

"You never had the chance; but such as you had you took."

"But I was at home, Richard, and out here these English will talk."

"No, mother, no. The English girl knows what she can do here outside the lines of conventionality. Don't trouble. Just be thankful that William Drum is out of our way forever."

"Why, what has he to do with it?" asked Mrs. Elmore blankly. "I never saw you hang on to an idea so long, Richard. Eleanor never gave him a second thought."

"Why does she sing that song, then—that first Sunday song, you know?"

"She's always been fond of that, and you know how a song sticks in the memory. It's Stuart she's thinking of, not Drum, Richard, and I don't relish that, either—England's too far away."

"Hm-m," mused Mr. Elmore thoughtfully. "Stuart, eh?" He did not look displeased.

* * * * *

Turning northward to Nikko, Eleanor and her father one day came suddenly face to face with the man who she thought had gone below her horizon forever. He was with a group of Englishmen, but promptly abandoned his companions as he saw the girl. "May I have the pleasure of renewing my acquaintance?" he asked.

"Why, yes," answered Eleanor. "But you should not leave your friends for us. We are only Americans."

"If you will permit, I shall enjoy being with 'only Americans' for a little while," he replied. "They are only Englishmen, you know."

THE HOME COUNCIL

Edith's Every-Day Book

BY N. M. HOWE

ONE DAY LAST fall we were brought face to face with a problem. Edith, who is 7 and active, was ordered to take a rest cure and remain out of school, as the family physician had diagnosed an early case of tuberculosis. Since she was high strung and nervous, discipline was no small item in the daily situation. Finally we hit upon the idea of "Edith's every-day book," and it proved to be a great help.

When other children brought home monthly report cards we had our daybook to show to father. We used two pieces of white bristol board, fifteen inches long and nine wide, for covers. From the cover of a weekly magazine we cut a fine Santa Claus and pasted him on one of the bristol boards. Beneath the picture we printed with some left-over gilt paint "1913"; above the picture, in one corner, "Edith's Every-Day Book." At the top of each of twelve sheets of paper we wrote the name of the month and below the number of days, leaving a small margin at the foot of the page for comments, or memorandums.

For 10 cents we bought gold stars (such as are used on tally cards or Christmas packages). At the close of every good day Edith pasted a star beside that date. On bad days—and at first there were many—she had to make the old-fashioned zero, in black ink, instead of placing the star.

We held together the covers of the book and record with red ribbon laced through holes punched an inch from the margin of the book.

Such a definite record of her good and bad days did a great deal toward helping Edith to master a natural willfulness which had been increased by her illness.

In Case of Fire

Of only secondary importance to knowledge of how to avoid fires is knowledge of what to do when fire breaks out. Most dwelling house fires occur in the daytime, when household activities that have to do with heat are going on.

The very first thing to do on discovering a fire, says McCall's, is to shut off the draft—close windows and doors and shut the fire up in one place. At the same time call someone else to send in an alarm, and do what you can to fight the fire. Smother it with blankets, wet ashes, sand, or water, or attack it with extinguishers if they are at hand.

"THE QUESTION"

Were the whole world good as you—not an atom better—
Were it just as pure and true,
Just as pure and true as you;
Just as strong in faith and works;
Just as free from crafty quirks;
All extortion, all deceit;
Schemes its neighbors to defeat;
Schemes its neighbors to defraud;
Schemes some culprit to applaud—
Would this world be better?

If this whole world followed you—followed to the letter—
Would it be a nobler world,
All deceit and falsehood hurled
From it altogether;
Malice, selfishness and lust
Banished from beneath the crust
Covering hearts from view—
Tell me, if it followed you,
Would the world be better?

—The British Weekly.

If the fire is too big for your control, get away from it after shutting it up as far as possible, and devote your time to summoning assistance. Get everyone in the house below the fire at once. Don't pass the flames or you may cut off your escape. Don't go back for anything after you are safely out.

If you have to fight fire in light clothing, protect yourself with a heavy rug or coat. Dash cold water on your hair. Get the fire on the floor as quickly as possible, so that it may be smothered or soaked with water. Children should be taught to roll on the floor if their clothing catches fire, and, if possible, to wrap themselves in a rug. Teach them not to remain standing, as fire works up, and never to run in burning clothing.

Remember to protect the face by throwing arms across it if the clothing catches fire. Otherwise the flames, in shooting up, will be breathed in through the mouth and nostrils, and suffocation will result.

If you are caught on the second floor, and smoke or flames make the stairway impossible, make for the nearest window, shutting every door behind you. Smoke ascends, therefore keep close to the floor.

One or more fire pails of ten-quart capacity, painted red and labeled "Fire," should be kept filled on the second floor of every home, near the head of the stairs. It is better to wet a broom in the pail and with it attack the flames, than to throw the water itself. This necessitates keeping a broom on the second floor.

For certain kinds of fire water should not be used. In case of a chimney fire water cracks the heated bricks and gives the fire a chance to penetrate the floors. Salt or sand thrown down a flue or from the roof is better.

Sand or bicarbonate of soda should be used to smother grease, oil, paint, gasoline or tar fires.

Never move an oil stove if it takes fire. Surround it with wet cloths or wet ashes and let it burn itself out, thus avoiding possible explosion of kerosene gas in bowl of oil receptacle.

Water is a conductor of electricity and should not be used on fire resulting from burned out insulation. Turn off current and use sand, pyrene or a dry powder extinguisher.

Cover a burning waste basket with carpet and throw out of the window.

Always investigate suspicious smoke.

A card with simple directions regarding what to do in case of fire should be kept in a conspicuous place; and once in so often there should be a family fire drill.

BITS BY THE WAY

THE "DO-OVER" CHEAT

Do you carefully examine your canned goods before opening them? If not, some day you may find yourself a victim of the "do-over" cheat.

The "do-over" is a reprocessed can of spoiled fruit or vegetables. In its original state it was, in the parlance of the trade, a "swell," says The New York Tribune. Owing to some mistake in the process of canning, or the condition of the product when canned, it has fermented and swelled, causing the end of the can to bulge out. If this end is pressed in with the finger and the other promptly bulges out the can is unfailingly a "swell." The honest grocer, when he finds cans showing this symptom, promptly sends them back to the packer. Then follows the doing over. A hole is punched in the side of the can to let out the gas, and when this has escaped the hole is filled with lead. The can is subjected to boiling, and finished with a new label. The contents, of course, are not improved.

When buying a can it is well to run the finger down the side to be sure there are no lead-filled holes. But since they cannot always be distinguished from the seam of the can, near which they are purposely placed, an even better way is to look for the packer's name—not the brand name, which means absolutely nothing, but the name of the man who put up the goods. If he is proud of his product, his name is pretty sure to be there. But if he has any reason to think it may give ptomaine poisoning, he very often modestly hides behind some high-sounding brand name.

No reputable grocer will handle the "do-over," and its last resort is the bargain sale, where the housewife will do well to be careful. Not that there are not real bargains in canned goods, for the wholesalers like to get rid of any stock they have on hand before it becomes second season goods, which the trade will not buy. Properly canned goods are perfectly satisfactory the second year. The third year they begin to swell and the fourth year they are uneatable. No can which shows the slightest sign of swelling should ever be used.

The food and drug laws have regulated the amount of preservative the packer can use, and without benzoate of soda spoiled goods will most certainly swell and come back on his hands.

The can should be carefully opened with a sharp can opener and the entire top removed. This removing of the entire top gives a better chance to looked for plugged-up holes on the inside of the can. The contents of the can should be at once poured out, as the action of the air on the lacquer on the inside produces a chemical change, which may likely result in ptomaine poisoning. But the contents should not be covered. They should be allowed for at least half an hour to get back from the air some of the oxygen they have lost in the canning process.

WASHINGTON THE HUMAN

Though George Washington was esteemed by many as austere and unapproachable, there was seldom a time that winsome Nellie Custis could not force a smile from him. It was necessary for her to stand on tiptoe, we are told, to whisper in his ear, and holding affectionately to the button of his coat she in this way poured out to him the little joys and tragedies of her young life. Sometimes it was to coax him into allowing her to go to a ball, or again it was to confide blushingly some little romance, but most often it was to beg for a new gown or gay ribbon, and of these requests there was never a refusal.

Washington Irving (at least Edith Tunis Sale in "Old-Time Belles and Cavaliers" credits the anecdote to him) illustrates very aptly the relationship that existed between Nellie Custis and her grandparents. "She was romantic," the paragraph reads, "and fond of wandering in the moonlight alone in the woods. Mrs. Washington thought this unsafe, and forced from her a promise that she would not visit the woods again unaccompanied, but she was brought one evening into the drawing room where her grandmother, seated in her armchair, began, in the presence of the general, a severe reproof. Poor Nellie was reminded of her promise and taxed with her delinquency. She admitted her fault and essayed no excuse, moving to retire from the room. She was just closing the door when she overheard Washington attempting in a low voice to intercede in her behalf. 'My dear,' he observed, 'I would say no more—perhaps she was not alone.'

"His intercession stopped Miss Nellie in her retreat. She reopened the door and advanced up to the general with a firm step. 'Sir,' said she, 'you brought me up to speak the truth, and when I told grandmamma I was alone, I hope you will believe I was alone.'

"Washington made one of his most magnanimous bows. 'My child,' he replied, 'I beg your pardon.' "

TROUSERS IN HEAVEN

One of our very small Young Americans believes that the Bible commands him to "Lay up for yourself trousers in heaven." This puzzles him, because he knows angels don't wear trousers—at least, they don't in the pictures he has seen.

His mother says it is not at all unlikely that he also believes that "where your trousers are, there will your heart be also." S. C. R.

YOUNG AMERICA

When Trowbridge Was a Boy

BY FRED MYRON COLBY

HAVE YOU EVER read "Cudjo's Cave" or "Jack Hazard and His Fortunes," or any others of the books John T. Trowbridge wrote for young people? You have? Then perhaps you will like to know something about Trowbridge when he himself was young.

Northern New York in those days—1827—was almost a wilderness. The houses were all log cabins, and neighbors lived at long distances from each other. Toys and playthings were few, but the children of the pioneers made their own playthings and enjoyed themselves in many ways that young people of today know nothing of.

Trowbridge's whole boyhood was passed in a log cabin twenty feet square. There was but one room on the ground floor, and this answered for kitchen and parlor, and also for the sleeping room of the older members of the family. The children slept in the attic, which was reached by a ladder. On one side of the cabin and opening into it was a "lean-to" of one room, in which Father Trowbridge kept a great oaken chest and two or three other valuable pieces of furniture which he had brought from the old New England home. These were for a long time objects of great interest to John and the other youngsters of the family, especially the chest, which they imagined was either filled with pirate gold or else held the wardrobe of an Indian chief.

In the summer young John and his brothers helped their father cut down the forests and till the land. The country was a wilderness and great crops were raised on the cleared acres. Corn and oats and barley were grown, and pumpkins, squash and potatoes were raised in immense quantities.

In the winter time there were paths to be shoveled and the barn chores to do. Mornings when they awoke the children often found small snowdrifts on their beds. At night, after they had popped corn in the huge stone fireplace, and eaten apples, and listened to stories of Indians and adventures with cougars and bears, the boys generally took a run, barefooted, in the snow, the last thing before going to bed, to keep their feet warm through the cold night.

One of the important things that fell to John to do was to keep the great fire going in the fireplace. It was never allowed to go out except by accident. Of course this meant considerable labor in the winter time, for the fireplace held nearly an eighth of a cord of wood, and it required hourly attention. In the summer time after the forenoon's cooking the fire was allowed to go down and the coals were covered with ashes. Occasionally, not often, the fire would go out altogether, and then it had to be rekindled by a light obtained from flint and steel, or else John borrowed a live coal from a neighbor's fireplace. More than one journey of this kind John made in his boyhood, until he was relieved by the invention of friction matches when he was about 13 years old.

The Erie canal, which was completed in 1825, two years before John was born, ran not far from his father's house and was a great joy to the boys. They swam in it in the summer and skated on it in winter. The passing canal boats brought to them glimpses of another world, and the field work must often have been interrupted while the Trowbridge boys climbed the fence to look at the crowds on the big boats. Sometimes when the crop of nuts and apples had been harvested the boys disposed of some of the crop to the passengers for a little pocket money.

Altogether it was a delightful world for boys, that wild region of northern New York,

What Happened to Bunny Love

ONCE THERE WAS a very loving little girl named Isabel. She had no brothers nor sisters to play with, so she loved her playthings that much more.

One Christmas morning she found two dear little bunnies in her stocking, and a pretty picture book. The bunnies were covered with a white, woolly cloth, that made their little bodies feel very soft and warm. They had bright black eyes that made them look very wise; and their long ears looked as if they could hear the softest noise. One bunny had a row of brown sewing up his back, so Isabel named him Bunny Brown. The other had on a gay red jacket that made him look so fetching that Isabel could not help loving him the most, so she called him Bunny Love.

One day when the bunnies were almost a year old and Christmas was again near, Isabel was playing with them on the floor. She played it was summer time and that they were outdoors, and that her mother's big plant was a tree and they were sitting in its shade. She leaned the story book against the tree so the bunnies could see the pictures while she told the stories. The bunnies were close beside her, but Bunny Love she put nearest to her because he was the one she liked the best.

By and by Isabel's mother came in, carrying a magazine. She told Isabel that she had just read about a very lonely little girl who had no sisters nor brothers, and no mother nor father to buy her things or love her very much. The little girl lived far away in a great city where the people were so poor, sometimes, that they did not have enough to eat and wear.

Isabel felt very sorry for the lonely little girl and wished that she could do something to make her glad. While she was wishing she looked at the two little bunnies that had made her days so happy. Finally she reached out her hand and picked up Bunny Love. She felt of his round, bead eyes. She ran her fingers down his long woolly ears. She patted him softly as she smoothed the gay red jacket; then she said, "I will send her Bunny Love."

When Brevity Is the Soul of Wit

Hetty is 8, and has learned some of the simple rules of grammar. However, they seem to have very little meaning to her.

Hetty's uncle, who is a schoolteacher, met her on the street one beautiful May day and asked her if she was going out with the Maying party.

"No, I ain't going."

"Oh, my dear!" said her uncle, "you must not say 'I ain't going.' You must say, 'I am not going.'" And he proceeded to give her a little lesson in grammar: "You are not going. He is not going. We are not going. You are not going. They are not going. Now can you say all that, Hetty?"

"Of course I can," she replied, making a courtesy. "There ain't nobody going."

Mr. Fox from 'Way Up North

MR. ARCTIC FOX lives at the zoo, and just now he is enjoying himself hugely, because the snow and cold make him think of home.

To Mr. Arctic Fox "home" means the far North. When he lived there he was a very busy young man and he has found it hard to become accustomed to the lazy life of the zoo. Here his food—raw beef, for Mr. Arctic Fox doesn't care for vegetables or fruit—is provided for him. In the far North he had to find it himself, and he liked that way much better. Indeed, his main occupation during the summer was stocking his pantry.

Mr. Arctic Fox's pantry was underground. The frost never wholly leaves the earth where he lived, and he dug in the moist turf till he reached a temperature only just above freezing. Here he made his pantry. This done, he set to work to fill it; for Mr. Arctic Fox is very wise, and he knew that when winter came he would have no way of getting food. The lemmings—little rodents, which are his favorite dish—would then be safe hidden in their tiny roadways beneath the ice and snow; and the birds, which he also likes, would be gone. In the summer the wild fowl nest by the margin of every stream; and on the ridges the willow grouse and snow buntings hide eggs in the moss and low bushes, or in warm hollows. Food was Mr. Fox's in abundance just for the catching.

In the summer he dresses in a light brown coat, whitish underneath, while the fur where it joins his body is bluish gray. Thus Mr. Fox became almost the color of his Arctic surroundings and could creep up on his prey unseen. Sometimes he dug the lemmings out of their burrows, sometimes he hunted them over the moss-grown plains and the barren ground. One after another, he pounced on the fat-bodied little animals and carried them off to his pantry. There he packed them down carefully, often several dozen of them together, covered them with moss and sod and left them in cold storage for future use. Lemmings Mr. Arctic Fox greatly prefers to birds; birds he chooses—or did choose when he had the chance—only as second best.

When winter comes, Mr. Fox's fur turns perfectly white—just like the snowdrifts among which, when at home, he crept in search of prey, avoiding the eyes of the game he sought and also the eyes of Mr. Gray Wolf, his worst enemy.

Though he had a cozy underground chamber up there in the far North, in which he might have slept away the winter, Mr. Fox preferred to race all day long across the barrens, just for the fun of it. But a time or two he returned home to find that Mr. Gray Wolf had stolen the whole contents of his pantry. Mr. Fox, however, was not a gentleman who sat down and cried over his misfortunes. He immediately set to work to filch the fat lemmings from the pantries of his neighbors.

But fun of this kind ended for Mr. Fox when he was brought to the zoo. Now, instead of a cozy burrow, he makes his home in the rocky cave you see in the picture. Instead of the boundless prairies, he has only the narrow space of his den for a playground. Its floor is cement, and so there is no place to dig. Mr. Fox's toes fairly twitch to get into the good moist earth once more. He finds his meat doesn't taste so good as it did when he caught it himself. He longs for just one bite of lemming. And as he peers with longing eyes out through the bars of his den at the curious boys and girls standing without he seems to say, "You don't half know, Young America, how thankful you ought to be that you're free!"

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

March 2, 1913—God's Covenant with Abraham

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Genesis 15; 17:1-8. Golden Text, Hebrews 10:23: He is faithful that promised.

In studying a character like Abraham's it is well to stop occasionally and assure ourselves that he was a man. Otherwise we have nothing in common with him. Abraham's endowments were spiritual rather than natural. In two particulars he ranks alone—in his belief and in the thing he believed. He believed in the one God when all the world was against him, and believed it with the full intensity of his being. Whether he arrived at his conviction through reason or revelation is a secondary consideration. He arrived, and for this the world owes him a vast obligation. The idea of the one God is the keystone of the arch of our civilization. The savage makes no progress. The reason lies in his conception of God. There is no Abraham in his history. Abraham's belief in the one God is the secret of his life. As a man he was but one in a world of men. His life was by no means blameless. The denial of Sarah and the expulsion of Hagar were spots on his garments, but his ideal was godlike.

The Fact of the One God Impressed Upon Abraham

God always selects the man of vision as his messenger to the future. This man may have his faults, but his vision redeems all else. So with Abraham and so with his descendants. In many respects the Jew was inferior to the Greek and the Egyptian, but he was in possession of knowledge of which neither Greek nor Egyptian had ever heard—he knew the one God. It was an inheritance from Abraham. That is the central truth of this lesson. It is not Abraham, but monotheism. That idea God burned into the very soul of Judaism. "Hear, O Israel, God is but one," was his cry day and night. And the reason is evident. It was not for his sake but for ours. There could be no progress without it. The patriarch had just been successful in battle, he was rich and powerful, but the nation that he was about to establish could not rest on force. A city with foundations awaited him—one whose builder and maker was God. God's work is everlasting. Whether he gives a promise or regenerates a soul, the seal of permanency is stamped upon it.

The Faith of Abraham Counted to Him for Righteousness

Faith is capable of growth. There are three degrees of faith mentioned in Scripture—great, little and no faith at all. The patriarch's faith was great, but greatness is a relative term. It implies the possibility of more. The patriarch feared, and God urged him to fear not, as he himself was his shield and great reward. This the prophet knew from many an experience. His shield had warded off the arrows of evil for many years. But his mind was not at rest. He did not disbelieve God; on the contrary, he believed and because of this he feared. That he would possess the land of Canaan in all probability gave him no anxiety, but the circumstances rested like a weight upon his soul. When Jacob wrestled with God, God touched the hollow of his thigh and the patriarch halted ever after. There are blessings that make us lame, and this was one.

Abraham thought aloud. "Lord God, what wilt thou give me? A country? But of what use is it all to an old man with no son?" According to Oriental custom, one's servant might inherit his wealth, and Abraham saw no future save through the line of his slave. There are some things beyond wealth, and the prospect of greater possessions only added to his grief. Children redeem life, and riches is poverty without them. God had pity upon Abraham and assured him that the stars above were few compared to the number of his descendants. This assurance startled the patriarch, and yet be believed and his faith was counted to him for righteousness. It was a far cry to the age of Paul, but he appealed to this story of Abraham as an argument that we are justified by faith in God.

God's promise should have been sufficient, but Abraham asked for a sign and God condescended to give it. This was nothing strange. Centuries after when Jesus was upon earth signs often accompanied his words. The patriarch was instructed of God and proceeded to obey. Faith and works are parts of the same thing. The sacrifice was prepared, and when the birds of prey came down upon it the patriarch drove them away. Our purest efforts sometimes serve to attract the fowls. Jesus gave sight to the blind and raised the dead, while his critics stood by and said this he did through Beelzebub, the prince of devils. One tries to pray only to feel himself disconcerted by evil thoughts or hateful memories—fowls that must be driven away, else God cannot come.

Sign Desired by Abraham Came Through Sacrifice and Service

Abraham desired a sign and received it. It came through sacrifice and service. Those who want a fuller assurance from God can readily find it in trying to do his will. Go out and do some sacrificial service. The poor are ever with us, and when we wish we may go to them with help. Then it's a good plan to return home and think it over. There may be no vision, but away within the chambers of the heart will be heard the voice of God: "Ye did it unto me." Every life in some respects touches some other life.

Abraham needed faith, as we all do. At times the necessity was especially strong and then it was that God came the nearest to him. That is a common experience. The horror of a great darkness such as came to the patriarch we do not believe to be usual. Once it was regarded as an essential to conversion, but this led to a state of mind possible only to the few. Many a poor trustful spirit has been driven to despair because of the absence of the horror. That bird of prey has been driven effectually away. God adapts himself to conditions. Abraham needed just such a confirmation as this, and God bowed to his necessity. The need was special. It involved not only Abraham but was a forecast of the centuries to come. That age has passed. It belonged to the "sundry times and divers manners" when God spake by the prophets. But in these last days God has spoken by his Son. Christ is the Heir of whom Isaac was but a type and his completed work is counted for righteousness to all who accept it.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins.

Analysis—The promise, its seal and its effect. The future guaranteed by the past. Faith strengthened by covenant relations. The rewards of service not meager nor stinted.

Under the shadow of the majestic Abraham the Jew thought himself to be secure. It is the purpose of this lesson to show that even Abraham was saved of "free grace." Salvation then was and now is a free gift. The man who would save himself by his own merit belongs to an age before Abraham. Abraham accepted eternal life not as a prize won from a reluctant deity but as the gracious gift of a loving father bestowed upon a trusting son, a son whose every act bespoke the filial character of his trust. No more than we could Abraham demand heaven's gates to open to his feet. His story is told us not to show the perfection of his service but the acceptable character of his faith. We have a chapter from sacred history exhibiting the relations of God to man as they then were and as they are now. We may exhibit in our smaller field the same faith which Abraham exhibited in his larger opportunity.

Jehovah Remembers Our Frame and Knows That We Are but Dust

Chapter 15:1—There were many reasons why Abraham should fear, but only one why he should "fear not." He had been many weary years in Palestine and as yet there was no dawning of a better day. The manners and morals of the people were far worse than in Ur, whence he had come. He had met with famine (ch. 12:10); he had been in grave danger in the land of his exile (12:12).; he had failed to gain the good will of the land and he had parted from his only kinsman, whose character seemed to have grown darker among a corrupt people. We may well believe that after so long a time the promises of God seemed slow in their fulfillment and Abraham doubtless found it hard to believe that he should here found a new and chosen nation, since as yet he had no child born of his sacred relations (ch. 15:2-3).

Verse 5—It would add bitterness to his cup to think that he seemed likely to perish in this ill-advised attempt to found a nation which should be the hope of the world, and should he die in some one of these bloody feuds between the native tribes, monotheism, the religion of Jehovah, would perish with him. He was growing old. He was, it seemed, making no converts. His "steward" would, according to the custom of the country, inherit whatever he might leave if he should die without legitimate male heir. That new owner would doubtless take back to Damascus (v. 2) all that Abraham left and bestow the rich tithe upon the heathen gods of his native land. The outlook was black enough and growing blacker every year.

It was just then that Jehovah gave Abraham, with new rites and solemnities, a renewal of the original promise and quickened the faith that was ready to die.

Abraham, Ceasing to Trust in Himself, Believed More Fully in God

Verse 6—As yet not a single visible object had changed. All he had was a renewal of the divine word. But in that he asked nothing further we see the strength and glory of his faith. He was not put into possession of a rod of land and the birth of his heir was still fifteen years away. But Abraham just took the word of God as settling it, and waited developments. No wonder that Paul pointed to him as the father of all them that believe (Rom. 4:11). He was far from being without fault, but he did believe God would keep his word with him.

Verse 7—A recent writer on the problems America confronts said he could understand the confident optimism of Americans when he studied their history. They had always faced dangers and always escaped or triumphed over them. Americans did not see a way out any better than he did, but they insisted that it was their destiny to advance and not to be defeated. God calls to Abraham's recollection his past and fortifies him by remembrance of previous experiences. Many a saint, mourning his weakened faith, needs to go back to the days "when first he knew the Lord." Spiritual aridity cannot overthrow our faith if we remember the times of spiritual refreshing we have been permitted to enjoy. There had been a purpose in his call, and that purpose had yet to be fulfilled. To be sure, his first ownership of Palestinian land would be the purchase of a grave (ch. 23:17-20), but even that was accepted as the beginning of a national occupation. Had not Abraham come to believe his descendants were to make this land their home for centuries to come, he would have taken the body of his beloved wife back to the home of her childhood.

The Promise Is Made Additionally Sacred by Solemn Covenant

Verse 8—Every age and nation have customs which they revere and which are used to give special sanctity to an oath or a promise. In the Orient the offering of a sacrifice at the time of making the agreement adds greatly to its solemnity and impresses the parties concerned.

Verse 9—The rites which Abraham was commanded to observe were such as he might have performed had he been making an alliance, offensive and defensive, with a neighboring sheik. A compact so formed in the Orient is considered more sacred than kinship by blood. God came down to sign a treaty with Abraham as if he, too, were the chieftain of a tribe. Rites not unlike these are still observed in Syria, and their binding nature is respected.

Verse 12—Even after Abraham had lain down for the night he felt the awe of a divine presence. The vigil which he had observed to protect his sacrifices from the waiting birds of prey caused something like a nervous collapse. But when insensible to the world he was conscious of being an auditor of glorious promises. God renewed to him under these impressive circumstances the original promise, and all believers throughout the world are blessed in the fulfillment thereof.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning February 23, 1913

TOPIC—The talents. Matthew 25:14-30.

This parable has so many points of likeness with that of the pounds (Luke 19:11-27) that some commentators have confused the teaching of the two. But there are important differences between these. The parable of the pounds was spoken when Jesus was at Jericho, on his last journey to Jerusalem, in the house of Zacchæus, to all the people who were then present. But this parable was spoken on Tuesday of the passion week, on the Mount of Olives, to his disciples alone, and formed the hortatory conclusion to his last great prophecy in which he foretold the destruction of Jerusalem, the end of the world, and the return to judgment of the Son of man. In the former parable ten servants are mentioned; here there are three. There the same sum, one mina, was given to every servant. Here enormously larger sums are intrusted to each. There the reward is represented under the figure of rule over cities; here by the general, and more directly spiritual, expression, "the joy of thy lord." The earlier parable illustrated different degrees of improvement of the same opportunity. This parable illustrated the proportionately equal improvement of different opportunities.

And the parable of the talents is the complement of that of the ten virgins, which it immediately follows. These two, taken together, show the attitude in which the disciple should stand while waiting for the coming of the Saviour. The parable of the ten virgins says that he should be watchful, with the inner life full and ready to shine forth when the sudden cry should sound. The parable of the talents shows us that the disciple, during his time of waiting, is to be active, useful and eager to turn his opportunities to the best account.

The exhortation was needed. There have been too many disciples who were quite willing to be watchful, but not at all willing to be industrious. Nothing so taxes the productive human energies, so strains the human powers to their largest, as the service of Jesus Christ.

The parable is true to the life of the age in which it was spoken. Not infrequently a man of substance had to travel abroad. And when he did so, he could take one of two courses. He could place his money with the banker, who, after the practice introduced by the Phœnician traders, would give him interest for the use of it. Or he could intrust it to his slaves to administer it for him. The latter procedure was frequently followed throughout the Græco-Roman world, and it is followed in this instance. While the slave belonged to the master, together with all his abilities and earnings, there was an implied understanding that good management during the master's absence would insure him a reward.

The talents are distributed according to the several abilities of the slaves; therefore they do not represent their owners' natural powers, as has so often been erroneously assumed. The talents are the external advantages of the disciples' lives, their opportunities, their stations in life, their money and condition. In the case of the several servants of Christ these are manifestly not always the same. Some are capable of using larger opportunities, and to these men larger opportunities are given. But the cup of each runs over. The measure of the cup is the only limit to our Lord's bestowal. It is a universal law that to him that hath shall be given. It is an indefeasible law; for we can receive only according to the measure we bring.

Two of the master's slaves were faithful. The one with five talents traded and made other five; the one with two talents traded and made other two. And to each of them there came the ringing approval of the master. And the reward is that the joy of the master will be shared by that servant who has served him truly. The result will be a higher service.

The chief interest of the parable centers in the man with one talent. He is so much like us. The man with five talents is the rare man in this life; the man with one talent is everywhere. But the least endowment is not small. Even in the case of the man with one talent it was a large amount of money with which he was intrusted. It should have evoked his sense of responsibility. But he was not satisfied with his one talent because it was not five.

He is first idle, then jealous, and finally evasive. The real secret of his failure to use his talent was not fear of his master but slothfulness. He did not like exertion. And his master soon detected this fact.

And then he felt resentful toward his master because, when he was going away, he did not give him as large a sum to use as he gave to his fellows. "If I only had a bigger job, or a more appreciative employer, or a larger capital with which to work, I could do something; but not now." So he sits idle. He cannot do the thing he would like to do, and he will not do the thing he could do.

When his lord returns to reckon with his servants the faithless one tries to lay the blame of his own neglect upon the shoulders of his lord himself. "I was afraid of thee."

Perhaps he was afraid. "Conscience doth make cowards of us all." But he would have had no cause to be afraid, if he had sincerely tried to do his lord's service. The sternness of the Saviour is inseparable from the greatness of his gentleness. Idleness is selfishness, and for the slothful there is no place in the favor of our Lord.

At least he ought to have deposited his master's money with the bankers, that upon his return he might receive his own with interest. Had he really been actuated by no other motive than fear of his master's exactions, there was a ready way to meet them without danger to himself. He might have been afraid of the risk of trading on his own account, like his fellow servants, but he might at least have realized a moderate interest by lending his money to the bankers. His not having done so was an evidence of slothfulness rather than of fear. Mere timidity or caution is not reproved, unless it leads to inaction.

God's gifts are not left unproductive because the one to whom they are first intrusted fails to use them wisely. They are often taken from the man who neglects his duty and given to another.

Forth from the light and glory of the audience chamber into the darkness of the night goes the unfaithful servant, bearing with him the agony of duty unfulfilled and of opportunity thrown away and lost forever. With the anguish of an awakened conscience he hates himself and the universe. In that outer darkness there is weeping and gnashing of teeth.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

March 2, 1913

WORKING OUT ONE'S DREAMS

TOPIC—The ideal Christian. III. His practical service. Matthew 5:13-16.

The most practical thing in the world is a great ideal. Nations are not made by machinery, nor by so-called "practical" men, but by dreamers of dreams. The important fact about a community is whether or not it is planting noble ambitions in the minds of its young people. Are they thinking the high thoughts of chivalry, out of which spring later the deeds of human service? Before we talk about rivers, let us consider springs. Cause must be studied before effect. Ideals beget deeds. The reason we of this western continent have astonished the Old World by our practical achievements is that we are essentially dreamers and idealists, and children of dreamers and idealists. We have greatly dared and greatly done because our vision, the vision of our fathers, was magnificent.

This is the day of methods. We have books and committees and organizations on how to do things until we are almost method mad. Amid our feverish haste, and the whir of much machinery, we hear the old, old word, "Where there is no vision the people perish" (authorized version). Aspiration alone animates the activity that avails.

"Get busy" and "Do it now" are two popular mottoes that we see in shops and offices. There is one that should precede these. It is "Get right." Proper relationship with the springs of service should precede forms of service. And the conviction seems to be growing among the men of our time that the real need of Christianity is not more work or more money but more of the sense of utter dependence upon God, and more of personal communion with him. Sometimes the most practical service is to go apart awhile and listen.

> All service ranks the same with God;
> There is no last nor first.
> —Robert Browning.

Given a master motive, a man simply must serve. The ideal Christian cannot keep from doing the Lord's work. He may know nothing about modern methods, but the love of the Master will naturally overflow from his life in ministry. He will help people because it is his new nature so to do. If he stops to analyze himself at all, he will say with the apostle Paul, "The love of Christ constraineth us."

Your sincere Christian is never troubled by the laws against gambling, drunkenness or theft. Why not? They bother others; why is he exempt? Simply because he lives by a higher law, which removes from him the very temptation to these lower offenses. The point is further amplified in a quotation from Hugh Evandar Willis: "The common law of the United States and England tells men what not to do; the uncommon law of the kingdom of heaven tells men what to do. Follow the principles of this uncommon law for the coming year, and not only will you not violate any of the principles of the common law but you will enjoy a happiness that can never come to those who live only under the laws of earthly kingdoms and governments."

Nobody need sigh for an opportunity for service these days. The occasions for being helpful, in the name of Jesus, are at everybody's door. This is the day of opportunity for even the least of us to do large service. The difficulty is that some of us are hoarding our pennies, or our talents, until they shall become a big bank account, instead of putting them into immediate circulation. If the breath that is wasted in sighing for careers were spent in propelling little sailboats there would be an immense cargo of service carried to the marts of the needy world.

The colloquial name of Christian Endeavor is "the Endeavor society." This organization has accented practical doing. And in this school of real service multitudes of young people have learned the mind of the Master.

"People who are made of the right kind of material do not make excuses; they work. They do not whine; they keep forging ahead. They do not wait for somebody to help them; they help themselves. They do not wait for an opportunity; they make it. Those who complain of 'no chance' confess their weakness—their lack of efficiency. They show that they are not equal to the occasion—that they are not greater than the obstacle which confronts them."—O. S. Marden.

The Saviour "went about doing good." He did not sit at home in Nazareth dreaming about his great mission. He began to journey and to serve, even as he had always served at home; and opportunities grew as he went on. It is the person who is willing to help "lame dogs over stiles" who seizes the occasion to serve kings. Before ever he fed the five thousand, Jesus shared his wallet with many a lone wayfarer. Helpfulness is a Christlike habit.

MISSIONARY WORK

Central West Shows Mission Enthusiasm

The circuit of the campaigners for the new China fund through the middle western synods was an exceptionally encouraging experience. Three secretaries of the Foreign Board—Doctors Speer, Brown and Halsey—joined the missionaries who make up the China committee in this tour of the Middle West, and they, with all their experience in missionary propaganda, declare that they never before had so encouraging a response from the churches among which they travel. The enthusiasm shown in all the meetings they held was an unlimited inspiration. Especially were they encouraged by the large number of men who attended the missionary events given for men alone.

By dividing the force of missionaries and secretaries at numerous points, the travelers succeeded in their January tour in covering Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Sioux City, Council Bluffs, Omaha, St. Joseph, Kansas City, Topeka, Wichita, Joplin, Webb City and St. Louis. And the "cold shoulder" was completely missing from every one of these places. The canvass for subscriptions in each town followed after the public meeting, and no complete accounting has yet been made. It is felt certain, however, that the returns in a financial way will be a full proportionate share from the territory traversed toward the $750,000 which this special endeavor aims at.

From the central cities, which are under Dr Bradt's immediate supervision, the campaign swung back to the eastern district, where Mr. McConaughy has the arrangements in charge. The demonstration in New York City is the next great event in the undertaking.

Presbyterian Indians Over 18,000

The American Indian members of the Presbyterian Churches now number 18,600. Unfortunately The Continent in its issue of Feb. 6, by a typographical error, reduced this to 1,800.

It is gratifying to see the advance of the Indian work of the denomination. Fifty-seven tribal divisions are now being reached in twenty states. Forty-five white missionaries and twenty unordained workers serve these fields. There are thirty-nine ordained Indian ministers and fifty-eight other commissioned Indian helpers. Preaching services are conducted at 234 churches and stations. Over 7,000 children are enrolled in the Sunday schools.

Detailed information and latest reports from the fields may be had from Dr. T. C. Moffett, superintendent of the Indian department, 156 5th avenue, New York. It is an encouraging report for Presbyterianism in its efforts to reach the long neglected pagan tribes, and to nurture our Presbyterian Indians in the Christian faith.

Three-Fourths of Indians Civilized

It is now calculated that of all the Indians in the United States approximately three-fourths may now be fairly said to be civilized and only one-fourth continue in old aboriginal customs. This means that only one Indian in four nowadays lives in a tepee or hogan, and only one in four still clings to the ancient blanket and refuses the costume of the white man. Most of the civilized Indians are citizens and take part in elections with the same zest as the whites. In states where woman suffrage prevails the Indian women go to the polls. The success of the temperance side in the local option election in Nez Perce county, Idaho, is attributed largely to the votes of the Indian women belonging to the six Presbyterian churches in Lapwai and the adjacent country.

Laughing Lepers at Christmas Dinner

Writing from Allahabad, Professor Sam Higginbottom describes Christmas in the lepers' hospital which he manages. It was a very happy day in the hospital, with 257 lepers sitting down to a bountiful Christmas dinner. A big phonograph was brought into the dining room, and along with a number of other joyful selections it was made to play over and over again the lepers' favorite music—"The Laughing Song." The afflicted diners, as Mr. Higginbottom remarks, well illustrated the proverb, "Laugh, and the world laughs with you," and he is sure that the jollity of the hour aided in digesting the enormous meal that they ate.

Mr. Higginbottom also testifies to the tremendous impression made in Ewing Christian College by the late visit of Mr. Mott and Mr. Eddy. Many of the eighty converts from the college itself who surrendered to Christ at these meetings were old students for whom the faculty had been praying for years. The students who came over from Lucknow to the Allahabad meeting went back and organized Bible classes among Hindu and Mohammedan young men, and now have forty non-Christians regularly studying the Scriptures.

Where a Great Missionary Labored

The buildings pictured on this page are a part of the Mackenzie College at Sao Paulo, Brazil, and the portrait is a picture of the man who built up this institution, the late president, Dr. Horace M. Lane. What his thirty years of service meant in Sao Paulo there has already been an effort to tell on this page; but nothing which can be told in print at this distance can adequately portray the affection for him which was manifested by the people of the city and state of Sao Paulo after his decease. When news of his death went abroad, an endless procession of rich and poor, high and low, flowed through his home for the two nights and one day which intervened between his decease and the funeral. One student, who had made trouble in the school and had had to be severely disciplined by Dr. Lane, stayed beside the body through both nights, and had to be forcibly led away in order to obviate the peril of complete breakdown.

Dr. H. M. Lane

In the state legislature eulogies were pronounced by leading statesmen of both houses. Senator Freitas said: "Few Brazilians would have done as much as this American has accomplished with the utmost modesty, with the greatest self-forgetfulness and with the most extraordinary confidence, not only leading us to new horizons when he arrived here but also cooperating with active participation in the original organization and development of our system of public instruction, which is today the honor and glory of this state throughout all Brazil." In the house of representatives the leading speaker said, "He was a Brazilian as much as anyone can be who was born in a far-away land."

New Methods of Learning Chinese

The union language school, which opened in the University of Nanking last fall, has had a remarkable success, enrolling thus far forty-seven students, all newcomers to China, busy now learning to speak the Chinese tongue. There has been much said of late years on the importance of schools teaching missionary languages in Christian lands, so that prospective candidates for mission appointments might obtain language equipment before going abroad. But no such effort in either America or Europe seems ever to have succeeded in mustering more than a dozen students at any one time, even where the curriculum embraced all the leading languages of non-Christian nations. The group of nearly fifty studying Chinese alone at Nanking signifies, therefore, that the indorsement of success is with those who feel that language learning must be done on the field.

It has in truth been the experience of new missionaries, from the beginning of the modern mission epoch, that the acquisition of a new language is undoubtedly facilitated by living in an atmosphtre saturated by the language which one aspires to master. When to that advantage of hearing the language spoken all around him every day, the student is able to add expert scholastic instruction under strict college conditions, the period of language learning should be and undoubtedly will be reduced to the minimum. It is believed, indeed, that a single year of study under such conditions will put apt students in possession of a good conversational knowledge of Chinese.

As for the methods of the school, it is interesting to note that class instruction is given for two of the six periods each day, while the other four periods are devoted to work under the old-fashioned condition of one Chinese teacher for each foreign learner. But instead of a student's continuing through his whole course with a single teacher, the young men and women at the Nanking school recite to different Chinese teachers day after day in rotation, so that they do not learn to imitate the idiosyncrasies of any one.

Incidental to the scholastic success of the school, it is noted that a strong influence for Christian unity is doubtless to be exerted in years to come through the friendships now springing up among new missionaries of the different denominations represented in this student body.

Board Notes and Announcements

—"Give ye them to eat" was Christ's message given by Mrs. Dickey at the Friday morning meeting at Room 48, Chicago. Mrs. Ralph Mills of Fusan, Korea, appealed strongly for prayer for the Korean Christians in this time of persecution and suffering. Miss Emily Forman from India said every little girl in school would come to her, when she returned to India, and ask her what she had brought her, just like our own children. She wants about eighty small, dressed dolls to give to these little girls—any dress but gingham, because they themselves wear gingham always. She says they love the dolls even better than American children do. Dolls may be sent to Miss Emily Forman, room 48, 509 South Wabash avenue.

NEW BOOKS

Religious Biographies

The Apostle of the North: Memoirs of Bishop W. C. Bompas, by H. A. Cody. Another story of a man of our own day who belongs in the eleventh chapter of the Hebrews. One of the great of the English church, he yet lived and worked in such distant, obscure places that most of us need the map which the book gives to know where they were. Many of us know his father, however, since he was the original Sergeant Buzfuz in "Pickwick Papers." A shy boy, bright in books, sensitive to suffering, raised a Baptist, becoming a Church of England curate, he heard the call of the bishop of St. Rupert's land and reached there when he was 31 in 1865. Then began a ministry to Indians and Eskimos and whites which carried him farther and farther into the wilderness. He was the first bishop of the diocese of Athabasca, and also the first of Mackenzie river, and also of Selkirk on the Yukon. Across the whole of the Canadian northwest he made his journeys. More than forty illustrations in the book help to make the story vivid. The most impressive is the picture of the grave of Bishop Bompas at Carcross, miles north of Skagway. It is surrounded by a rude fence, and across the stone you see the mountains and the river and the scrubby pine woods. But around it there gathered, when he was buried, a great group of believers who had been won through his work. When he died it was found that he had been a careful and expert student of Sanskrit and Hebrew during the whole of his desert work. The book revives the assurance that the days of heroism are still upon us. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $1.50 net.

The Life of Rev. Benjamin Bausman, by Henry H. Ranck. Dr. Bausman was a conspicuous and much loved leader in the German Reformed Church, and was notable in Pennsylvania, where his long pastorate at Reading is familiar. The book gives an interesting picture of the early German-American home (Dr. Bausman was born in 1824), and largely through his own writings it shows what influence the tractarian movement had on young men in college and seminary. A number of them went over to the Roman Church, and Dr. Bausman was strongly drawn to it until a visit to Europe, where he saw the Roman Church in practical working, entirely cured him. He was a pupil of Dr. Philip Schaff at Mercersburg and a close friend until his death. The account of his activities is quite amazing. He was president of boards and societies and administrator of interests beyond number. Meanwhile, he continued the active work of the pastorate, though called to every place of leadership in his church. An interesting story is told to the effect that while he was editing a church paper he printed a quotation from Beecher which created quite a stir. One writer protested that Beecher was "a man whose blasphemy is only equaled by his theological charlatanry and clownish buffoonery." Dr. Bausman accepted the rebuke very meekly, protesting that he had really tried "to keep all such stuff out of" his paper. [Publication and Sunday School Board of the Reformed Church of the United States, New York.

The Personal Life of David Livingstone, by W. Garden Blaikie (Fleming H. Revell Company, New York); David Livingstone, by C. Silvester Horne (Macmillan Company, New York). These books are especially welcome as the centennial (March 19) of the birth of Livingstone approaches. Dr. Blaikie's book was first published in 1880, and this is an inexpensive reprint from the same large type plates. It is embellished also by an excellent map of southern Africa, which shows Livingstone's travels better than any we have elsewhere seen. Mr. Horne's book is briefer, but has just been written, and contains more late references than the other. It is done in Mr. Horne's familiar, interesting style and is an admirable book to read to young people, or just before preparing an address on Livingstone. Each 50 cents net.

John Bancroft Devins: A True Greatheart, by E. C. Ray. It is a special gratification to The Continent to note the appearance of this volume not alone because of the life it commemorates but also because its title is frankly accepted from the tribute which The Continent itself was moved to pay to the editor of The New York Observer in the hour of his sudden death. The spontaneous word "Greatheart" which sprang to The Continent's lips to describe him at the first startling news of Dr. Devins's passing away so greatly appealed to his oldest and most intimate friend, who now becomes his biographer, that it was accepted for the title of this memorial. Certainly nothing better could be put into the hands of a growing boy than this record of how one who had no advantage whatever in the world climbed up to a wonderful usefulness for himself, while all the time lending a hand to others more needy and less courageous. It is a noble life story, simply but inspiringly related. [Association Press, New York City. 75 cents.

Religious History

The Moslem Christ, by Samuel M. Zwemer. The opening sentence of this little volume gives a key to it: "Islam is the only one of the great non-Christian religions which gives a place to Christ in its book, and yet it is also the only one of the non-Christian religions which denies his deity, his atonement and his supreme place as Lord of all in its sacred literature." Dr. Zwemer tells of the place that Christ has in the Koran and the current belief of Mohammedanism. Every reference to him in the Koran is quoted, and full treatment is given to the tradition which includes his return. Provision is made in the prophet's mosque at Medina for the burial of Christ which is to occur when he appears again and dies a natural death. Anyone who has traveled in Moslem lands will recall how many stories involve the expectation of this return. The closing chapter on "How to Preach Christ to Moslems Who Know Jesus" is most illuminating. Dr. Zwemer puts all the weight of his authority behind the saying that in the fact of Christ we have a point of vital contact with the Moslems and that "a loving yet bold presentation of the truths of our religion and of the surpassing grandeur and beauty of the character of Jesus Christ will never alienate a Moslem hearer." The book becomes practical to men who remain at home in its argument that unitarianism is not Christianity. It is to be commended to all who are interested in the study of missions. [American Tract Society, New York. $1 net.

Crises in the Early Church, by John Alfred Faulkner. A primary manual of church history is always to be welcomed, for the average church man today is almost totally ignorant of the path by which Christianity has marched up from the apostolic age. This work of Professor Faulkner's is a brief book particularly well adapted to instruct the busy man who has no foundation of church history to build upon. There is a very careful explanation of just what was involved in the battle between Arius and Athanasius, which determined that the church should be trinitarian instead of unitarian. [Eaton and Mains, New York. 75 cents net.

Of Public Interest

Christianizing the Social Order, by Walter Rauschenbusch. This volume forms a companion and sequence to Professor Rauschenbusch's "Christianity and the Social Crisis." The subject is handled with even a firmer hand and the volume bids fair to be discussed as actively as the other. The essence of the argument is that whereas some sections of the social order are now Christianized in principle and await only a similar practice, our present business system is in principle unchristian if not anti-Christian. This is because it is under the law of profit. The whole system is described in the word "capitalism," against which the book bears heavy testimony; and the author seeks to make plain what must be done to correct the present state. It is difficult to agree entirely with Professor Rauschenbusch or to differ radically from him. A sentence here and there may be mistaken, but there is a growing feeling that something is lacking in our business system which the true spirit of Christ would supply. Government by All the People, by Delos F. Wilcox. The subtitle, "The Initiative, the Referendum and the Recall as Instruments of Democracy," describes the scope and temper of this work. The older methods of representative and check-and-balance government have failed so signally, says the author, that it is useless trying to patch them up. We must, he argues, commit ourselves to fundamental and direct democracy. The initiative, referendum and recall are the instruments of such popular participation in government as is needed to give the popular will full sway. Thus the book may be quoted as in some measure a reply to Mr. Oberholtzer's "The Referendum in America." To one objection against the direct government by the majority—the objection that the rights of minorities would be disregarded—the author makes the ingenious answer that if ever a minority in a given political unit (such as a town or a county) had a just grievance against the majority, their cases could be taken up and their rights settled by the suffrages of a supposedly fair and unbiased majority in the next larger political unit. But, after all, that is a hypothetical remedy, and the fact that the author's treatment of his problem is a priori throughout will weaken the argument in the eyes of those who are skeptical empiricists in political matters. Some Recent Fiction

A Picked Company, by Mary Hallock Foote, is a novel of strong and vivid contrasts in character and setting. It opens in a New England village in the late '40s, where a Congregational minister gathers "a picked company" which is to colonize Oregon. The pioneer life on the Pacific slope before and during the gold fever is vividly portrayed, and the effect of the same on the erstwhile villagers is clearly shown. The contrast between the love affairs of Barbara, a sweet, strong New England girl, and of Stella, her cousin, a veritable "belle dame sans merci," is well brought out. In fact, the characters are all skillfully drawn. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.30 net.

The Marshal, by Mary Raymond Shipman Andrews. A romantic story of love and adventure, in which the hero, a chivalrous French peasant lad, attempts to restore the Bonapartes to the throne and become a marshal of France. The tale of brave Francois's education with two children of the noblesse, of his love for the heroine, Alixe, and of his gallant fight in both the Old World and the New is told with charm and sustained interest. Pensions Will Give Us Heroes

The editorial in The Continent of Jan. 30 on "The Spiritual Meaning of Ministerial Pensions" is a trumpet call to the church. I am a pensioner of the United States government, yet I served less than a year in the army. But I have served the Presbyterian Church in the ministry very many years. My service has been not only to individuals, churches and colleges, but to the church as a whole. For instance, I taught in Princeton Theological Seminary. That was distinctly a service to the church as a great brotherhood. Then I have started measures in our General Assembly that resulted in national and church measures and movements. I was for a year financial secretary of one of our great universities. During that year we secured a million dollar subscription and set that university upon its feet. Later I helped one of our colleges to get an endowment. Thus I might go on to enumerate how I have served the church as a body.

Now, if the church pensions me for $500 a year for, say, ten years there will be a "spiritual meaning" in that pension just as there is patriotism in the government's pension for twenty-five years and more. The government pensions for fifty years for one year's service in the army and the church pensions for ten years for fifty years' service. This church pension will give us heroes in our ministry. There is not a young hero in our college today who is longing to enter the ministry who will refuse to do so if a $500 pension is assured him after thirty years of faithful service. He will jump at the chance to be a soldier in God's army. X. Y.

"The Pastor Hunt"—The Remedy

My article on "The Pastor Hunt" brings me trouble. I am beginning to get letters saying, "You have fairly described the disease, but I can't find the remedy. Give us that!" But diagnosis of disease is the first step toward discovery of remedies. Let me say that many of these vacancies in the pastorate never ought to have occurred, and would not had the churches cooperated fairly with their former pastors. Such churches ought to have a difficult time in securing new ones. There are many cases where the increase of the minister's family and the necessities of education make the expenses at the manse exceed the financial ability of the parish, so that a removal is an absolute necessity, unless presbytery has means to meet it. There are doubtless frequent instances in which a man of marked ability ought to be discovered and transferred from a limited to a larger field.

But all this has nothing to do with the question of how to proceed to fill the vacant pulpit. Our last General Assembly wrestled with that question and appointed a permanent committee on vacancy and supply. So far so good. But every synod, and especially every presbytery, should have as one of its most active agencies such a body. These groups of energetic men should keep in confidential touch with all the parishes and ministers within the limits of its field. A church confronting the possibility of approaching vacancy should first of all consult the chairman of this committee and seek his counsel in the matter. By such action many a vacancy might be averted to great advantage both of pastor and people. If the pulpit is actually vacated, then again resort should be made to the same constituted agency of presbytery or to the broader agency of the synod. These wise men, whose business it is to know the whole field of presbytery or synod, ought to know just where readjustments can be made to the advantage of the whole church and where is the fittest man to be transferred to the newly opened charge. They could, and ought to, prevent any onslaught on a prosperous and happy sister church, whose pastor is just fitted to his place and receiving an adequate support from a devoted people.

The whole matter is one of delicacy and difficulty. No offhand dictum can indicate an adequate remedy. The whole business has to be worked out along the lines of the commissions of General Assemblies, synods and presbyteries. The sailing will never be quite clear. But there can be careful consideration of the rights and necessities of the weak churches on the part of the strong. A. S. FISKE.

Says Masonry Is Not Irreligious

I noticed a contribution entitled "Lodges and Churches." The facts contained therein are so misleading and so utterly untrue that I know you will be glad to correct them.

In the first place, Masonry should encourage men to go to church rather than draw them away from the church. Our lodges have no meetings whatever on the Sabbath except occasionally a meeting of a religious nature and at other hours than the regular church service. Its principles are founded solely on the Bible and we are taught that it should be our guide through life. Since becoming a Mason the writer has looked more favorably on and done more for the church than ever before.

The assertion that men are led to drink in Masonic lodges is utterly untrue. No intoxicating liquor of any kind or nature is allowed to be brought into a Masonic hall, and a man who is in any way engaged in the handling of any kind of intoxicating liquor is ineligible to receive the degrees. Of course many Masons are not total abstainers, but who will assert that all church members are?

In conclusion, let me ask that your correspondent canvass the Christian churches of Chicago today and she will be surprised at the number of ministers of every Protestant denomination who are members of Masonic lodges and subscribers to the doctrines of Free Masonry. Would these men support an order that debauched the morals of its members? O. E. D.

No Blame on Masonry

With the letter entitled "Lodges and Churches" I do not at all agree. Any man who told such things as "that he did not attend church because he was a Mason," etc., was imposing on the gullibility of the dear lady. The statement that a man cannot do church work and stay in the lodge is absurd and ridiculous. I know a Methodist D. D. who was for years a presiding elder and who is now at the head of one of the departments of the church. He is a thirty-second degree Mason. As to a man saying he drinks because he is a Mason, he might as truthfully say he drinks because he belongs to the church. The Masons as a body prohibit drinking in their lodge rooms.

A true Mason, as a true Christian, stands for all that is manly and good, and sneers at no church nor any man's religion. The first requisite of Masonry is a belief in Almighty God, and no lodge can do business without the open Bible on the altar, and they always open and close with prayer.

There have been men in the Masonic body, as well as in churches of all denominations, and of no denomination, who have fallen. But to blame the fall of any man on Masonry is as untruthful as it would be to blame his fall on the church. I know of no lodge that claims to take the place of the church. VIOLA FOUTS.

A Presbyterian Ship Owner on Panama

I WAS MUCH surprised to read an editorial in your paper a few weeks ago denouncing our government for national dishonor, and again in the issue of Jan. 30 you take another fling. Had you studied the question thoroughly your article would have been toned down and more moderate. It is a long job to discuss it, so I will only deal with two phases of it:

1. That you claim we have broken our solemn treaty.

2. That we refuse to arbitrate it at The Hague.

Ordinarily in this wicked world you find a man arguing on the side of his pocketbook, and as it is well known that I am a shipowner an explanation is necessary. I own American vessels, none of which are adapted to go through the canal, but I own four times as much tonnage of British vessels, all of them adapted for trade through the canal. Therefore, if I argued from my financial viewpoint I would be decidedly on the British side. When in Great Britain last summer all the papers voiced the sentiments you hold, but when the American side was fully presented in a long letter to The London Times the newspaper articles only became conspicuous by their absence.

The treaty says that all ships shall pay the same tolls and there shall be no discrimination. You will see that the uniformity of tolls is qualified by the statement that there shall be no discrimination. In fact, the very essence of the treaty is that the British ships shall not be discriminated against. The only ships that shall pass free are those engaged exclusively in our coastwise trade, and as no vessels are permitted to engage in that trade except American ships, therefore neither Great Britain nor any other country is interested. How can there be a discrimination when no other nation can participate? This law reserving to American ships the coastwise trade antedated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by half a century.

Now, as to submitting it to The Hague for the sake of peace and good will, I am in favor of arbitration, but I am decidedly of the opinion that it is not an international but clearly a domestic matter between the railroads of the United States and American coastwise ships, and foreign nations cannot in any sense be interested. Boiled down to its logical conclusion, the railroads want high tolls imposed on American vessels so that they can charge a higher rate of freight across the continent. It may seem strange to you that the highest government legal authorities in Great Britain and also in Canada told me that the United States was right.

You have gone on the assumption that there was only one side to this question, and the object of writing this is to show you that this country might be right, as I claim we have not broken our agreement. ROBERT DOLLAR.

Resents British "Interference"

The writer for The Continent in the department "The World" is usually as fair as he is capable and interesting. But his article in the issue of Jan. 30, while apparently telling only of Secretary Knox's official reply on Panama tolls, is in effect a special plea for Congress to take the "logical and honorable" (?) course of arbitrating the question now in dispute between England and the United States. We have exempted our own ships from paying toll for the use of the canal, which action England claims to be a violation of our treaty with her.

It would seem to me a most illogical, dishonorable and utterly indefensible act for the United States to even consider the arbitration of this question. About a hundred years ago England claimed the right to search our ships for her deserting seamen and impress our citizens into her marine service. In the war which followed England learned a lesson in minding her own business which has lasted her until now. Her attempt now to interfere with our legislation upon so purely a domestic matter is insufferable impudence.

If England can force us to arbitrate such a matter as this, then we have already ceased to be a self-governing nation. Any diplomat, or any citizen, who understands the true inwardness of this move of England, who would even entertain the suggestion of "arbitrating" our right to self-government, does not deserve to enjoy free institutions. If we have negotiated a treaty which interferes with our control of our own commerce, then the sooner we abrogate such a treaty the better for all parties.

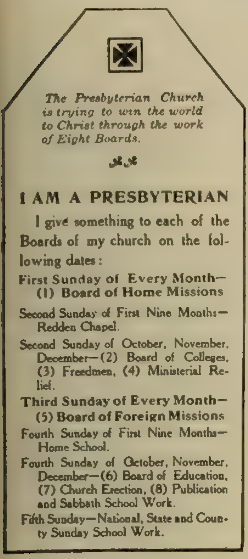
The dignified and straightforward course would seem to be to firmly insist that matters of this sort are not proper subjects of treaties or arbitration, and that while we are prepared to accept either criticism or arbitration when accused of undue favoritism among the foreign nations which use the canal, we shall vigorously resent any criticism or even official inquiry as to the justice of any arrangement we may see fit to make for our ships to use our canal. L. M. SCROGGS.

Ways of Working

Sunday School Grades Correspond to Public Schools

One of the most successful graded Bible schools in the country is that of First church, Topeka, Kan. For several years the present grading, which corresponds exactly to the grades in the public schools, has been in successful operation. When Dr. S. S. Estey, the pastor, went to Topeka eight years ago there was not a graded Sunday school in the city. The Presbyterian school was graded and other denominations soon followed. There has been built a $30,000 Bible school house, in which all the departments have separate rooms. The total attendance is about 800.

When a pupil joins the school, a blank is filled giving the age and the public school grade of the scholar. There are classes for boys and for girls in each of the grades represented by the public schools from 1B through high school. The beginners' department includes all children who have not yet entered public school. The primary department has all grades through the fourth. The junior department extends through the seventh grade and the senior department, which uses the intermediate graded lessons, includes the eighth grade and high school. Normal and adult departments include teacher training classes and the men's brotherhood in addition to other classes.



The Presbyterian Church is trying to win the world to Christ through the work of Eight Boards.

I AM A PRESBYTERIAN

I give something to each of the Boards of my church on the following dates:

First Sunday of Every Month—(1) Board of Home Missions

Second Sunday of First Nine Months—Redden Chapel.

Second Sunday of October, November, December—(2) Board of Colleges, (3) Freedmen, (4) Ministerial Relief.

Third Sunday of Every Month—(5) Board of Foreign Missions

Fourth Sunday of First Nine Months—Home School.

Fourth Sunday of October, November, December—(6) Board of Education, (7) Church Erection, (8) Publication and Sabbath School Work.

Fifth Sunday—National, State and County Sunday School Work.

Book Mark Issued by Topeka Bible School

Examinations are held every six months on the graded lessons as published by the Sunday School Board and on supplemental work, which is outlined by the pastor and superintendent. The pupils are grouped about tables and as they are promoted from one grade to another pass to the next table, just as in school they pass from one room to another.

In addition to the regular Sunday school lessons for each department, missions is studied for the entire hour one Sunday in two months. Last year twenty-two classes undertook to support special work in Korea, and during the year the school contributed almost $1,000 to benevolent work. The school uses Trull's missionary textbooks and recently ordered 350 copies of the third series, one of which is put in each home represented in the school.

The brotherhood class occupies a room by itself in the Bible school house and there is a usual attendance of seventy-five men. A picture of this class in joint session with the brotherhood class of the Methodist church was published in The Continent several weeks ago. The Bible school is designed so that the movable partitions of the various classrooms can be arranged to give space for the gathering of all departments during the closing exercises.

As is necessary with every Sunday school which pretends to be run on a systematic basis, the Topeka school is provided with a large number of blank forms for use in the school. In addition to the enrollment card, which has space for the name of the one who brought the new scholar to school, there is also used a promotion card. Pupils in the intermediate department are promoted as they advance in the public school. The natural pride of the pupil and the interest of the parents are depended upon to induce the child to memorize the supplemental work required in this department. Cards are also issued for record of attendance of scholars when they are out of the city.

Another blank is provided to record the reason for absence from Sunday school when sickness is alleged. Cards are also sent to the teachers of different classes when a pupil is absent for a number of Sundays, with a request from the superintendent that report be made as to the reason for absence. A bookmark issued by the school as a reminder of the days for special collections is shown in the accompanying illustration.

So the three fell easily into conversation. "Did you ever pray for a heathen, Mr. Stuart?" Eleanor asked in the midst of it.

"I am neither priest nor curate, Miss Elmore. I am a Scotch Presbyterian."

"But Presbyterians pray for the heathen. I am a Presbyterian, and I do. I prayed for a little Jap man in Tokyo until my arms ached."

"But people don't pray with their arms, you know, Miss Elmore."

"Yes, they do. I found a little Jap in a temple who was too short to reach up to turn the great praying wheel, and I turned it until I was tired, but he would not let me stop. If each turn meant a sin to be forgiven he must be the worst sinner in all Japan. When I had secured absolution enough to satisfy him, he backed away a little and threw himself upon his face and bobbed his head until I said, 'You ridiculous creature, get up!'"

As they walked through the long avenue of palms Stuart told of his English home. He could not hold his own in the raillery which she loved; his mind was of the matter-of-fact English type whose conversation must deal with literal statements. Eleanor's holiday mood found his graphic word picture tiresome, and her father, noticing her bored attitude, reproved her for it later at the hotel.

"You were not a good listener today, Lennie."

"Why did he have to be so stupid, then? It was like taking plain bread and butter on a picnic. This trip of ours is just a big picnic, and I want sandwiches and lemonade and cookies. I can talk sense, if I have to, with you and mother, but who wants to talk sense with a man?"

It was speedily plain that Stuart, however, was in no picnic mood. The Yokohama fascination ripened at Nikko into love, as Eleanor was quick to comprehend.

"He is with us morning, noon and night, father," she laughed one day. "I am troubled about mother—he certainly has designs upon her. We never go for a walk but he manages to overtake us and get beside mother almost before we get started." She did not add how hard she herself had to maneuver for it.

She led Stuart a merry dance those days. He tried in every way to encounter her alone, but she never gave him half a chance. At last, the night before he was to leave Nikko, he came upon her suddenly alone.

"I must go tomorrow, Miss Elmore," he began abruptly. "But it is duty, not choice, that makes me go. Had I my way, I would stay where you are always, and——"

She broke in hurriedly before the sentence could be finished. "What a foolish thing that would be, to be sure! I wouldn't stay always with the best person on earth. What's more, I can't stay with you now, either. I was just on my way to answer a call of duty myself."

They were on the veranda; she turned toward the door that led to the brightly lighted interior. "You see," she said archly, "duty's call is harder on me than on you—yours doesn't call till tomorrow." With a gay "good night" she passed inside, and in the morning, when Stuart tried to see her for a final farewell, he found she had started early with a party for a tramp in the mountains.

Alone in her room that night Eleanor had addressed to herself a firm reprimand. "Don't you let that sort of thing happen again," she admonished herself in the glass. "It's fun, of course. But you don't want to cheapen the real thing by hearing the words that tell of it from every man that comes along. The man you love must be the first to say he loves you—and where he is now you don't know."

It was somewhat to her annoyance, therefore, after supposing that she would have no more need to use her efforts at prevention upon

Two Typical Cases

Among many equally deserving cases acted upon by the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation the following two, which were presented at its last regular meeting, very clearly reveal the sort of work the Relief Department is doing.

One is the widow of a minister who was killed in an automobile accident with one of their children, leaving her with a six year old boy to support. She was obliged to sell a part of her household goods to pay the funeral expenses.

The other is the widow of a minister who was a member of the Committee on Relief and Sustentation of his own Presbytery, and who by his death left to the care of his wife six children, all of them under sixteen years of age, the oldest a boy, nearly blind.

Can the Church view such conditions without Christlike pity?

Is the average annual grant of $172.00 to each of the 650 widows upon the roll of the Board anything more than a travesty upon the compassion of Christ?

Of our nearly Ten thousand churches, over Four thousand did not contribute one cent to this cause last year.

Stuart, that she found him directly opposite her in the dining saloon on the steamer from Nagasaki to Shanghai. "Can I never be rid of him?" she asked herself, while he was thinking, "Perhaps things will go a little my way now."

Next day he sought Mr. Elmore, whom he found alone on deck, smoking.

"Mr. Elmore," he said, "may I speak of a thing purely personal?"

"Certainly."

"I find myself very deeply interested in your charming daughter. I would greatly like to tell her that I love her."

"Well, why not?"

"That is for you to determine, sir. You know little of me, but I can substantiate all I say. I am a Scotch Stuart and have a fair fortune, but it can in no sense compare with what my fortune will be if I win Miss Elmore's hand."

The father was smiling. "It would suit me well," he thought. "It would end the Drum danger forever." Aloud he said only, "I will lay nothing in your way, Mr. Stuart."

in those pioneer days. They wandered fearlessly about, for they learned the use of firearms when they were very young. Occasionally they shot a deer, which was a great addition to the family larder. They trapped for mink and muskrat, and of fishing they never tired. It was a stirring, wild, romantic life they led, healthy and full of incidents that would make good stories.

One of Trowbridge's most vivid memories of his boyhood is the marriage of an older sister and her journey to Illinois when he was 8 years old. Illinois was the "far West" in those days, and the bride and bridegroom journeyed in a huge canvas-covered wagon drawn by oxen. It was in the winter time and the travel was slow, and they had not accomplished half of their long trip when they were obliged to halt for the spring thaws. When they reached the site of Chicago, the end of their journey, May flowers dotted the ground. Such was a frontier experience of 1835.

The backwoods Sundays lasted from sundown on Saturday night to sundown the next day, during which time no work was done except what was absolutely necessary. The whole family went to church except one member, who stayed home to look after things. They rode in an ox wagon, starting soon after breakfast and arriving home late in the afternoon. The church building was a rude affair without any heating apparatus, and each family carried a foot stove, which was heated with embers from the hearth of the nearest neighbor.

Young Trowbridge's first schooling was obtained in a log schoolhouse, which was succeeded by a red brick house, where he finished what education he had. He was not, he himself says, a great student until he was about 15, when his ambition was suddenly aroused. After he left school he procured some French books and without a teacher made himself master of the language. Later he learned Latin in the same way.

Those early days at school furnished an inexhaustible fund of anecdote and incident for the stories and novels of his later years. The traits and characters of his schoolmates, the virtues and failings of his schoolmasters, the peculiarities of the backwoods residents and the happenings of the rural neighborhood were all remembered and made into books for young people. Books were few at first in that country neighborhood, but when John was about 13 a small town library was organized at Ogden and the boy had an opportunity to read standard works. The "Leather Stocking Tales," Scott's "Ivanhoe" and "Kenilworth," Byron's poems, Shakespeare, Hume's England, Plutarch's "Lives" and Rollin's "Ancient History" were some of the books he liked best and reveled in. About this time he began to write, poetry at first, composing at one time a forty-five line poem on the tomb of Napoleon.

When he was 17 he wrote "A Carrier's New Year's Address" in competition for a prize, which he won—the first money he ever earned with his pen. The next year he went to New York and after one or two failures began the story work which has won him the warm affection of the young people, and of boys particularly.

Vaccination at 10 Cents an Arm

Guild House of First Church Engaged in Practical Work—Gymnasium to Be Installed in Basement of Ridgely Street Edifice.

BALTIMORE—First church will celebrate its 150th anniversary in September. A committee is at work preparing a history. The men's society is in charge of weekly shop meetings. Each week some member of the society addresses the meeting. The men also support a representative in the foreign field. The Reid Memorial guild house, connected with First church, is steadily adding new activities. About fifty volunteers and four paid workers conduct a daily kindergarten, night classes, boys' and girls' clubs, mothers' meetings on weekdays and a growing Sunday school. Two items of special interest in connection with the guild house are the recent tuberculosis exhibit and the vaccination clinic after Sunday school at 10 cents per arm. This latter item is especially interesting because of the smallpox scare here.

A girls' mission band, a mission study class of fourteen, a boys' club and a young men's guild have been organized at Ridgely Street church. A new floor is being laid in the basement of the church and the men's guild will open a gymnasium.

Lafayette Square church has introduced institutional work in the Sabbath school. The pastor is expecting twelve or fifteen to unite with the church soon.

Fulton Avenue church has just closed two weeks' evangelistic services. Rev. Gustave Briglieb of Arlington church assisted the pastor. The results have been gratifying.

Brown Memorial church received a Hebrew whom the pastor had baptized among others at the last communion. The men's club is increasingly active in social work of the city and the men's Bible class is taking a deep interest in the work of the juvenile court. They are trying to practice the big brother idea.

Westminster church is continuing to improve its property. Last summer the main auditorium was completely renovated. Work is now in progress on the chapel, which will be frescoed and recarpeted. Rev. I. C. Yeakel is assisting the pastor.

Outline Future Plans of National Brotherhood

Plans for the future work of the brotherhood were discussed in detail by the National Council at an all day meeting Feb. 11 in Chicago. Some of the men had traveled nearly a thousand miles to attend the meeting. Those present were, from the National Council: Charles S. Holt, Henry P. Crowell, Livingston P. Moore and Dr. W. C. Covert, Chicago; Hugh H. Hanna, Indianapolis; Ralph W. Harbison, Pittsburg; Charles T. Thompson, Minneapolis; A. B. T. Moore, Cedar Rapids; Dr. A. R. Taylor, Decatur; Dr. William H. Foulkes, Philadelphia, and Dr. A. H. Barr, Baltimore. From General Assembly's special committee: Dr. Aquilla Webb, Louisville; Dr. J. W. McDonald, Decatur, and Robert P. Hargitt, Cincinnati, and the brotherhood secretaries, Rev. Walter Getty, Dr. J. T. Henderson and Dr. Francis M. Fox. A special committee of Mr. Crowell, Carroll H. Sudler and Doctors Cleland B. McAfee, Covert and G. N. Luccock was named to supervise the Chicago men's campaign to be in charge of Dr. Fox. The need of additional funds to push the work of the brotherhood was emphasized during the discussions.

A resolution received from the committee on life and work of General Assembly urged the brotherhood to work specially in five departments — evangelism, organized Bible classes, social service and public morals, ministerial relief and sustentation, and missions. Dr. Barr, Dr. Foulkes and William H. Scott were appointed to represent the brotherhood at a meeting of the last named committee in Philadelphia Feb. 25. William Arnold, Paterson, N. J., president of the New Jersey brotherhood, was elected a member of the National Council. Dr. Henderson, associate secretary, will visit the larger cities of the East in the interest of the brotherhood.

Immigrant Work Is Widening

The Board of Home Missions through its department of immigration is cooperating with twenty-two presbyteries from coast to coast in carrying on work at sixty-seven different centers in as many immigrant communities. For this work, including three immigration fellowships, $75,000 has been granted directly to the field. Over eighty pastors, visitors and lay workers have been commissioned. In this ministry eight languages are regularly employed—Italian, Magyar, Ruthenian, Bohemian, Syrian, Scandinavian, Armenian and Polish. At such polyglot centers as the Cosmopolitan chapel in Indianapolis and the Neighborhood house in Gary, the workers employ other Slavic dialects.

A feature of this work is the chain of twenty-six daily vacation Bible schools carried on under the auspices of the department of immigration in New York, Brooklyn, Newark, Baltimore, St. Louis and Cleveland, enlisting an attendance of over 5,000 children, with 150 young men and women engaged as supervisors, principals and instructors.

Important Bills Are Sleeping

House of Representatives Committee Fails to Act on Measures to Benefit City of Washington—New Pastors Installed.

WASHINGTON—Christian people of Washington are much exercised over the utter failure of the house of representatives committee on the District of Columbia to take any action on some important bills referred to them many months ago. One of these is the Jones-Works liquor act, which contemplates more satisfactory temperance legislation for the district. Another is the Kenyon "red light" injunction bill. There has been little doubt in the minds of friends and enemies of the Jones-Works measure that it would pass the house by a large majority, if the committee should report it for action. The bill already has passed the senate. The tactics of the enemies have been to prevent action of any kind whatever in committee, and these bills still rest there, the first one having been referred to the committee on May 15, 1912. Since that time the committee has consistently failed to have a quorum for the transaction of business, although the friends of these measures, and the speaker of the house himself, have done everything possible to procure a quorum. Six members of the committee have absented themselves from every meeting. The result of this unprecedented failure to get a quorum is to defeat all district business, except trifling matters. And the further result is that Christian people of the district continue to look in vain for the moral legislation which certainly would be enacted by Congress but for this committee inaction.

John Carpenter Palmer, D. D., has been installed over Washington Heights church. Dr. Palmer comes from New York, where he was for ten years pastor of Bethlehem chapel of University Place church.

Rev. Alfred E. Barrows is another recently installed pastor who comes to the capital to Eastern church from Greater New York, where he was pastor of Wyckoff Heights church.

Rev. Howard J. Bell, a member of the last class graduated at Princeton Seminary, was ordained in December. Mr. Bell is to be assistant to Dr. Joseph T. Kelly, pastor of Fourth church.

The assistant secretary of agriculture, Hon. W. M. Hays, addressed the Presbyterian ministers recently on the subject, "The Church and Eugenics" The secretary is an active member of Chevy Chase church and a close personal friend of the pastor, Dr. H. R. Johnson.

Professor Giovanni Luzzi, D. D., of the Waldensian Theological Seminary in Italy addressed the Washington auxiliary at its annual meeting in the Church of the Covenant. The very optimistic attitude of Professor Luzzi with reference to Protestantism in Italy and the waning power of Romanism there was both surprising and cheering to those who are alarmed by the increasing menace of Romanism in this country. Laymen Renew Mission Interest Week's Conference in Indianapolis by Rev. G. H. Trull Shows Advance in Financial Support—Many Prominent Church Guests.

INDIANAPOLIS—Under the auspices of the local church federation the third anniversary of the laymen's missionary convention has just been celebrated. Over 100 men sat at the dinner, where addresses were delivered by G. Campbell White and Rev. George H. Trull, missionary secretary of the Foreign Board. The latter also conducted a week's series of conferences based upon the book "The Call of the World." The schedule of comparisons exhibited an encouraging increase of interest in missions, both as to total gifts and per capita.

During this same week an interesting Sunday school conference was in session at Second church under direction of the State Sunday School Association. The modern spirit of the gathering may be inferred from the speakers and courses, which included Dr. R. P. Shepherd of St. Louis, on "Pedagogy"; Mrs. Mary F. Bryner of Chicago, "Elementary"; W. E. Chalmers of Philadelphia, "Psychology," and Mr. Trull, "Missions."

Special meetings have been in progress at several churches. At Troub Memorial Dr. E. L. Williams, pastor, was assisted by Rev. Charles Lawson of Trinity Congregational. At Grace Dr. A. C. V. Skinner was assisted by Rev. E. L. Buchanan of Garrett, Ind. The former pastor is now absent in South Dakota conducting evangelistic meetings, while his church interior is being redecorated. Dr. J. P. Moffatt of West Washington Street church has reestablished evening services, inaugurating the movement with a series of stereopticon lectures. At Seventh church "young people's week" was recognized by a Sunday evening anniversary meeting under the auspices of the Christian Endeavor society and addressed by Rev. R. N. Fulton of Fourth church. At the same time an extended campaign for increased attendance and Bible study was announced in the Sunday school, one of the results of which was the organization of a pastor's class of young married people that has enrolled forty-five in two weeks.

Another advanced effort of the Church Federation of the city is the series of lectures on "Moral Aspects of Social Diseases" to be given by Dr. Charles P. Emerson, dean of Indiana University School of Medicine. Dr. F. O. Ballard of Memorial church is delivering a series of evening addresses upon "The Meaning of Marriage Vows."

An enthusiastic men's club has been organized at Tabernacle church; the opening banquet, with covers for 100, was addressed by J. N. Feasey of the Baptist brotherhood and by Rev. Claude R. Shaver of Seventh church. The speaker announced for the next meeting is Governor Ralston. C. R. S.

Declines Los Angeles Pulpit

Dr. M. A. Matthews, moderator of General Assembly, who was recently invited to the pastorate of Immanuel church, Los Angeles, has declined the call. He believes that his work in Seattle is not yet done.

A series of religious meetings under the auspices of the Presbyterian Board of Education was held at Wilson College Feb. 6 by Dr. Charles Erdman of Princeton Seminary and Dr. Alfred H. Barr, pastor First church. Baltimore, Md.

AS TO FLAVOR
Found Her Favorite Again

A bright young lady tells how she came to be acutely sensitive as to the taste of coffee:

"My health had been very poor for several years," she says. "I loved coffee and drank it for breakfast, but only learned by accident, as it were, that it was the cause of the constant, dreadful headaches from which I suffered every day, and of the nervousness that drove sleep from my pillow and so deranged my stomach that everything I ate gave me acute pain. (Tea is just as injurious, because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.)

"My condition finally got so serious that I was advised by my doctor to go to a hospital. There they gave me what I supposed was coffee, and I thought it was the best I ever drank, but I have since learned it was Postum. I gained rapidly and came home in four weeks.

"Somehow the coffee we used at home didn't taste right when I got back. I tried various kinds, but none tasted as good as that I drank in the hospital, and all brought back the dreadful headaches and the 'sick-all-over' feeling.

"One day I got a package of Postum, and the first taste of it I took, I said, 'That's the good coffee we had in the hospital!' I have drunk it ever since, and eat Grape-Nuts for my breakfast. I have no more headaches, and feel better than I have for years." Name given upon request. Read the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Postum now comes in concentrated powder form, called Instant Postum. It is prepared by stirring a level teaspoonful in a cup of hot water, adding sugar to taste, and enough cream to bring the color to golden brown.

Instant Postum is convenient; there's no waste; and the flavor is always uniform. Sold by grocers—45 to 50-cup tin 30 cts., 90 to 100-cup tin 50 cents.

A 5-cup trial tin mailed for grocer's name and 2 cent stamp for postage. Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

"Your money back"

Is a common expression in business. It means just what it says when you buy advertised goods.

Because satisfaction is guaranteed by the advertiser. But did you ever go into a shop and buy unadvertised goods—and later ask for your money back?

You probably found that "back" meant "credit checks" and "exchange slips" and other things that wouldn't pass as REAL money with any blind cashier at any bank!

Therefore why not insist upon advertised, trade-marked, "money back" goods?

Will Support China Missionary

Minneapolis Church Takes Enlarged Interest in Foreign Work—Legislature to Help Congregations Unite.

ST. PAUL-MINNEAPOLIS—One of the happy aftermaths of the China campaign here is the raising by Bethlehem church, Minneapolis, Dr. Stanley Roberts pastor, of a pledge of $1,000 for three years for the support of George Francis Brown of the senior class in Princeton Seminary. This is additional to a previous amount pledged for the support of Rev. Mr. Clark in Korea.

White Bear church under the lengthened leadership of Dr. J. C. Robinson has been greatly blessed in special services. Dr. Stanley Roberts assisted. The response upon the part of the men of the community was most encouraging.

The city press has given wide publicity to the series of Sunday evening sermons on "Marriage and Divorce" by Dr. H. N. Wilson, Central church, St. Paul.

A bill has been introduced into the legislature to amend the law concerning the consolidation of churches so that First church and House of Hope, St. Paul, may unite.

Bethany church, Minneapolis, situated near the state university, is confronted by great responsibilities and opportunities. Rev. Eliot H. Moore, recently of First church, St. Paul, was installed pastor last Wednesday evening. Rev. M. B. Irvine, moderator of presbytery; Rev. A. G. Patterson and Dr. Stanley Roberts took part.

During the week of prayer for college students Andrew church, Minneapolis, enjoyed services by a former pastor, Dr. M. D. Hardin of Third church, Chicago. Good results are reported.

Rev. George E. Davies recently addressed the united Christian associations of Macalester College in anticipation of the visit of Dr. Joseph Cochran and Rev. G. G. Mahy of Philadelphia, who are spending the week end in special services with the students.

Dr. M. D. Edwards and Rev. George E. Davies are attending the home mission council in Omaha this week, the former as the representative to the intersynodical council and the latter as chairman of synod's committee on home missions and Sabbath school work.

Dissolve One Pittsburg Church

Building Turned Over to Mortgagee — Want Moderator's Traveling Allowance Cut—Over 3,000 New Members in McKeesport.

PITTSBURG—The mission committee of presbytery Feb. 11 recommended the dissolution of Westminster congregation April 1. The session is to have power to grant letters of dismissal up until that time. A short time ago the property of this congregation was turned over to the holder of the mortgage and Rev. Sylvanus Haupert released from the pastorate. The committee also reported that the subcommittee appointed to investigate and report plans for a rescue mission in the downtown section of the city was investigating the work in other cities and will be ready to report soon.

An overture to the General Assembly asking that the custom of setting aside $2,000 per annum for traveling expenses for the moderator be discontinued was adopted unanimously by presbytery.

Rev. John Schmidt von der Launitz, the veteran pastor and founder of First German Presbyterian church, Allegheny, died recently. Mr. Launitz served First German church for fifty-three years and was the oldest pastor in point of service in the city.

Rev. Robert Kirk, pastor of Second Central church, McKeesport, read an exceedingly interesting paper to the ministers Monday, Feb. 10, on "Methods in the Sunday Meetings." Mr. Kirk was chairman of the executive committee in charge of the Sunday campaign, just closed in McKeesport. The churches of the city are filled to overflowing, and already about 3,000 members have been added. The civic conscience has been aroused and McKeesport is a different city in respect to vice and lawlessness. The only criticism was on the campaign of money raising on the last day.

Old Church Has a New Home

First of Several Buildings for Ninth Congregation Dedicated Last Sunday—Associated Churches to Use Display Advertisements.

PHILADELPHIA—Ninth church dates its organization to the early part of the nineteenth century. It worshiped from 1841 until 1911 at the corner of 16th and Sansom streets. It then united with the Sherwood congregation in West Philadelphia and removed to 57th street and Washington avenue. Here under the pastorate of Dr. J. A. Higgons it has received large accessions to its membership and has in course of erection handsome buildings. The first of these for Sunday school, temporary church auditorium, social services and institutional work was dedicated Feb. 16. The sermon Sunday morning was preached by Dr. William H. Roberts. In the afternoon the Sunday school, whose superintendent, Elder Craig N. Ligget, is also the chairman of the building committee, held interesting exercises and was addressed by former superintendents and Rev. Alexander Mackie. In the evening the congratulations of presbytery were extended by its moderator, Rev. Wiliiam Biggerstaff, and a sermon was preached by Dr. Loyal Y. Graham. The following Wednesday evening greetings were received from Rev. R. Montgomery, Rev. C. S. Stevens, Rev. Alexander Mackie and Rev. J. M. Wallace.

Woodland church's pastor, Rev. J. R. Swain, is preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons on "Men and Women of the Cross." Recently the pastor's father, Dr. George Swain of Allentown, N. J., preached.

WOMEN TO HOLD ANNUAL MEETING

The annual meeting of the Philadelphia Interdenominational Woman's Home Mission Council will be held in Westminster hall Feb. 27, 10:30 a. m. and 2 p. m. The speakers include Mrs. Wade of New York, Mrs. Mary B. Wilson, Mrs. Quinton, Mrs. Layten and Rev. G. A. Learn of Alaska.

The forty-third anniversary of the William O. Johnston Missionary Society of Union Tabernacle church, Dr. Robert Hunter pastor, was celebrated on a recent Sunday. The speaker was Rev. Frank A. Keller of China.

The managers of the Presbyterian and Reformed School for Christian Workers recently entertained several hundred ministers and their wives at the Deaconess Home. Dr. W. H. Roberts, Dr. R. W. Miller and Deaconess Edith Stone addressed them. A musicale for the benefit of the school will be held in Witherspoon hall Feb. 25 at 3 p. m.

The Ministers' Social Union at the February banquet heard an address from Cornelius Woelfkin, D. D., of Fifth Avenue Baptist church, New York, on "The Religious Value of Moods."

USE HALF PAGE ADVERTISEMENTS

The publicity committee of the Associated Churches began this month to publish a half page display advertisement each week in a city paper.

George C. Shane, a wealthy merchant of the U. P. church greatly interested in missions, sailed last week for Egypt and Palestine to study conditions in the mission field. He took as his guest Rev. Thomas C. Pollock.

The Sunday school of First church, Germantown, Dr. W. B. Jennings pastor, conducted with good results a month's campaign to increase its membership. Rallies were held in the church Tuesday and Friday evenings.

The Sunday school of Chambers-Wylie church held a memorial service for the late pastor, Dr. Frank DeWitt Talmage, Feb. 9.

Rev. William B. Cullis, prominent forty years ago as a Presbyterian minister in eastern Pennsylvania, died at the George Nugent Home, Germantown, recently, aged 69. He had been for some years in the Baptist ministry.

Live Convention of Jersey Men

The New Jersey State Brotherhood this year kept up its good reputation for a stirring convention on Lincoln's birthday. The entertaining organization this year was the vigorous body of men connected with the church at Flemington. The attendance was about 175 and the sessions were full of go. The opening address was a stirring bugle call message from Dr. S. D. Nelson of Minneapolis, whose theme was "Brotherhood Men to the Front." Dr. W. Y. Chapman of Newark argued that the social side of brotherhood fellowship ought not to be considered nonreligious, but that every elbow touch of men with men must have a spiritual effect if spiritual motive is maintained behind it. Dr. W. F. Whitaker of Elizabeth conducted a most stimulating conference on personal work. John R. Boardman of the Goodwill Farm for Boys in Maine got very close to the consciences of the men by impressing the Christian obligation involved in the modern movement for eugenics.

Dr. Edgar Whitaker Work of New York City, speaking on Bible study and afterwards conducting a conference on the same subject, awakened greater response than was manifested toward any other speaker. It was obvious that a real hunger to know more of the Bible is latent in the brotherhoods. Rev. A. W. Sonne, Flemington, told of the surprisingly successful work which he has been able to do as a side issue in a country church. All of the state officers were reelected.

Good Things in This Issue

For the Seeker of Facts

An excellent example of the effort which The Continent constantly is making to be of the largest possible service to its readers is shown in this issue in the account by Otis G. Dale of the way business is done by one church. This Colorado experience will be read with interest by every church trustee. The recital of the way in which the church enlarged its benevolences without the strain felt under the previous system may suggest many things to churches all over the country. In connection with Mr. Dale's statement concerning subscriptions for The Continent by the church for contributors it may be of interest to know that two of the largest churches in two big Central West cities subscribe for several hundred copies of The Continent. These churches believe in the multiplied advantages of a church paper.

The article by Dr. Milner on Lincoln and his stand on temperance is a fact well worth remembering and repeating.

The missionary page is full of facts.

Financial Situation

Banker Warns Inexperienced from Stock Exchange—Safety of Principal Is Vital—Government Assails Board of Trade.

"The stock exchange is the best illustration we have of men preying on human weaknesses," said Charles G. Dawes, former controller of the currency and president of the Central Trust Company of Chicago, in a recent address in Chicago. He said that the inexperienced investor in listed stocks on any exchange has only to expect that he will be fleeced. He talked of the manipulation of stocks and said that the average investor always bought at an inflated price. Then something happens and the investor sells the stock at a lower price than he paid for it. He said there is no way for the average investor to "beat the game." He also earnestly warned men against investing in propositions advanced by promoters who promise unusually large returns.

Mr. Dawes did not by any means suggest that, because some investments were not for the average man, the small investor should keep his money in a stocking. He suggested that money invested in a business run by a friend who was making money at it ought to be profitable and safe. Investment in gas and electric companies honestly managed he also approved.

In both of his recommendations he shows that the element of safety occupies a large share of his attention. Manipulated stocks are denounced because the power is all in the hands of others who make much of their money through manipulation. This same element of security is in farm mortgages when the amount loaned bears a fair relation to the actual value of the property.

That the element of safety has a large hold on the mind of the foreigner who is working in this country is shown by the increase in postal savings accounts and decrease in foreign money orders. Before the postal savings banks were established over $109,000,000 was sent abroad each year in money orders, with the amount increasing $17,000,000 a year. There is now $35,000,000 in postal banks and the international money orders last year amounted to only $97,000,000.

The Chicago Board of Trade, the largest factor in the country in the sale of grain, has been made defendant in a suit by the government under the Sherman antitrust law, charging the fixing of prices of grain during the hours of the day when the board is not actually in session. This suit immediately followed the charges against Frank M. Bunch, former president of the board, for "bucket shopping."

It was in 1887 that the first Sunday school issionary was commissioned by the Presby- rian Board of Publication and Sabbath School ork. His name was R. F. Sulzer and he is ill organizing Sun- y schools in Minne- polis. He was osen to present to r. Alexander enry, the board cretary, an album pictures of the issionaries who at- nded the anniver- ry conference in hicago last week. he meetings closed hursday night after all day Sunday hool institute anned for the orkers of Chicago. oard officers and ght missionaries hen went to St. ouis, where meet- gs were held two days. During the con- rence all phases of the work of the mission- ries and educational superintendents were dis- ussed by those present and by the board of- cials. Conference was held one morning at cCormick Seminary, and Wednesday evening issionaries attended various prayer meetings f local churches.

R. F. Sulzer

The board now has 152 missionaries and six ducational superintendents. It is through the ork of the latter men that the church is hop- g large things in bringing present schools to higher standard of excellence. Rev. E. Mor- s Fergusson of the board, who has general versight of the educational work, gave a series f lectures during the conference, designed to npart information of latest methods in Sun- ay school work.

In addition to reports of the continuous ad- ance which missionaries are making along the rontier, the most significant thing connected ith the recent conference was the announce- ent that the board is concluding arrange- ents for a new scheme of Sunday school raining to be tried in Iowa. A thoroughly apable man is to divide his time among the resbyterian colleges in that state, organizing lasses in Sunday school methods so that the upils when they return home will be fitted start teacher training classes, act as super- ntendents or organize Sunday schools. In ad- ition, summer schools of a week or two in he various towns of the state are included in he scheme to bring instruction in Sunday chool work to the homes of those who are nable to get it in other ways. The denomina- ion in this is taking an advanced step in bet- er work along Sunday school lines. It is oped that a large body of lay workers will hus be trained and some of the students stim- lated to take theological training.

A successful series of meetings was con- ucted at Lerna, Ill., the first three weeks of anuary by A. H. Kelso of Mattoon, who is now iving a portion of his time to this sort of vork. Rev. A. W. Denny is pastor.

Will You Break a Habit to Make $3.00?

Stop putting your savings in the local bank where they net a paltry three per cent; investigate a better-paying investment—one that guarantees you all your money earns.

INVESTING FOR PROFIT

Demands a better return than three cents per year for an able-bodied American dollar—it means double that amount. Three per cent is starvation wages—not profit but loss. It stands for the other three per cent you do not get—the three per cent the bank gets for reinvesting your funds. And they invest them in sound first mortgages—something you might better do for yourself. Others are doing it—investors big and small Putting their money in reliable first mortgages—secured by two to four times the amount involved. These Oklahoma Mortgages are the very same the banks buy with your money. Why not buy direct and save? Let us explain how easy it is to double your money's earning power

Women Campaign for China

Public Meetings to Begin Feb. 28 -Ambassador Bryce Entertained by Ministers–Neighborhood House as Memorial at Princeton.

NEW YORK—A China campaign in New York City and vicinity under the auspices of the Women's Board of Foreign Missions will culminate in a series of meetings from Feb. 28 to March 3. The women's boards have undertaken to raise $300,000 and the New York women aim to raise $75,000. The series of drawing room meetings now being held will be followed by public meetings addressed by Doctors Arthur J. Brown and A. W. Halsey, secretaries of the Foreign Mission Board, and by missionaries from the front. There will be popular rallies and special meetings. Arrangements are in charge of a local executive committee representing the churches of New York Presbytery.

The Executive Commission of General Assembly will meet in this city next week. The death of Dr. William H. Hubbard will make much reorganization necessary.

Ambassador James Bryce, the retiring representative to the United States from the court of St. James, was the guest at a luncheon of the clerical conference of the New York City Federation of Churches Monday, Feb. 17, at the Hotel Astor.

WEST END CHURCH ANNIVERSARY

West End church, Dr. A. Edwin Keigwin pastor, celebrated its silver anniversary Sunday, Feb. 9. The preacher both morning and evening was Dr. John Balcom Shaw of Second church, Chicago, the founder of the church and its only other pastor. The church has 2,025 members and 1,019 in its Sunday school. Dr. Andrew A. Dinsmore is assistant pastor. The church is talking of erecting a seven or eight story parish house.

Guy R. McLane of New York has arranged to build a neighborhood house for the benefit of the Italian colony in Princeton, N. J., as a memorial to his wife, the eldest daughter of Dr. Henry van Dyke, who died recently. It will be called Dorothea house. Dr. van Dyke has set aside land adjoining Avalon, his Princeton estate, and the neighborhood house will be started at once. Before leaving New York for the winter Dr. van Dyke presented a library to the Grenfell Seamen's Institute at St. John's, Newfoundland, to be known as the Dorothea Memorial library. Dr. van Dyke himself selected every book in the library of 175 books.

There was a great celebration at the Chinese Presbyterian church the evening of Feb. 17 in observance of the first anniversary of the Chinese republic. The principal speaker was the Chinese minister to this country. The program was arranged by Rev. Huie Kin, pastor of the church and founder of the mission. Dr. John Henry Jowett of Fifth Avenue church took part.

Rabbi Sidney E. Goldstein spoke recently at the Labor temple religious forum. This is the third address in a series given by rabbis.

Explain Changes in Divorce Laws

Public Meeting Called by Commission Agitating Improvement in Statutes–Church Census of Chicago in Sight.

CHICAGO—As one of the means of getting before the people information concerning inadequate marriage and divorce laws, and contemplated changes, a public mass meeting will be held Saturday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock in the La Salle hotel. At the suggestion of Dr. W. S. Plumer Bryan of the Church of the Covenant, who is a member of the commission which has been agitating a change in the laws, it is probable that a statewide "divorce Sunday" will be urged upon the ministers of Illinois. It is planned that on a set day the pulpits shall explain the provisions of the amendments which the commission seeks to have adopted. These amendments provide among other things for the appearance of the state's attorney in all divorce actions, with a provision governing marriages previously arranged to evade laws of this or other states by leaving original jurisdiction.

Catholics, Protestants and Jews will cooperate in a citywide census of social conditions which is being arranged by a committee of churches and clubs. Plans have been under discussion for several weeks and were furthered at a meeting of delegates last Tuesday. It is hoped that a census of the whole city can be made with as much detail as was accomplished in the twenty-first ward survey, which will be described in The Continent soon. Dr. G. B. Safford, assistant superintendent of the Church Extension Board, is the Presbyterian member of the committee.

Dances in the social room of the basement of Wheaton church are said to have been a potent factor in increasing the interest of young people in the church. Rev. Robert L. Shepherd, pastor, says that the dances are under careful supervision and there is no serious objection to the practice.

Rev. August Karl Reischauer, a graduate of McCormick Seminary, now a missionary in Japan, is giving a series of lectures in the chapel of the seminary on "The Challenge of Buddhism to Christianity in Japan," the last of which will be given Feb. 21 at 7. p. m.

The ministers Monday morning joined with other organizations in inviting the national convention of the Anti-Saloon League of the United States to meet in Chicago next November. The ministers also expressed their sympathy with the efforts of railway trainmen to eliminate Sunday labor.

Dr. John Balcom Shaw and his wife received the delegates to the Sunday school conference at their home one evening last week. The conference was held at Second church.

First church of Oak Park gave an example of neighborliness last Sunday when the vesper service was omitted so that members might attend the golden jubilee services of First Congregational church.

The session of First church, Evanston, is working on a plan to have all the larger benevolences of individual members of the congregation reported through the church treasurer.

Third church has the distinction of having a Sunday school teacher who has taught continuously for thirty-nine years. Miss Anna E. Wing at a recent dinner of the class told some of the early struggles of the church.

A pleasant surprise awaited the large congregation in Kenwood Evangelical church Sunday morning, Feb. 9, when the former pastor, Dr. Crosser, stepped into the pulpit which three years ago he vacated in answer to the summons of the American church in Berlin, Germany. He is in this country in the interest of his work in the German capital. Following an introduction by the pastor, Rev. Albert Joseph McCartney, Dr. Crosser spoke briefly. He is on his way West and will probably occupy the pulpit of Kenwood church some time during April.

Popular hall is crowded each Sunday afternoon at services held under the direction of Rev. George A. Kilbey of the Christian Industrial League. These services have been started recently in addition to the evening meetings.

News Notes from Various Fields

Illinois

Churches of the southern part of the state are pushing the convention of men to be held at Albion Feb. 27 and 28.

Dr. S. S. Cryor

A year ago the pastor of Oregon church, S. S. Cryor, D. D., who had just come from a neighboring field, where he had been pastor for twelve years, began raising money for church improvements. He first secured $1,000 from Andrew Carnegie for a pipe organ. The church needed more room for Sunday school work, so additional funds were raised for this and for a new steam heating plant. An old debt made the sum needed $7,000. This has been successfully raised and all paid but a small amount. The entire sum was raised by the pastor. The church numbers only 150.

Heyworth church has had a very profitable revival season. The meetings began Jan. 13, with Rev. A. T. Cory, pastor, preaching each night. Rev. W. S. Neely, Jerseyville, led the singing. A new furnace has been put in the church. A new pipe organ is ready to be installed and the money all provided for it.

Missouri

The evangelistic institute planned for Feb. 23-25 in Kansas City has been postponed indefinitely.

The Board of Home Missions has been asked by Carthage Presbytery to conform its rules to the spirit of the budget plan and require a gift to every board as a condition for granting aid to any church. During the recent meeting of First church, Joplin, Dr. Robert E. Speer presented the emergency call of China and indorsed the endowment fund for the Board of Relief and Sustentation after a speech by Dr. W. J. Darby.

Minnesota

Rev. Frank L. McKean of Price City has withdrawn his resignation at urgent request of his people.

Evangelistic meetings were held in the Clitherall church by the pastor at large, Dr. S. F. Sharpless, and a communicants' class was organized.

Oklahoma

Rev. R. A. Flickinger, formerly the superintendent of Oak Hill Academy, has been appointed by Kiamichi Presbytery to represent it at the citizenship conference in June in Portland, Ore.

Rev. E. B. Surface, pastor of Maywood church, Oklahoma City, assisted Rev. LeRoy Thompson of Alva in a two and a half weeks' successful evangelistic meeting. All of the churches of the city cooperated.

Michigan

The annual meeting of Port Huron First church showed that the church has paid off a mortgage and raised nearly enough for all out-

Albion Christian Endeavor society celebrated Christian Endeavor Day Feb. 2 by having a special service instead of the regular evening church service. The principal address was given by Rev. E. H. Lougher, chaplain of the state prison at Jackson. Rev. Charles E. Huffer is pastor.

West Virginia

First church, Parkersburg, which has recently grown after revival meetings, has engaged H. H. McCain as assistant to Rev. E. A. Culley.

A special campaign on behalf of China was held in Wheeling and vicinity Feb. 12-17. Among the speakers were Dr. W. M. Hayes, Dr. J. C. Garritt, Rev. W. T. Locke and a number of other missionaries from China. The meetings opened in Bridgeport, Ohio, on Feb. 12 and the next day at Shadyside and Rayland, Ohio. The meeting in Wheeling opened with a conference for women Friday afternoon. Saturday there was a luncheon for men at noon. Various pulpits were occupied by missionaries Sunday morning and evening.

New Jersey

Feb. 10 a large Christian Endeavor society was organized at Englewood West Side church. John A. Phillips, a publisher of New York, was elected president.

First church, Englewood, Rev. Robert Davis pastor, is enjoying a ten weeks' course of reading and study on China led by Dr. T. H. P. Sailer of the department of education of the Foreign Board. Recently over 100 attended the class on a Wednesday evening. Dr. Fleming James, rector of St. Paul's Episcopal church, and a member of the congregation debated the question of race traits hindering progress in western education and civilization.

New York

Byron church under the leadership of Rev. Theodore T. Hays has organized a large men's choir and branch of the brotherhood.

Evangelistic services are being held in Sag Harbor church, Rev. William T. Edds pastor, under the leadership of John Henry Elliott, D. D., of Oak Park, Ill.

Rev. John H. Niles of Trumansburg and for over fifteen years pastor of the church presented his resignation recently. But the people by an overwhelming vote requested Mr. Niles to withdraw his resignation, which he did.

Wisconsin

The Sunday school of Kilbourn has doubled in size since the coming of Rev. O. E. DeWitte.

Benevolent offerings last year at Rosedale church, Rev. W. F. Goff pastor, were much larger than before.

Mrs. S. L. McKee of West Salem has been assisting Rev. L. H. Shock, pastor of First church, Beaver Dam, in a series of meetings.

The Christian Endeavor anniversary was observed at Assembly church, Beaver Dam, with appropriate exercises, closing with an address by the pastor, Rev. T. S. Johnson.

Pennsylvania

Chester Presbytery at a late session answered the overtures on federation of churches and reduction of the Assembly in the negative.

Ministerial Obituary

Rev. David M. Lewis

Rev. David M. Lewis, pastor of the church at Lathrop, Mo., died Jan. 28, aged 65 years. He was born in Pittsburg, Pa., and educated at Marietta and Yale, graduating at the Yale Divinity School in 1883. He was ordained by the Congregational Church and for more than twenty years did effective work in that denomination. Four years ago he received a call from the Presbyterian church at Garden City, Mo. About a year and a half ago he took charge of the work at Lathrop and Green Valley. Two children with their widowed mother survive. Funeral services were held at Lathrop, Rev. A. W. McGlothlan of Savannah officiating.

Obituary

Death notices will be inserted at the rate of one cent a word. PAYMENT MUST BE SENT WITH THE NOTICE. Those who ask their pastor to write such notices should be careful to hand him the money to forward with the copy.

ANDERSON—James Kenelm Anderson, Jr., aged 34 years, son of Mr. and Mrs. J. K. Anderson of Milwaukee, entered into rest at Oshkosh, Wis., on Christmas Day. His boyhood home was at Waukesha, Wis., he was educated at Carroll College and Lake Forest University, and graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1901. At the seminary he was a member of the "Benham Club." He afterward did missionary work in the South, before the illness overtook him from which he never recovered. A rare Christian devotion characterized him from his earliest years, and through his long ailment his faith was his great support and joy. He was a member of the Immanuel church of Milwaukee at the time of his death.

KEDZIE—George L. Kedzie, for three generations a prominent figure in the business life of southern Ohio, died at his home, near Yellow Springs, Ohio, Jan. 25. He was born at Delhi, N. Y., in 1821, and was over 91 years of age when he died. He united with the Presbyterian church when a boy and was active in the work of the church for nearly eighty years. In 1858-59 he practically built the beautiful little church still occupied by the Presbyterian congregation at Yellow Springs, and he was a ruling elder in that church for more than half a century. In every crisis that this congregation faced he was, humanly speaking, "the strong tower of her defense" The bulk of his estate, amounting to nearly $100,000, has been left to the Home and Foreign Boards of the Presbyterian church and to the Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work.

That Gymnasium for DUBUQUE

Plans have been prepared for a gymnasium at Dubuque German College and Seminary. They call for $30,000. The salary of a physical instructor has been assured for five years by a friend. The several hundred students, vigorous young men, accustomed to hard work, must have a place for physical regeneration. It is a necessity.

What will be

Readers of The Continent know of the supremely important work this institution is doing in training preachers for foreign speaking people in this country. It fills a real need. Its best work is prevented because the young men lack opportunity to exercise, especially in winter.

Many of the students come from German families of the Middle West, sons of farmers. Others have come to Dubuque from rural homes in foreign countries. Some have been accustomed to the hardships of camp life in the Balkans. All have been used to activity in the open air. To confine these men to class rooms most of the [illegible] with no adequate provision for compensating physical recupera[illegible] is to impair their capacity for study as well as endanger health.

Sparks Marion E † jan13

Some one will offer this $30,000. Wouldn't you like the joy of knowing that it will be your money which in the years to come will continue to help thousands of young men to better manhood?

Somewhere there may be a person of comfortable means who will be glad to erect such a monument to a son, a father or a husband, which shall serve for generations. Such an opportunity comes but seldom. It may be YOUR OPPORTUNITY.

You May Be the One to provide, as the exclusive giver, for this whole building. Or you will wish to write to the President, Dr. C. M. Steffens, Dubuque, Iowa, and tell him that you want to have at least some definite share in this project. In either case we should like to correspond with you.

Fear and courage

Sometimes you will hear people say they don't read advertisements because they don't believe in them. Yes—and there still remain a few who are afraid of "steam cars"!

This spirit of distrust is a survival of past ages. But we are no longer beasts of prey—the world is growing better all the time!

Mind you—it is no trouble to make and sell a thing to a FEW people. Anybody may do that! But it requires courage and conscience and conviction to ask all the world to buy one's goods.

This is exactly what our advertisers are doing. Now—wouldn't they be foolish, indeed, if they didn't "make good" on every statement?

Profit in Buying Life Insurance by Mail

Buying life insurance by mail in a unique experience to one who has been accustomed to having solicitors in twos and threes lie in wait to expound the advantages of their company. The Postal Life Insurance Company employs no agents and yet has $50,000,000 insurance in force, and during 1912 collected $1,830,336 in premiums. The sign of the mail bag, with the brief statements why Postal Life saves the insured money, is becoming a familiar sign to magazine readers.

That the business is growing is shown by the comparison of 1911 with 1912. In the former year the new business amounted to $1,100,000 and in 1912 the risks written amounted to over $3,000,000. The increase in advertising expense was only 10 per cent.

The Postal Life Insurance Company does business in every state in the union and thus comes under the scrutiny of all the insurance departments which now protect the interest of the public. The home office is in New York City and it is complying with the laws of that state in disposing of all real estate except that occupied by the home office. The admitted assets of the company according to an audited statement on the first of this year amounted to $10,107,298. The liabilities include additional reserves of $287,184 in addition to the nine and a half million required by law.

All the business is done by mail. The amount which an agent would get with other companies is paid the insured in the form of special dividends.

Program for Livingstone Centenary

March 19 is the 100th anniversary of the birth of David Livingstone. As it is within four days of Easter the Foreign Board in its Easter program has included the features of the Livingstone centenary. The program is entitled "The Message of Light."

Programs, supplements and coin envelopes for these exercises will be furnished free of charge to schools pledging their Easter offering to the Board of Foreign Missions. Orders should be sent to Rev. George H. Trull, Sunday school secretary, room 908, 156 5th avenue, New York City.

Around the Shop

If there should be among the readers of The Continent an individual who feels cheated by the use of this space to exploit the whimsicalities of the Around-the-Shop Man, here is the possibility of relief:

Bring to the A.-t.-S. Man reasonable evidence that The Continent does not more than justify by its helpfulness the earnest efforts of any live pastor to circulate it among the families of his congregation.

The Around-the-Shop Man will at once retire if you make good. Be sure of your evidence, and don't all speak at once.

Possibly you could convince the Around-the-Shop Man, but you'd have a hard job of it with Dr. Charles M. Brown, pastor of First church in that humming city, Joliet, Ill. Dr. Brown never had to be shown the light; he hunted up the light himself. He believes that if a religious paper is worth anything, it's worth using, and using so that it will help church members and their church. Discover the things that will help them, and the pastor needn't worry about his part of the work. Here is the sort of note Dr. Brown has been printing in his bulletin, along with the weekly and regular church notices (without any hint or request from The Continent):

> Miscellaneous—Read in The Continent of Jan. 30 these special articles. "Spiritual Meaning of Ministerial Pensions," "How People Can Make a Preacher," "The Pastor Hunt," "The Man Who Leads Southern Laymen," "A Man Who Went to China to Be Converted." If you have not the paper, get it from your neighbor. You can have mine. Keep these splendid articles going. Make them work for the church.

A live paper, a live minister and a live church make a combination that will impress any community.

Are you making your church felt to the full extent of its possibilities?

Isn't something like this worth trying?

Playing ragtime music
Reading light fiction
Making doubtful friends

These actions have many points in common, as Mrs. Newell Dwight Hillis shows in "Playing on the Top of the Keys." This article by the deservedly popular writer for young women proves that a balanced ration of reading is necessary for symmetrical growth. She has several pungent comments also about friendship and its difficulties. Mrs. Hillis touches some of the intimate problems of a girl's life and gives the basis on which they should be solved. Every mother and every daughter will want to read this.

A West Point on the Mississippi

A Tailor with a Vision

Adrian Van Vliet, a poor preacher-tailor, found in the Middle West little or no opportunity for Germans to be educated for the ministry. He started Dubuque German College and Seminary by taking one pupil with him in his home. Others came until the dwelling was too small. That was the beginning.

Dubuque has trained 159 ministers

Most of the students who have attended this Presbyterian institution have been Germans, although in recent years large numbers of other foreign speaking young men have come asking for training so that they may preach to their fellow countrymen in America. They are helping to solve the immigrant problem on a Christian basis. It is to care for the physical condition of these energetic young men that a gymnasium is asked. It will cost $30,000 to build the structure which is now planned. The physical director's salary is assured for five years. The institution is offering an opportunity for one or a number of people to have a vital part in this work. Suggestions of the part you want to take will be gladly received by Dr. C. M. Steffens, President, Dubuque, Ia.

God Aid the President!

"GOD SAVE THE KING!" So in an Old World monarchy courtiers cry when a sovereign takes his inherited crown. With feeling more spontaneous and more fervent, because his rank and place derive from their own commission, citizens of the New World republic, as their incoming national magistrate approaches his inaugural, should join to say in better invocation:

"GOD AID THE PRESIDENT!"

For on the chief of state whom the people's franchise has chosen to execute their will, the most needful blessing to be prayed from the Ruler of nations is not a lease of honors which would prolong his personal renown, but endowments of wisdom, courage and endurance empowering him to serve adequately the manifold requirements of his nation's weal.

Let then all Americans who by any creed have attained to such faith in heaven's guidance as enables them to pray, unite now to offer, in behalf of him who next week is to take his office oath in the glorious succession of the American Presidency, this loyal supplication:

"GOD AID THE PRESIDENT!"

God aid him to receive and hold his high office in solemn fear of that almighty and eternal sway which, amid all confusions of human contention and vicissitudes of human change, moves supremely on to accomplish the sure purposes of infinite right.

God aid him to be the humble and unwavering servant of the Universal Will whose majestic march through time it is the noblest privilege of the great among men, as of the lowly, to share and further.

God aid him, when clamorous tongues around ply him with pleas for selfish favor and reasons of selfish sophistry, still to hear clearer than all else in his soul the same simple axioms of integrity which were plain to him when he meditated on duty and ideals in his private citizenship.

God aid him, when perplexed issues puzzle statecraft and the divided counsels of even the excellent-minded point to divergent paths, yet to know by deeper insight than the rest —or failing that, to feel by quicker sympathies—what measures will most minister to the well-being of the many and the growing perfection of human brotherhood in the American democracy as also among all peoples.

God aid him ever, by instant instinct, to prefer right to expediency; quick justice above paltering compromise; outspoken candor rather than veiled evasion; fearless acknowledgment of error instead of pharisaic extenuations; the keeping of a good conscience beyond any gain by sharp practices, and withal, for himself and for the nation, weal and wealth accumulating to the spirit of man sooner than the pride or strength of external success.

God aid him to speak to the people comfortably when trials abound; patiently when hard problems delay; soothingly when unrest is astir; arousingly when lethargy prevails; warningly when evils multiply; encouragingly when struggle is on; inspiringly when ideals fall low; and truthfully, wisely, stalwartly always.

God aid him, when his own hour of temptation comes, either from those who would persuade him that his nobler purposes are hopeless or from those who would offer him the barter of a rich truce for a dubious conflict, then to be faithful – then to be unflinching—then to be strong.

God aid him to defend the weak and champion the poor.

God aid him to keep the first and the second commandment—to serve his presidency in deepening love of God and widening love of men.

"GOD AID THE PRESIDENT!"

Assassination a Weapon in Mexico; Intervention Withheld

Organized murder and assassination reigned in Mexico last week under the desperate rule of Generals Huerta and Felix Diaz. President Francisco Madero and Vice-President Suarez were killed in a midnight ride from the national palace to the penitentiary; a few days previously Gustavo Madero, the president's brother, was shot under cover of the fugitive law—a pretense that he had been killed in an attempt to escape—and others of lesser prominence fell. Human life seemed as insecure as it was in the days of the French revolution.

It is unprofitable to review recent bloody events in detail. The forces under President Madero and Felix Diaz bombarded each other to their hearts' content; hundreds and thousands were slain in the streets of the capital, but just when the fortunes of battle were about to favor Madero he was betrayed and seized by Huerta, who at the crisis proved faithless instead of faithful. Huerta and General Blanquet made a combination with Diaz, and Huerta was proclaimed provisional president, with Diaz an avowed candidate for the permanent incumbency. It was affirmed and denied that the aged Porfirio Diaz, uncle of Felix Diaz, would return in triumph from his exile to help celebrate the destruction of Francisco Madero (the man who actually came near to representing the people of Mexico). But it does not appear likely that the Diaz-Huerta-Blanquet dynasty will have leisure to do any celebrating for a while.

Thirty-five thousand American troops were available for service in Mexico last Monday. Two brigades were dispatched to Galveston, which is within three days' sail from Vera Cruz, the seaport of the City of Mexico, and there are already American battleships on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Mexico. But President Taft said this did not mean war. "Preparedness," not "intervention," is the watchword of the retiring administration. Conditions in Mexico somewhat resemble the situation in China in 1900, brought about by the Boxer rebellion, except that foreigners have not been the object of attack. In the Boxer troubles the United States participated with the other great powers in a joint military expedition to Peking. But in the present instance the United States could not ask for nor well consent to a joint movement in Mexico, because of the Monroe doctrine, which compels this country to play the role of international policeman in the other republics of this hemisphere.

Just what armed intervention by the United States might mean is explained by The Army and Navy Journal, which says that President Taft recently asked one of his military advisers what a war with Mexico would require. The answer was "200,000 men for two and a half years and the expenditure of $1,000,000 a day"—a total little short of a billion dollars. Even from a purely selfish standpoint would it be worth while? The area of Mexico is nearly equal to that part of the United States east of the Mississippi, with a widely scattered population of 15,000,000. Much of the land is difficult of access. The Mexicans have the love of independence if not the genius for self-government, and it is certain they would fight against alien rule, as they did in 1867 against the French, even though that rule were designed to promote their country's best interests.

Mexico's Belated Education in Self-Government

Mexico is receiving, late in life, the education in democracy and republican institutions which the nation should have had years ago, and which it might have had during the last quarter century had not Porfirio Diaz arrogated to himself all governmental authority, playing the part of a benevolent despot instead of permitting a proper succession of chief executives and a general sharing of responsibilities. If he had been content to allow the Mexican people, from the highest to the lowest, to exercise real self-government, they would, no doubt, gradually have worked out their own national destiny, instead of remaining in the condition of quarrelsome children, ignorant of political self-control, with vicious instincts uncurbed and with but slight training in managing their own affairs in orderly, twentieth century manner. Had Porfirio Diaz been immediately followed by another autocrat, equal to that veteran at his best, or had Mexico not been cursed with a crowd of turbulent, insatiable, self-seeking looters, its history might have continued as peaceful as Brazil's after the big South American nation had ousted Dom Pedro. But with a band of more or less high-class cutthroats and murderers overrunning the country—a lot of land pirates whose doings are reminiscent of the dark ages—the situation is desperate. The only hope seems to be that the various factions will wear themselves out in fighting, and peace will come from sheer weariness and lethargy. Plunder is still to be had, however, and "glory" of a certain kind. Americans who have just returned from the shot-and-shell-riddled City of Mexico are most pessimistic concerning the outlook.

General Huerta, who turned traitor to President Madero, promises to "rule with an iron hand" and to restore order at all hazards. If he is as strong as his words indicate Mexico may now have in prospect another Porfirian regime, but there seems to be little of the Napoleonic about Huerta, and as for Felix Diaz, he is of a different piece than his domineering and dictatorial old uncle.

No New Hope for Turkey as War Progresses

The Turks seemed to have fared no better in the Gallipoli peninsula than they did on the plains of Thrace. Enver Bey, the Turkish chief of staff who was active in overthrowing the preceding administration, attempted to lead an expedition which he landed on the northern coast of the Sea of Marmora, but the effort was a dismal failure, according to reports which became public last week. Enver himself narrowly escaped with his life, and his soldiers were huddled at Gallipoli, almost destitute of supplies. The location was the long narrow neck of land which stretches to the southwest of Constantinople and to the south of the besieged Adrianople. Some 70,000 troops had been secretly landed here by the late Nazim Pasha to flank the allies, but the allies were alive to what was going on and their first move after the resumption of war was in this direction. They drove the Turks into the narrowest spot, at Bulair, where a line of Turkish forts checked a frontal attack. Enver's plan was to strike the Bulgars from the side. Some bloody fighting occurred, resulting in heavy Ottoman losses, but details of the engagements have been concealed. The Greek ships are said to have played a notable part.

The plucky Montenegrins were seriously repulsed at Scutari. But this incident, while it hurts King Nicholas and his little kingdom, gives slight hope to the Ottoman government.

China to Have a New Alphabet

After making a systematic study of all the alphabets of the world a committee of Chinese scholars have formulated a new alphabet of forty-two characters, to supersede the cumbersome ideograms which were the pride of the ancient Chinese and the puzzle of the modern world. Five vowels have been taken from the Latin, four from the Greek, four from the Russian, one from the Chinese and two are elongated signs and seven are reversed ideograms. Fourteen consonants are Latin, three Russian and two Greek. With these it is declared to be possible to write all the words used in any part of China. An effort is to be made at once to introduce the new alphabet into official circles, and this peaceful reform promises to be one of the most notable in the history of China's centuries. To the missionaries it can readily be seen that it will be especially helpful.

Victory for Arbitration in Labor Disputes

A railroad strike which would have paralyzed the section of the United States north of the Ohio river and East of Chicago has been at least temporarily averted by the agreement of the railroads and the locomotive firemen to arbitrate their differences under the provisions of the Erdman act. Fifty-four railroads and nearly 40,000 men are involved. The men had voted their officials authority to call a strike, but it was generally recognized that the public could not tolerate such a vast interruption of business. If wages are raised as a result of the arbitration the railroads may be expected to renew their demand for an advance in rates, which has been denied by the interstate commerce commission.

In Great Britain the three principal unions of railway workers have been amalgamated as the result of a recent conference in London. The three organizations have a membership of about 200,000 persons. An executive body of twenty-four members is to be set up, vested with absolute power to call a general railway strike at any time, though this latter part of the plan has not yet been ratified. It would have the effect of lessening the importance of the existing official boards of conciliation.

Cause and Cure of Divorce Are Studied

Sentiment against divorce is being crystallized throughout the country through the efforts of various volunteer organizations, as previously recorded by The Continent. In Chicago an important meeting was held under the auspices of the Illinois commission on marriage and divorce in the Hotel La Salle on Saturday, Washington's birthday, attended by jurists, clergymen and representative citizens, who thoughtfully discussed the evils arising from easy marriage and easy divorce. A number of causes and remedies were suggested. Lack of discipline among American children was one of the causes suggested. Judge Marcus Kavanagh, the chairman of the commission, pointed out that national action would prove the most efficacious, as the problem affected the whole nation. Judge John P. McGoorty stated that three-fourths of the boys in reformatory institutions are from homes where parents have been lost either by death or divorce. D. R. Forgan, a well-known bank president, advocated both a physical and a financial examination of prospective bridegrooms, and after deprecating lax marriage and divorce requirements urged absolute uniformity of procedure in every part of the United States; also an effort to have the present laws better administered, and a guarding against collusive divorces.

The resolutions adopted call attention to the development in this country of an insidious spirit of disregard for the marriage state, extended to such a degree that during the last fifty years divorces are increasing more than three and one-half times faster than the growth of population, and continue to increase in still greater proportion.

Putting the People in Touch with Congress

A plan which contains promise of large usefulness has been set on foot by a small group of public-spirited men and women living in various parts of the country, to let the people know what is going on in the people's great lawmaking body, the Congress of the United States. At the close of an address delivered at the City Club of Chicago recently the plan was briefly outlined by one of its active promoters, Lynn Haines, who has done newspaper and publicity work of a patriotic nature in Minnesota and in Washington. The Congressional Publicity League is the name of a proposed nonpartisan organization which is to attempt to do on a national scale the kind of educational and informative work which has been done in a local way by associations in Illinois, Minnesota, California and other states.

Mr. Haines points out, as have other observers, that behind the scenes and even sometimes in the center of the stage at Washington things happen or fail to happen which the public does not know or understand, or if the public does apprehend and wishes to cure, is unable to apply a remedy. Good legislation is unaccountably delayed, meritorious measures have a way of dropping out of sight, ancient abuses remain, reforms meet obstructions, popular demands are ignored, and yet this same public is unable definitely to place blame on anybody's shoulders. Newly elected congressmen, thirteen months after their election, go to their first regular session filled with the intention of improving conditions, only to find themselves practically powerless. The system of rules and methods of procedure, the devices for smothering legislation not desired by powerful leaders and the interests which they represent, all commonly work with precision and effectiveness, whether the leaders be Cannon or Underwood or Aldrich or Penrose or any one of half a dozen more who might be named. Under the new rules of the house the floor leader has the autocratic power formerly exercised by the speaker. The new member is helpless and so are his constituents, but the projected league intends to let "the folks back home" know what their representative is doing, so that they can treat him intelligently and fairly. Publicity must be the chief weapon of an organization of this kind. Revision of the rules so as to make Congress more quickly responsive to public opinion is advocated.

For an Inquiry Into the Cost of Living

As an example of one of the desirable measures which have been held up through the workings of the present system of "chloroforming" legislation which certain persons may not want brought to final vote the Crawford-Sulzer bill for an international inquiry into the high cost of living may be cited. It was introduced in the house by Mr. Sulzer, now governor of New York, and in the senate by Senator Crawford a year ago, after being recommended by President Taft in a special message. It has been indorsed by ex-President Roosevelt and approved by the President of France and other foreign statesmen, and has not been a partisan issue. The bill was postponed last summer until after the presidential election as a matter of political tactics, and now it is blocked by a full calendar, unless it is favored by a "special rule," so it seems likely that it will go over for another year. Friends of the bill, which carries an appropriation of $20,000, say it would clear away some of the "mysteries" of the rise in the price of commodities, and would enable statisticians to coordinate and render available the data of various nations in a useful way. A study of cooperative farming and distribution is within the purview of the measure. Professor Irving Fisher is quoted as saying that "there has seldom been an opportunity for the whole world to gain so great results with so little effort and expense."

Country's Benevolent Institutions Increasing

A special report on benevolent institutions in the United States is in course of preparation by the federal census, and preliminary figures show 5,397 institutions reported, classified as organizations for the protection and care of children, for the care of adults, for the education and care of the blind and deaf, and hospitals and dispensaries. In these institutions, or under their care, there were at the close of the year over 380,000 persons. As compared with the previous report, that for 1904, the number of institutions reported shows an increase of 1,350, and inmates of institutions show an increase of 96,000. There was a large decrease in the number of persons received into institutions for adults and children, and a small decrease in the number received into institutions for the blind and deaf.

Two items are of special interest—the collection for the first time of data in regard to the placing out of children in families, and the notably increased interest manifested in the treatment of tuberculosis, which accounts to a very considerable degree for the increase in the number of dispensaries and to some degree of hospitals and sanitariums. The decrease of more than 100,000 in the number of persons received into institutions for the care of adults or adults and children is chiefly confined to institutions for the temporary care of men who are destitute.

Noting the distribution of institutions in the states, it appears that New York leads with 797, an increase of 200 over the figure in 1904; then follow Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Illinois and New Jersey. Almost all the states show an increase (generally in about the same proportion), which would indicate that the interest in the problem of caring for those who may be called "wards of the state" is by no means limited to the centers of population, but extends throughout the entire country.

The Duty of the State to Children

The question of whether the state should pension widows and the extent to which authorities should go in protecting children from the weakening effect of early labor will be among the subjects discussed at the annual conference of the national child labor committee to be held at Jacksonville, Florida, March 13-16. The general subject will be child labor and poverty. Many southerners will speak of conditions in their local factories. Every governor has been asked to appoint official representatives and reports will be received of the advance of child labor legislation in practically all the states. Dr. Felix Adler, Mrs. Florence Kelley, Miss Julia Lathrop, Sherman C. Kingsley and Owen R. Lovejoy, all well known for their work in this field, will be among the speakers. Mr. Lovejoy is general secretary of the committee.

Picturesque Tales of the Parcel Post

The parcel post has already justified its usefulness to such an extent that Congress and the post office department are considering its extension. In January, its first month, 40,000,000 packages were carried. Senator Smith of Michigan lately introduced an amendment to admit books and also small nursery stock to the parcel post classification. Some wag suggests that "nursery stock," in the form of babies, has already been shipped by parcel post. From South Carolina there recently came a picturesque tale of a carrier on a lonely route who had to deliver two babies and a wooden leg. He was confronted by a wildcat, but with the wooden leg as a weapon he speedily worsted the wildcat and was able to bring both the babies and the leg safely to their destinations.

One Chicago woman received by post a hot mince pie from a friend in St. Paul. The pie had been packed in a self-cooker box and was reported to be in good condition on arrival.

—One of the big banking concerns of New York lately notified its employees that those of them receiving salaries of less than $100 a month must not marry, under peril of dismissal and failure to share in the company's pension fund. If all ministers of the gospel, not to mention other important members of the community, were to take this injunction seriously to heart the number of celibates would markedly increase.

Presbyterian World Council at Aberdeen

The first details of the program for the tenth general council of the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance this coming summer are made public in summary form. The council is to be in session in the Highland city of Aberdeen, Scotland, from Tuesday, June 17, to Friday, June 27, inclusive. The opening sermon is to be preached in St. Machar's cathedral of Old Aberdeen by the famous principal of the city's university, Dr. George Adam Smith. Immediately following the sermon the president of the council, Dr. David J. Burrell of New York, will deliver the presidential address. On the days following the regular forenoon and afternoon sessions of the council will be held in the large hall of the Young Men's Christian Association on Union street. At these sessions the committee reports of the council will be heard and discussed and technical subjects of theology and ecclesiastical organization will have consideration.

The evening meetings—for which the programs are not yet completed—will deal with more popular themes. The evening of the opening day, however, will be devoted to the reception tendered to the delegates by the lord provost, the magistrates and the town councilors of the city. The American denominations belonging to the alliance all appointed their delegates last year. How large a proportion of the appointees will be able to attend is not yet certain. The American secretary of the Alliance, Dr. W. H. Roberts of Philadelphia, has the direction of arrangements for the American representation.

Baptists Persecuted Again in Russia

William Fetler, the Baptist pastor in St. Petersburg, writes to American friends that religious persecution against Baptists is on foot once more in Russia. Besides a number of minor local incidents, in which community police have made trouble for Baptist preachers or people, the general government threatens to promulgate a rule forbidding preachers of the church to travel from place to place on preaching tours. If the rule is put into effect, in the form that the government has forecast, it will confine each pastor's efforts to the one town where he is registered as a resident. But as Mr. Fetler says, Baptist Russians feel the pressure of the commandment, "Go ye into all the world," and they expect to defy the regulation if it is adopted. Naturally, heavy fines, imprisonment and even exile would be expected in that case.

From Odessa Rev. V. Pavloff reports that he has been obliged to pay a fine of $250 for performing a marriage ceremony for two members of his own church because the police discovered that the bride had not formally declared before the magistrate her separation from the Orthodox communion. He is also under indictment for having allowed to be published in his church paper a statement in which a Baptist, explaining his conversion, attributed it partially to his disgust with the character of the Orthodox clergy. If convicted on this indictment, Mr. Pavloff will be subjected to a prison sentence. In the same letter the Odessa pastor reports a prison sentence imposed on a Baptist preacher because he undertook in his sermon to persuade certain Greek Catholics present to leave their church. From another source comes the story that in the province of Livonia all the Baptist chapels have been closed and padlocked by the secret service agents of the czar. These things all happen in Russia, in spite of the fact that the constitution of the empire nominally guarantees complete religious liberty to the people.

Tenth Religious Education Convention

As The Continent stated some weeks ago, the Religious Education Association is to keep its tenth anniversary with a national convention held at Cleveland, Ohio, on the four days from March 10 to 13 inclusive, during which time thirty distinct general and sectional sessions will be held to consider moral and religious training in every phase which modern conditions make crucial.

The general sessions to be held on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings and on Thursday morning will be grouped under the comprehensive theme, "Religious Education and Civic Progress." President Judson of the University of Chicago, President Falconer of the University of Toronto and Rabbi Wise of New York City will speak on "Training Young People for Civic Religion"; Dean Sumner of the Episcopal cathedral in Chicago on "The Double Standard of Morality," President Vincent of the University of Minnesota on "Social Religion" and President Mullins of the Louisville Theological Seminary on "Training Ministers for Civic Leadership."

The devotional session of the convention will be held in the Young Men's Christian Association on Tuesday at 4 o'clock. The sections of universities and colleges, of Christian associations and of Bible teachers will meet together on Tuesday and Wednesday. The department of theological seminaries will hold one meeting alone on Wednesday and a joint meeting with the departments of churches and pastors on Thursday. On Wednesday the department of churches and pastors will meet jointly with the departments of Sunday schools and Christian associations. Its independent sessions will be held on Tuesday and Thursday. The department of public schools will hold its meetings in connection with the department of the home. At this meeting Professor Squires of the North Dakota State University will present the plan by which North Dakota high schools now give credit for Bible study done out of school hours, and Rabbi Grossman of Cincinnati will speak on the topic, "The Bible in the Schools."

Weekday Bible Schools in Summer

The Daily Vacation Bible School Association, of which Robert E. Speer is president and Robert G. Boville is secretary, sends out from its central office, 40 Bible House, New York, an appeal for public interest in its work through the coming summer. As is now pretty well understood, this society's purpose is to encourage and to arrange for the opening of city churches every weekday through six weeks of July and August for Bible schools to which neighborhood children shall be invited.

To rural communities it may seem incredible that ordinary children could by any hook or crook whatever be enticed within the walls of a schoolroom during summer vacation time. But city experience is different. Children whose only playground is the hot streets are found more than willing to exchange its stifling atmosphere on a July day for the cool interior of a comfortable church building. And this is the fact in which Mr. Boville, originator of vacation Bible schools, has discovered a vast opportunity for the church.

Last summer in twenty-four cities 160 churches opened schools of this sort and 38,000 boys and girls daily came to learn about the Bible. To be sure, the Bible was not the sole element of teaching, but music, calisthenics, kindergarten games, various forms of light manual training and first aid lessons were brought in as additional attractions. Yet none of these interests excel the hold of the Bible itself on the children of the streets, whether Protestant, Romanist or Jewish. Especially the immigrant children come willingly and listen eagerly. As much Bible is taught in these six weeks of vacation as could be taught in seven months of Sunday school.

A further aspect of the vacation Bible schools which must appeal to the Christian economist is the employment of Christian college students on the teaching force of these schools during weeks in which they would otherwise be idle. Over 700 students were so employed as teachers last summer, thus being at one and the same time trained in practical Christian service and afforded aid toward the expense of their own schooling. A number of important colleges are already disbursing part of their scholarship funds in this way through vacation Bible school channels.

Mr. Boville calculates that in fifty American city centers there are no less than 1,500,000 children who could be brought into touch with the churches through this ministry. The expense of the schools is in every case borne by local committees—not by the national organization—but the latter asks for $20,000 to be expended in the next three summers on organizers sent out through the country to spread abroad the idea. The association is interested for the idea only and encourages the opening of schools everywhere on this plan, even though many of them are entirely separated from its own auspices.

Methodist Men Have New Secretary

The Methodist Brotherhood has just provided a general secretary to succeed the lamented Dr. Fayette L. Thompson, who died at the close of the Men and Religion campaign, almost a year ago. The new officer of the brotherhood is Dr. William Sherman Bovard, a native of Indiana, who has recently been serving as vice-president of the Methodist college at Chattanooga. Previous to that time he had pastoral experience in both Maine and California. From these facts a thorough acquaintance with the country and all parts of his denomination may be inferred without question. Secretary Bovard is one of six brothers, all of whom are prominent in the Methodist ministry. Two are presidents of Methodist colleges in southern California and Montana, and a third is editor of The California Christian Advocate, published at San Francisco.

Slipping Up the Alphabet

AN EXPERIENCED TEACHER advised his younger friends to be very simple in their teaching, to remember that their pupils did not know a great many things which they themselves could take for granted. He gathered up his advice in this sentence: "Remember that many things that are A B C to you are X Y Z to others."

It could be added that it is the teacher's business to make X Y Z facts become A B C facts. He is greatly helped by the tendency of all facts to slip up the alphabet from the unknown to the known end of it. Everything tends to pass from strangeness to familiarity. It is one of the blessings of God, but, like all blessings, it involves a certain amount of danger. There is such a thing as growing accustomed to that which always ought to have for us an element of mystery. The greatest facts of life are always mysterious. We may overlook the mysterious element and allow these great facts to be coolly commonplace to us. That is the danger. But the blessing of this tendency of the strange to become familiar is very much greater.

People always tend to slip up the alphabet. Friendship is a wonderful fact. Here you are with your circle of friends. Some of them you had never even heard of a year ago. When you first saw them their faces, their names, their manner of life, were entirely strange to you. Now, they have become familiar. They have worked into the very commonest of your experiences. You know them so much better that you can hardly think of yourself as being without them. So it is that the best services are rendered our lives. There is something wrong with us if our circle of friends does not increase, if we do not have people constantly passing from strangeness to familiarity in our lives.

The danger of it is expressed in the old saying, that no man is a hero to his valet. That is a reflection on the valet rather than on the hero. It only means that the valet did not have a capacity to see greatness because he was so concerned with seeing the inevitable little things of life. We are never intended to exhaust the meaning of our friends. There is always a little element of the X Y Z in them. Young people in their first friendships tend to turn their hearts wrong side out and show everything that is there. It is never a good form of friendship. But it is a great blessing that people can grow so familiar to us that, while they retain an element of the unknown, we can hold them fast by what we do know.

Possessions tend to take the same course. The luxuries of one generation are the commonplaces of the next and the absolute necessities of the third. Some of us who are not so very old can remember when business houses in New York City included in their newspaper advertisements the fact that they had telephones, as proof of their progressiveness. In the city of Chicago today there is one telephone to every eight people. Farmers nowadays feel like apologizing if they have not direct telephone connection with the city. In many homes there is no more discussion about having a telephone than about having breakfast. The luxury has passed into a necessity. It is so with electric light. It is so with all other so-called modern improvements. In a certain village two or three houses stand vacant and will not rent because they have not "the modern conveniences." They were, however, built only twenty years ago, and what are called modern conveniences are as recent as that in the town. But they have become necessities to most people.

Read Walter Scott's stories to see how the average laboring man of today is in better condition than the lords and barons of that early time. The priceless boon of an education was available for the rarest few of a century ago. It is so commonplace now that a great many despise it. Dr. Cuyler in an early letter describes the first sleeping car he ever saw, and expresses wonder at the convenient arrangement of it. Yet he describes such a car as no company would put on the road today for emigrants. The things which he counted so remarkable would not be endured now. The luxury has become a necessity. It has slipped up the alphabet from the unknown to the known end. That is true of possessions without number.

Ideas tend to take the same course. At first they are so offensive as to seem revolutionary. They are opposed tooth and nail. After a while they begin to look familiar. Gradually they no longer awake any resentment. Finally they are accepted as commonplace facts. It would be impossible to make Galileo's theory a novelty before an audience today. It has slipped from the bottom to the top of the alphabet. The theory of evolution has followed the same course. The theory of the progress of revelation is in the same path. At the first all these theories were strange. They seemed not compatible with familiar ideas. As time has passed they have grown into familiarity and no longer seem enemies, but close friends of our intellectual life.

Did not Jesus mean that he himself would want to take that same course with us? He was not willing to call us servants, and stand far away from us as a Master. He called us friends instead, because friends can know each other. Certainly that is the tendency of Christian experience. We come to know more and to feel more familiar with the things of Christ. It is one way of measuring our progress. Do we know him better? Has he passed from the unknown to the known? Does he fit more into our common life, and does our common life more and more take its form and direction from him?

To Anyone Seeking to Be Moderator—No!

Spring birds are not more sure to be a-wing in March than a covey of moderatorial booms flying toward one or more of the Presbyterian General Assemblies dated for May. Wherefore The Continent deems it seasonable in the end of February to say again what in substance it said soon after last General Assembly time—that for the credit of the church this whole flock ought to be mercilessly hunted with ammunition guaranteed to be fatal to ambition and self-seeking.

Progress from bad to worse in the use of political methods to secure personal honors in the church has gone far enough to demand drastic measures to end it. For the Christian cure of the condition the only adequate measure is a frank and unreserved adoption of the standard of the apostle Paul, who prescribed that Christians must in honors and distinctions prefer not themselves but one another. Nay, more, the standard of Christ himself, whose condemning woe was heavier on no one else than on those who loved chief seats in the synagogues; who rebuked his disciples no more severely for any other evil slant than for their aspirations after rank in his kingdom.

To be sure, we must admit that good men do these things—propose themselves for advancement and recognition in the church; but they do so not because they are Christian but because in this spot they are not Christian. It is vain to quote, as has been done in General Assembly by way of apology: "If a man seeketh the office of a bishop he desireth a good work." A Presbyterian knows that bishop does not mean moderator. In the apostolic age the bishop was simply a hard-working pastor, and whoever desired the office desired it not for honor's sake but for the sake of service. The moderatorship in contrast is a place of honor pure and simple. Whoever says he seeks the position for sake of service merely deceives himself with a form of words in order to avoid calling his selfish ambition by its unpleasant proper name.

Knowing full well how grave a thing it says, The Continent declares here its positive conviction that henceforth no man ought to be selected to the chair of moderator in any General Assembly who has given the least occasion to suspect that he covets the place. Only by this rigid rule, in our opinion, can the horrible unchristian habit of "making a fight" for distinction in the kingdom of God be obliterated. And nothing less than obliteration of it can square the church with the plain teachings of its Master. Better far that all the men of eminence in the church shoud be passed by and that the choice should fall upon some man too obscure to have dreamed of receiving the honor, than that the place and its distinction should be esteemed the reasonable reward—as is now with amazing complacency often assumed—of the most shrewd and relentless candidacy for it. Perhaps the obscure man might be less efficient—and then just as likely he might not—but whichever way that went, the gain to the church spiritually by accepting its Lord's principles unabated and without provision for human self-love, would be worth a thousand times more than technical efficiency in any line.

Out upon the whole miserable business of moderatorial campaigning! Let the church set its face against it determinedly. And the way effectually to stop it is to take care that it shall always be unsuccessful.

An Apostle for and of Liquor

Now that the interstate liquor bill is passed there is no need of holding grudges against the men who worked so long and so hard to defeat it; but just for the illumination of certain questions of religion and character, it ought to be remembered that when the liquor traffic was on its final stand against the bill in the senate, the man it picked out as its fighting champion in the last ditch was Reed Smoot, senator from Utah and Mormon apostle. Was there ever anything more grotesque in the legislative history of America? A man who claims to be an apostle of the only true church of Jesus Christ standing up for a business that is the foe and stumblingblock of morality everywhere! But "birds of a feather flock together," and the alliance is really a significant sidelight on the amount of genuine religion that it takes to be a Mormon apostle.

Silly Sneers at a Man Above Sneers

The Continent has long considered The Catholic World the most fair and admirable of all periodicals that represent in America the papal church. But certainly The World is degrading itself to a much lower classification than this when it permits a review of Robert Speer's book on "South American Problems" to appear in its columns laden with slurs against the personality of the distinguished author. The slanderous reviewer is permitted to say:

> "Mr. Speer has mistaken his vocation; he ought to pose as an ex-priest in some of the small illiterate towns of the Southland; he would then be certain of an audience prepared by tradition and lack of mental culture fully to appreciate his mouthings. . . . The book is unscholarly, inaccurate, prejudiced, dishonest and hypocritical."

The American people know Robert E. Speer too well to miss rating justly the meanness of all this. The sneer at the South will aid in an accurate estimate. If the man who wrote the review had not the gentlemanly instincts to forbid the use of such language, he ought at least to have had the sense to realize that he would by it characterize himself and not Mr. Speer. Catholic papers are always trying to shame Protestants for the alleged uncharity of their antipapal criticisms, but in point of fact they are themselves worse addicted to discourteous writing than any other class of journalists in this country.

Why So Offish from the Southerners?

Why is the Freedmen's Board at Pittsburg so gingerly about giving aid to the fruitful and effective work of John Little among the colored people in Louisville? This year, although Mr. Little's mission was commended to the board by the Assembly, a skimpy hundred dollars or a little more is all that the guardians of the Pittsburg treasury are willing to grant him. Yet a couple of years ago, without any Assembly imprimatur, it appropriated a thousand dollars there to match the thousand dollars which the Southern Board at Atlanta is wisely investing with Mr. Little annually. That was a match game that ought to have been kept up, but it hasn't been. Why have the Pittsburg gentlemen backed out of the partnership? Certainly nothing has happened to disparage John Little.

This is only one of a number of signs that may be fairly taken to indicate in the Pittsburg board a deep-seated prejudice against cooperation with Southern Presbyterians in evangelization of the colored people. The prejudice is certainly unfortunate, for it is prejudice against the mind of the church. Northern Presbyterians are undoubtedly strengthening every day in the intention to work with Southern Presbyterians on this one task, even if they can join hands on no other. It is so obviously necessary. Both Christian fraternity and practical good sense call for common undertakings in behalf of the negro race. Northern Presbyterians are too remote from the main seat of this problem to understand it fully; Southern Presbyterians too close to it to see it in exact perspective. Therefore a brotherly admixture of sincere ideas from both sources is needful to produce wisdom to meet the responsibility rightly. The Freedmen's Board ought to be encouraging that admixture. And John Little's melting pot is a most convenient utensil to begin the mixing in. Better use it.

How Can Just Men Vote for an Injustice?

The Continent is trusting that spring presbyterial reports will bring in a large number of negative votes from small presbyteries on the pending overture for reducing the size of the U. S. A. Assembly. The overture is plainly calculated to abridge the power of the large presbyteries, and their adverse votes might therefore be charged to self-interest. On the other hand, every self-interested reason would prompt small presbyteries to vote for it. The measure will cut down their Assembly tax a little and will much increase their relative weight in the church. For them the only reason to vote in opposition to the proposal is the fact that it is utterly unjust.

Therefore the number of adverse votes coming in from presbyteries that will not lose by the reduction is going to be a rather accurate measure of Presbyterian sensitiveness to injustice. As anyone can see who figures out the ratio between membership in the congregations and members of the Assembly, the big presbyteries which send more than two Assembly commissions really have, despite appearances, less representation proportionately than the small presbyteries sending only two. And the amendment now pending would make this matter worse, for it would cut off commissioners from big presbyteries while leaving all small presbyteries untouched. The present disparity would thus be greatly increased. Who can call that fair? But if it is not fair, will anybody vote for it?

A poignant test, is it not? The Continent feels that only inattention and failure to analyze can permit the adoption of the overture. Thorough debate must kill it. Let just men therefore be on guard in every presbytery to make sure that all the implications of the proposition are seen clearly. The Assembly ought to be reduced, no doubt, but it is much better to have no reduction than to have doubt cast on the affinity of Presbyterianism for the "square deal."

—Something surprising has happened in Baltimore, for the honorable school board of that city has actually gone into partnership with the Anti-Saloon League on a prize competition. Every pupil in the highest five grades of the schools is to write an annual essay upon "The Effect of Alcoholic Drinks on the Human Mind and Body." There are to be 400 prizes, which the Anti-Saloon League is enabled to offer by the generosity of a millionaire supporter. All that the league expected from the board was simply permission for the pupils to take part, but the board got enthusiastic and made the exercise obligatory. The nine children who succeed best with the work will receive $50 apiece. All of this seems to make a good hint for other millionaires, other Anti-Saloon Leagues and other city boards of education.

—Dr. Talcott Williams, the director of the Pulitzer school of journalism in connection with Columbia University, was one of the speakers who at the Men and Religion conference last spring deplored the failure of the church and the press to understand one another. And Dr. Williams makes it apparent that he has not forgotten what he said on that occasion, by arrangements which he has just completed for a series of lectures before his students, wherein representatives of the principal denominations of the country will present the distinctive characteristics of each denomination. The graduates of Dr. Williams's courses are not to be left subject to the old reproach of being unable to tell the difference between a bishop and a moderator.

—"The finest association building in the country" has been a phrase that has traveled around from one American city to another until it has enjoyed temporary lodgings in practically every considerable center. Twenty years ago it stayed a good while in Cleveland, for the Clevelanders imagined for a while that they had permanently beaten the whole United States in the Y. M. C. A. line. By irony of fate Cleveland has had to endure for at least ten years past the commiseration of expert observers on its poor old antiquated building. But now the ambitious Ohio town is ahead again, and once more is boasting, relative to its new $715,000 property, that nothing in the world can beat it in complete equipment for young men.

—That the Protestant church in Ireland, though undoubtedly against home rule by an enormous majority, is not solid on that subject one learned from the results of the recent by-election in Derry, the second city of Ulster. The home rulers there captured a parliament seat which had been previously held by the Unionists, and the man they elected, David C. Hogg, is one of the leading members of First Presbyterian church of that city, son of a Scotch elder in the old Free church of Galashiels, Scotland. All of which shows that there is at least some indubitable Protestant blood in Ireland that does not run cold with fear that home rule will turn out to be Rome rule.

—Talking to Presbyterian ministers in New York City on a recent Monday morning, Dr. Lyman Abbott said that to him one of the most serious signs of the time for the church is the indifference of Christians to immortality. He remarked that men in New York are often heard saying: "How I would like to come back and see what this old town will be like fifty years from now!" But Dr Abbott thought no American of the present generation has been heard intimating a desire to see what heaven will be like fifty years from now.

Any local church can use to advantage a diagram of this nature as a guide for charting and defining the activities of its own organization. The plan is subject to change from time to time as the work expands and develops lems. This interest will not be critical. With the wonderful endowment possessed by Fourth church of men and money and machinery, what a chance to make good!

Cooperating in this task, the bureau of social service of the Home Board will render the assistance for which it is best equipped. Representatives from the bureau have already made a study of the entire field. Some of the most significant things already discovered are illustrated in accompanying charts. This survey will be made continuous during the next couple of years. As already stated, one of the big tasks lying before Fourth church is that of combining social service and evangelism. Working with the minister and the people, the bureau will help demonstrate the possibilities in this direction.

The charts accompanying this article were prepared under the direction of G. B. St. John, a recognized expert in this line of work. Mr. St. John compiled the data and drew the charts used in the article in The Continent March 14, 1912, on "Chicago Facing Her Own Facts," and also made many of the charts used in the Men and Religion Forward Movement campaign.

A Sunday Evening in Delagua

BY JOHN H. BAXTER

IT WAS SUNDAY evening and I stood looking out upon the village from the second floor of the school where I was waiting my congregation. Six thousand eight hundred feet of altitude accounted for the barrenness of the hills and the crispness of the air, but it would scarcely account for the hilarity of the jolly band on the other side of the canon. It was St. Somebody's Day, as a practiced eye might note from the busy babel that thronged the saloon dressed in their Sunday best.

While gazing sympathetically on the crowd who were using the holiday to break the monotonous drudgery of their lives, I might have imagined that a saloon was a harmless institution if I had not known of a poor fellow who, but a little while before, had gone out of there broken hearted for his folly and loss at the gambling table, and when he could not get a pistol from the saloonkeeper went and jumped into one of the coke ovens, thus finding instant death.

And yet the saloonkeeper was a kindly man and religious. He lent us his saloon dance hall to hold evangelistic services in, though had we been more successful he perhaps would have been less kind.

But the jolly band had left the saloon and were skipping along up the other side of the canon, some with their arms across each others' shoulders. With their heads thrown back and mouths and throats wide open they poured forth rich volumes of Italian harmonies, till every gulch on the mountainside seemed full of song. It was too early it seems for these young fellows to go into the boarding house yet, so they gathered on the mountainside facing the school and sang as though for us. One of them was leader. He lilted a few words like the bugle tones of a Swiss mountaineer. The others swelled out a stirring refrain. Was it their artlessly artful voices or some trick of the wind—I don't know which, perhaps both—but the song would die away as in a whisper and then again come over in rich, full volume as if the wind had just arrived with a belated cargo of harmony. And more than one in the valley stood still to listen and I went back to my evening congregation, a motley throng of America's future citizenship, with wishes and yearning in my heart.

But now the scene is changed. A striking Providence had taken me out of this field, but the huge smokestacks pour forth their clouds of smoke before my vision still.

Here is the caption of a newspaper on a fateful November morning—"Two Hundred Men Entombed in Mine."

And here it is three days later:

"Trinidad, Colorado, Nov. 11—Fourteen more bodies were taken from the American Victor mine today, bringing the total number of dead up to seventy-nine."

The words describing Primero disaster three months later, which I happen to have before me, are apropos of Delagua.

"Many heartbreaking scenes are enacted at the mouth of the mine, where relatives and friends are waiting for the bodies of those who perished in the mine. Among those recovered were seven Japs. Most of the others were Catholics, and the bodies of these will be buried in one trench in the Catholic cemetery at Trinidad."

And here is the end of the men who go down into battle with a song, and who are the ground floor of the superstructure of our civilization.

To their credit, be it said that the coal company appropriated over $60,000 as compensation to the bereaved relatives at home and abroad. But as yet the church has made no appropriation, that I know of, to give light to those who, in the hills of southern Colorado, are lighting our homes and factories with the light of their own lives.

How Would You Have Said It?

At a meeting of one of those very useful "home and school associations" which now in many cities bring into valuable acquaintance the teachers in the public schools and the parents of the children whom they teach, it was proposed that a committee should be appointed to arrange for a mothers' meeting; and it was desired that the committee should include all the teachers of the eight grades in the school, and that each teacher should be supported and advised in the committee by two mothers who had children in her room. To give effect to this, one enthusiastic member offered the resolution that "the committee should consist of all the teachers and the mothers of two children in each room." But he was immediately challenged by the charge that he had left no mother eligible to appointment on the committee unless she had sixteen children in school. The dismayed member immediately began to revise his resolution, but when the meeting adjourned had not yet made it mean what he wanted it to. How should be have written it to avoid ambiguity?

The Stuff of Heroes

One scorching day, when his comrades were nearly prostrated, the private was seen carrying his own gun and another man's, two cartridge belts, two knapsacks and a dog. The colonel stopped him.

"Look here, you marched all yesterday and you fought all last night," the colonel said.

"Yes, sir," said the young soldier respectfully.

"Well, then, what are you carrying that dog for?"

"Because, colonel," said the soldier, "the dog's tired."

A hungry typhoid convalescent demanded something to eat. The nurse gave him a spoonful of tapioca.

"Now," he said fretfully, "I want to read a little. Bring me a postage stamp."

BRADFORD HORTON, MAN

BY RICHARD S. HOLMES

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS—Bradford Horton is working his way through Prestonbury Theological Seminary. A fellow student, Austin Sleighton, becomes his loyal friend; but Oren-Toole, a jealous fellow bank employee, attempts to involve him in a money theft, using as his tool an old beggar, Andrew Drum, who proves to be Horton's own father. Miss Elmore, daughter of the bank's president, to whom Horton is greatly attracted, believes in his innocence, which is finally proved. Oren-Toole and Drum, however, are incriminated. Drum dies before his trial, and Horton begs that the case against Oren-Toole be dropped. This angers Mr. Elmore, and he writes Horton a note which causes him to resign from the bank and to give up his position as tutor to Mr. Elmore's grandson. Mr. Elmore still believes Horton an impostor. Sleighton tries to persuade him to clear himself. This Horton refuses to do because of a last promise to Drum that he would not reveal the latter's identity as the man of whom, in his youth, Prestonbury had prophesied ill, and whose marriage was opposed by his bride's family. Horton, because of the president's hostility, declines the cashier's invitation to return to the bank. Finally Mr. Elmore, realizing the need of the young man's assistance and admitting to himself that his prejudice is due solely to the fact that he fears his daughter may succumb to Horton's manifold attractions, decides to apologize for his note and offer Horton the position of teller. Horton, accepting the apology, declines the postion, also a handsome offer to sing in a New York City church. A note from Miss Elmore, however, changes his decision, and he not only goes back to the bank but again becomes tutor for Charlie Elmore. The Elmores soon leave for prolonged travel abroad, and Horton, invited by Charlie's mother to make his home with her, concludes to do so. In Japan, meanwhile, Miss Elmore has a succession of social triumphs and wins the love of a young Scotchman named Stuart.

ELEANOR WAS FAR out toward the bow watching the lookout. She knew instinctively as Stuart took his place at her side that the purpose she had seen in him was crystallized, and she was sorry he had come. Hastily she plunged into the first subject that occurred to her.

"Mr. Stuart, do you love music?"

"I think so. I've never been an opera-goer, but I enjoy good singing."

"Do you know 'The Messiah'?"

"Yes. Every Englishman knows Handel."

"I heard it last Christmas time, at home, and a friend of mine was the tenor. I wish you could have heard him sing it."

"Are you a singer, Miss Elmore?"

"Not a very good one. I've studied a little."

"Won't you sing for me, and let me be judge whether it's good or not?"

She saw a chance to escape from what she felt was coming and made haste to take it.

"Yes, if you won't be bored. I'll sing for you now. Do you know the song, 'I'm Afloat, I'm Afloat on the Deep Rolling Tide'? This wide ocean makes me feel like singing that. Come to the saloon." And she started hurriedly away from the bow.

But he was in no mood to hear her sing then. "Wait," he said as with quick step he overtook her. "I'll hear you sing in Shanghai."

"Oh, dear!" she thought, "have I got to have him in Shanghai?" Aloud she said, "Tell me, Mr. Stuart, what sort of a place is Shanghai? Is it funny like Yokohama?" and she walked steadily on toward midship.

"Wait," he repeated, trying to stop her. "I want to talk a little with you."

"You can talk as we walk, and walk as we talk," she answered. "What sort of a place is Shanghai?"

He saw she was trying to baffle him, and he determined he would not be baffled. But circumstances saved her. One of those strange interruptions which have changed so many things and which we have all experienced came suddenly. There rose sharp on the air the appalling cry, "Man overboard!" It came from far astern, and forgetting everything but this one idea of danger to a human life she started wildly along the deck and toward the vessel's side.

"Come! Come quick! Oh, come, come!" And ere the man fully comprehended she was gone.

Chagrined and vexed, he followed, but too slowly for her swift feet. When at last he saw the steamer take up the boat with the rescued man a half hour had gone since the moment of that first wild cry. He pushed through the throng on deck to find Eleanor, but she had vanished, nor did she appear for dinner, her mother explaining that she had been nervously upset by the occurrence and was in bed.

Next day she was inseparable from her mother, and the day following he had to stand by the rail and watch her embark in a sampan for the land at Shanghai. His destination was Hongkong, and his heart was heavy. He had changed his mind about stopping over till the next steamer; he felt it useless.

At the port Eleanor received a letter from Joe Jickers, delightful in its characteristic and genuine jollity and lack of sentiment. Mainly nonsense, it yet brought her some little flashes of illumination. One passage in particular interested her:

"Lennie, that 'new type' student keeps right on new-typing with all his might. He forgot how to be like other men before he was born. He has not been charged with a single bank robbery this year. By the way, I ran across Oren-Toole in Albany just before Christmas. He's in a dry goods store. He pretended not to know me. 'I want some needles with points on both ends,' I said. He answered, real testy, 'You greenhorn, there's no such needles.' 'Oh, yes, there are, O.-T.,' said I. 'Knitting needles.' And I laughed, and he was mad.

"Horton sang in 'The Messiah' in New York Christmas week and they paid him with one $500 gold piece. By the way, did anyone ever tell you that he paid the bank the $200 that O.-T. stole? And that he kept the bank from arresting O.-T. and putting him in the penitentiary? Perhaps your father has told you all this, for that was before you began circumnavigating the universe. And, Lennie, did you know that Horton is living at Caroline Elmore's?"

It occurred to Eleanor that it was strange she had never happened to be told these facts, yet the passing thought did not prevent her from reading the letter entire to her father. Knowing his fondness for Joe, she expected a manifestation of interest and pleasure at the letter, and was therefore surprised when his only response was a "h'm!"

"Is that all you have to say?" she cried.

"Is anything else necessary, dear?" he asked, restraining with difficulty his anger at being followed by this unbearable impostor all over the world.

"Did you know that Mr. Horton was rooming at Caroline's, father?"

"Not Mr. Horton, Eleanor, Mr. Drum," he said, with sharp reproof in his tone.

"Oh, nonsense, daddy! Did you know he was at Caroline's It's funny she's never written about it."

"No, I did not know it. I suppose she thought I would hardly find the knowledge gratifying."

Eleanor heeded no danger signals when her mind was set on a subject. "Is it really so that he kept the bank from prosecuting Oren-Toole?" she persisted. "I've often wondered why you didn't."

"Sam told the directors it was his request."

"Whose request? Mr. Maxwell's?"

"No; Drum's."

"Don't be absurd, daddy. That was noble, wasn't it?"

"H'm!" was all the reply.

"There you go with your 'h'm' again! What's the matter with you, father? Did Mr. Horton need to pay back that money?"

"No, child, no. But hark! That man's name is Drum, and that is what you are to call him when you speak to me."

"What made him pay it back, father?"

"That is rather hard to answer, Lennie. It was probably to keep himself before the public. He seems to enjoy doing that."

Eleanor was upon him with another question more annoying than the last.

"Father, don't you think it was a noble, a generous act?"

That was exactly what he thought, but his daughter's tenacity was robbing him of self-control. "Yes, in a way," he answered curtly. "Now we will drop this subject, Eleanor. I don't care to discuss it further."

"Drop the subject? Why, Father Elmore! A man does a noble act, of which you know, and never tell me, and I hear of it here in Asia, and when I ask about it you say drop it? You're not fair to me, nor to yourself, nor to Mr. Horton."

"Eleanor, I'll not hear you say Horton. That man's name is Drum."

"You told me yourself once it was Horton. What has changed your mind?"

THE HOME COUNCIL

Mrs. Blackfield to the Rescue

BY GERTRUDE RUSSELL LEWIS

MRS. BLACKFIELD had been asked to go on the board of the new day nursery and had accepted from force of habit. She was already on so many boards that only her secretary, who kept a card index and her checking account, could have told what they all were.

In a vague way the nursery appealed to Mrs. Blackfield, for when you keep up a lawn on the drive, with real estate at $300 a foot, you scarcely like it to be ornamented with soiled gingham aprons; and Mrs. Blackfield had more than once found the children of the laundress disporting themselves gayly there, regardless of appearances. And once Marcus had carried back in antipathetic fingertips a "crackerjack" box left derisively on the walk for Mrs. Loftus, her most elaborate friend, ostentatiously to evade. Really, it was not funny. It looked as if the place were not being kept up.

Decidedly a day nursery would assist the mothers, allow them to give better service and relieve their employers from some embarrassing moments.

But to be put on the visiting committee was more than Mrs. Blackfield had bargained for when she permitted her name to be used and her check to be drawn for the day nursery. However, she was a Vanderhoff, and that had always stood for noblesse oblige. So she consulted an engagement calendar, sent down the menu to the cook and, stately in lavender satin, for she was going on to a formal luncheon, told Marcus to set her down for a moment at the nursery. It was not her first visit, for she was conscientious and made every half hour in her busy life count, from her point of view.

She stopped for fruit and then turned into a noisy street where a vacant store was temporarily housing the new experiment. "We must show that it is a success, you know, before we can make it succeed," the chairman had said.

Sounds of confusion and despair greeted her and she wavered, her hand on the doorknob. Then the Vanderhoff rose in her and she entered. It was 12 o'clock. A half dozen babies and as many tots in pinafores were making pandemonium. On a couch lay the matron, a hapless wreck, with one of those headaches that descend like a vulture seeking its prey and will not be denied its victim. The usually tidy room swarmed with unfed, unkempt, unhappy childhood. Mrs. Blackfield knew that her favorite nurse was on duty elsewhere and could not be reached. The milk for the day stood on the icebox and the iceman had left its door ajar. For an appalled moment Mrs. Blackfield stood irresolute. Then something snapped.

Thirty years before she had married the man she wanted rather than the man she could have had. She had worn gingham dresses and tossed the water out of the kitchen door in the little Arizona town where she had arrived in her father's private car, later to marry the engineer's chief clerk and live as he could afford.

> "Learn to look for the light. Positively refuse to harbor shadows and blots, and the deformed, the disfigured, the discordant. Hold to those things that give pleasure, that are helpful and inspiring, and you will change your whole way of looking at things, will transform your character in a very short time."

Forgotten arts returned to her. Mechanically she swung the teakettle toward the faucet and reached for a match. Her day had begun.

A row of immaculate bottles awaited her. There was no question now of proportions. Those frantic babies were not going to cavil at an ounce more or less. Meantime she measured the cereal, salted it and started it to cooking in the double boiler for the older children. Then she carried a cup of hot water to the matron and gave her what relief she could.

After all were fed and quiet was restored, Mrs. Blackfield again stood for a cogitative moment, then stepped to the telephone, called her hostess and excused herself from the luncheon. This off her mind, she stepped into the auto with the most youthful step she had known since she became conscious of her weight and told Marcus to get her home in about a minute. She ran upstairs and stepped out of her satin gown (her maid found it later on the floor), reached for a serge and hurried down the stairs, fastening her collar as she went.

Back at the nursery, she seized a gingham apron and a baby and began. There is no more elusive object than a wet infant. Long ago she had bathed her own girl baby, and then—well, every spring the secretary, who had the date, sent an order for flowers to the little Arizona town. Now every instinct of motherhood in her rose at the bidding. She tested the water and began at the head, wiping the eyes with a fresh cloth in fresh water, and she chuckled when the baby seized and sucked his washrag in the old familiar way, with a consummate germetic indifference.

Finally six infants lay in innocuous desuetude, fed first, bathed afterwards. Later, in "Bosch on Infant Care," she read that she had been guilty of fatal procedure, but she did not think of it then. She only thought of what she would have liked under the same hot, neglected circumstances.

She sponged and freshened the others and settled them. She ate of cereal and flakes and other flabby things, and then proceeded to tackle the room. Down on her knees she wiped it up. She shook rugs, she straightened pictures, tended infants, made up small beds.

At 5 o'clock the matron showed signs of life, distracted when at last she recognized in her redoubtable rescuer the distinguished and fastidious individual "whose name on the board was in itself assurance of success."

It had so proved; for that day at least.

At 6 o'clock Mr. Blackfield demanded his wife and the secretary began a search.

The last mother had taken her fresh, sweet, bed-ready baby and gone home. The other little people, fairy-storied and bananaed to the gunwales, trotted off too full for articulate sound.

The matron felt refreshed and rested after her singular day off. Mrs. Blackfield began to feel her back and her feet.

At this moment Mr. Blackfield in person dashed up to the nursery and parked his car behind his wife's limousine.

BITS BY THE WAY

BACK SEAT FOR KAISER

Emperor William of Germany has a constitutional aversion to back seats, and by vigorous exercise of his "divine right" has been pretty successful in dodging them. According to a story which has been going the rounds of the press, however, Harry Lauder, the Scotch comedian, once pushed him into one with a thud, divine right and all.

William invited Mr. Lauder to sing for him on a certain Sabbath day. Mr. Lauder does not sing on the Sabbath, not even for kings, and sent his regrets.

The kaiser was astounded. Refuse the emperor? This was more than divine right was able to endure.

"When the kaiser requests," replied William tersely, "he commands."

The Scotchman was firm, as to one commandment, at least, and not a bit awed by divine rights.

"The kaiser is great," he wrote back; "but God is greater."

This admitted of no argument, and William silently retired to the aforesaid seat.

DO YOU GET SHORT WEIGHT?

If you should order four and one half pounds of tenderloin steak dressed into fillet of beef, pay for it and then discover when the meat is delivered to you that it is exactly two pounds under weight, what would you do about it? Let it go or wage war against your butcher?

A housekeeper who recently had this experience declared that it was "scandalous short measure" and caused the butcher's arrest on a charge of stealing, maintaining that he had kept the two pounds of "trimmings" she had already paid for, and sold them to someone else.

At the trial she produced the bill showing she had paid for four and one half pounds, and produced also the meat, which was weighed before the judge, who saw it was only two and one half pounds.

Two butchers were present to defend the suit. They dressed a tenderloin before the justice, converting it into fillet, and showed a shrinkage of nearly 50 per cent. They asserted the customer would have to bear the shrinkage.

"That's the custom," said the butchers.

But the judge didn't think so. He not only handed down a decision which stamped such manipulations as illegal but advised the complainant to have the owner of the shop arrested.

The housewives of the town are now considering enlisting in a war on butchers to enforce full weight of meats they purchase. The butchers are becoming worried. They say they are not getting fair treatment, and that if the women want the "trimmings" from the meat they will find they are getting full weight. One butcher admitted, however, that the only way for the customer to get full weight is to buy the whole thing and do the trimming at home.

WOMEN AND JURY SERVICE

The Colorado legislature has passed a bill, introduced by Senator Helen R. Robinson, to amend the constitution to admit women to jury service.

The bill was attacked on the ground of morality. "I should hate to see the time come," said Senator Williams, "when my wife or my daughter would be chosen for jury service and be locked in a room with several men jurors overnight or for several nights. There are many criminal cases in the trial of which it is an insult to ask a woman to listen to the evidence brought out."

It was said in defense of the bill that if women have equal suffrage, they have a right to sit on juries if they want to. It's "up to" them.

San Mateo county, California, has placed six women on its grand jury—the first instance in the state of women doing grand jury service. Married women were accepted, most of them appearing as "housewives" on the register.

"I've always wanted to get a jury that wouldn't gossip," said Judge Buck. "There never has been a grand jury in San Mateo county that could keep a secret, and now we'll give the women a chance."

—Catharine Waugh McCulloch, the first woman justice of the peace in Illinois, and about to retire from the bench to devote herself to law practice with her husband, speaks enthusiastically of her experience as justice. "It has been pleasant," she says, "and the work easy. Only one man appealed from my decision, and he apologized to me for doing so. He wanted delay to get funds. No one ever tried to bribe me, either directly or through pressure of friends." S. C. R.

YOUNG AMERICA

Seven Cats of Long Beach

BY FRANCES MARGARET FOX

OF COURSE there are more than seven cats in Long Beach, because Long Beach is a big seaside town in southern California where cats are plentiful. However, the seven cats lived on the same street and are the ones that made Jimmie's brother laugh. Jimmie's brother laughs easily, to be sure, but so does 5-year-old Jimmie, for that matter.

It happened one chilly evening, when the waves of the Pacific were pounding on the beach and the wind was howling around the cottages, that Jimmie's brother, whose name was John, walked the entire length of American avenue to return a book he had borrowed. The book was "Robin Hood."

Before John had gone three blocks he saw a cat huddled against a door waiting for someone to let it in. It was so chilly that November night that John might have imagined himself in Massachusetts if he could have walked with his eyes closed. Palm trees and blooming flowers reminded Jimmie's brother at every step that he was in southern California.

On walked the big boy, thinking, thinking of Robin Hood and his merry men. Soon he saw another cat huddled against a door. A few more blocks and there was the third shivering cat waiting to get in the house. Before Jimmie's brother reached his friend's residence, away out American avenue, he had counted seven cats on seven doorsteps, who wished to ring seven doorbells.

When John started back toward his own home he was still thinking of Robin Hood and brave days of old in Sherwood forest. He remembered that Robin Rood never went abroad without meeting with some adventure.

Suddenly Jimmie's brother began to smile a broad, broad smile that turned into a grin. There were seven cats shivering with the cold; seven cats in need of a friend. Surely here was an adventure!

"I'll buckle on my sword and demand entrance for them, each at his own castle door!" declared Jimmie's brother, grinning so his teeth shone in the moonlight.

Mrs. Peter Nettleton was surprised a few minutes later by hearing her doorbell ring with unnecessary force. When she went to the door there stood a good-looking young man, hat in hand, who inquired most politely if he might speak with Mr. R. Hood.

"There is no one by that name here," answered Mrs. Nettleton. Even as she spoke in darted the cat.

Jimmie could hardly keep his face straight when he rang the next doorbell and again inquired for Mr. R. Hood.

"You must have the wrong number," replied a gruff looking man in a gruff sounding voice.

John didn't find Robin Hood anywhere on American avenue that evening; but when his adventure was over, seven front doors had opened to admit seven grateful cats—grateful, although not one had said, "I thank you."

To this day Jimmie and his brother John laugh every time they speak of those seven cats of Long Beach.

My Bunny Danny

I HAD A RABBIT once. A man gave it to my papa and he brought it home to me. We made a house for my bunny out of a box. We nailed it to a big tree that grew by the side of the house, and then inclosed a space about six feet long and three feet wide with wire, so that the rabbit would have a yard to play in.

I named him Danny, for some way he made me think of Danny in Mrs. McClung's book. I loved him so much and he seemed very happy in his new home.

He would nibble the clover and vegetables I gave him to eat, and wrinkle up his nose in such a cute way.

I always locked the door to his house at night so nothing could harm him. One night after I had locked Danny safely in a strange thing happened. I was lying in bed and watching a bright star 'way up in the sky, when all at once the star seemed to come right toward me and I heard a gentle tap at my window. There stood Danny looking in at me with bright eyes.

I cried out, "Why, Danny! Danny dear! How did you get out of your house? What are you doing here?"

But he only flapped his ears and wrinkled his nose and scampered off. I thought maybe it was not Danny after all, but a star bunny.

Looking up I saw, sure enough, a dear little bunny peeping out of every star in sight, and their eyes twinkled and their noses wrinkled and I heard queer squeaky voices calling, "Little girl, come up here to play with us." And then they all began jumping from star to star.

All at once every bunny jumped right at me. I screamed. It was all dark and still. I crept out of bed and looked out of the window. The stars were shining in the usual way, no rabbits to be seen anywhere. I went back to bed.

In the morning I ran first thing to see Danny. He was not there; the little door was open. Then I knew. Mamma says I was only dreaming—Danny was stolen. What do you think? Was it a presentiment, or is it a story?

How Antonio Became Famous

Long ago there lived in Italy a little boy named Antonio Canova. His home was with his grandfather, who was a stonecutter by trade, but very poor indeed.

Antonio was not a strong little boy, says What-to-Do. He couldn't romp, and jump, and run with the other boys in the village, but he loved to go with his grandfather to the stoneyard. While the old man was busy cutting and shaping the great blocks of stone, Antonio would play among the chips. Sometimes he would make a little statue of soft clay, sometimes he would take his grandfather's hammer and chisel and try to cut a statue from a piece of rock. Then when they went home in the evening his grandmother would say: "What has our little Antonio been doing today?"

"He has been trying to make figures of stone. The boy will be a sculptor if he grows to manhood."

Now there lived in the same town as Antonio a very rich man, a count. He often gave grand dinners for his rich friends, and he would send for Antonio's grandfather to go up to the great house and help with the work in the kitchen, for Antonio's grandfather was a fine cook as well as a stonecutter.

One day it happened that Antonio went with his grandfather to the count's house.

Everything went well until it came time to set the table for dinner. There came, suddenly, a crash from the great banqueting hall, and a man rushed into the kitchen, very pale and trembling with fright, and holding some bits of broken marble in his hand. He had broken the wonderful marble statue which was to have stood in the center of the table.

"What shall we do?" cried all the servants.

Antonio went up to the frightened man.

"If you had another statue for the center of the table would it be all right?" he asked.

"Surely," said the man, "if it were of the same height and length."

"Will you let me try to make one?" asked Antonio.

The man laughed. "Who are you that you can carve a statue?"

"I am Antonio Canova," said the lad.

"The boy can but try," said the servants, who knew Antonio.

On the table in the kitchen was a huge lump of golden butter. It weighed over 200 pounds, and it had just come in from the count's great dairy in the mountains. Antonio took one of the kitchen knives and began to carve and shape this butter. In a few moments he had finished his statue, and there, before the wondering eyes of the servants, crouched a wonderful lion—mane, great limbs, and head complete.

"How beautiful!" they cried. And the lion was carried in and put in the center of the banqueting table.

When the count and his friends came in, the first thing they saw was the great yellow lion.

"How remarkable!" they cried. "None but a great artist could carve such a figure. Bring him forth!"

"My friends," said the count, "this is a surprise to me as well as to you." Then he called the head servant and asked him the name of the unknown artist.

"It was a little boy in the kitchen," said the servant, "who carved the lion."

Then the count bade the servant bring in the little boy. (Continued on page 294)

TWO LITTLE IMPS ✎ By Frances Moore Geiger

I'm a pretty good girl, as little girls go,
But my mother says—and I guess it's so—
That two little imps sometimes get hold of me,
And make me as troublesome as can be.
This is the way of it: Yesterday
I flew downstairs "like a flash," they say,
Or "like a blue streak" (though red or blue,
I never yet saw a streak that flew).
Well, the band was parading up the street,
And the fifer blew and the big drum beat,
So down I raced—and there came the cook
With a tray full of dishes! 'n' I didn't look,
And smash! went the teacups—one—two—three!
And that was Imp-et-u-os-i-ty!

And the other imp—oh, that's worse yet!
I try to remember, but I forget;
It comes so quick on its little wings,
And buzzes about, and darts, and stings!
This is the way of it: Just today
Baby came out to watch us play,
Helen and me. We were having tea
Down under the old horse-chestnut tree;
And when we weren't looking, up he slipped
And spilled the sugar and cream, and tipped
Over the teapot, and ate the cake.
And I—I gave him the awfulest shake!
He's so little, and cunning, too;
And don't understand, like big folks do.
And I was as 'shamed as I could be;
For that was Imp-a-tience! Oh, dear me!

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

March 9, 1913—The Destruction of Sodom

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Genesis 19:1-3, 12-29. Golden Text, II. Corinthians 6:17: Come ye out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch no unclean thing.

Sodom, as it stands for intemperance, is a city of many suburbs. The two Sodoms are alike and unlike. One was a city, the other is a condition. No one knows just where Sodom was, and no one knows where intemperance is not. One was swept from the earth in a day, while the other survives to blight the race. Cities are concrete things. They have form and locality, but alcohol is a subtle something that permeates all nature. It lurks in the fruit upon the tree, the grapes upon the vine and follows the harvest to its threshing. Compress intemperance into the limits of Sodom and its destruction would swiftly follow, but the powers of the earth and the air combine against us.

And yet we would not charge God foolishly. Nature and man were intended to be friends. Intemperance is a war against God. It is a distortion of his purpose. The causes that drive men to dissipation are legion and in many cases lie outside the man himself. The poet Burns took to drink as a reaction from the toil of the farm. Misfortune will do it, and so will success. Everything depends upon the man.

Intemperance May Have Been Instrumental in Destruction of Sodom

How far intemperance may have entered into the destruction of Sodom we do not know, but from what it is today, it was probably the primary cause. Drinking naturally leads to offenses worse than itself. The mob that stormed Lot's house at the time of the angels' visit in all probability was insanely drunk. A drunken man may be very different from the same man sober. Reason never get drunk. It may abdicate in favor of passion, but it never gets drunk. A drunken man may be neither his own self nor any other person.

Lot became a resident without volition. So do people fall victims to intemperance. He first pitched his tent toward Sodom with apparently no idea of ever identifying himself with the city. As a shepherd he would occupy one of the fertile plains in sight of Sodom, but forming no part of it. Men often fall not because they are inherently bad but because of where they are. No one can live in sight of evil and not be more or less affected by it. That is one of the first suggestions of human history. Had Adam and Eve kept away from the tree bearing the forbidden fruit they would have never fallen.

But many are blind to the most obvious teachings of life. Though there are those who boast of having been born and brought up to the use of wine, and who yet have escaped all subsequent inclination to drink, such cases are the exception. The writer recalls two men whose boyhood was spent in homes where the use of liquor was an everyday matter. The result was that as men, while one was never drunk, the other was seldom sober. Had their early example been different both might have been saved. The weak brother is the one always to be considered. Absence may lead to abstinence, but indulgence never will.

Influence of Association, for Good or Evil, Cannot Be Overestimated

The influence of association cannot be overestimated, as Lot himself bears the fullest testimony. Whatever he may have been out on the plain, his character must have undergone a pitiful transformation in Sodom. The wickedness no doubt, as St. Peter says, "vexed his righteous soul from day to day," but his proposition to the mob shows a degradation inconceivable outside of Sodom. There must have been a time in his life when that would have been impossible. The effect of association, whether for good or evil, is as lasting as eternity.

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As to be hated needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

The best way to get out of Sodom is to stay out, and the best way to quit drinking is not to begin. There is an idea prevalent that to know a life one must live it. That was first preached in Eden under the branches of the forbidden tree; but the knowledge of good is not necessarily associated with evil. The oculist who puts out his own eyes in order to understand how to treat the eyes of his patients acts upon the same principle. A smallpox expert well known to the writer himself never had the disease. One can learn all it is necessary to know about Sodom without becoming a resident. Abstain from every appearance of evil, says St. Paul (authorized version), not only the evil itself but the very appearance of it. That counsel would have kept Lot out of Sodom and saved many a youthful Lot from judgments worse than those that fell upon the city.

God, Mindful of Lot, Warns Him of Sodom's Doom

God is never unmindful of his own. Unworthy as the patriarch may have been, the Lord had his welfare at heart.

One day two strangers came to the patriarch with the intelligence that the city was about to be destroyed. Abraham had interceded for its deliverance, but the door of mercy was closed against it. There is a judgment bound up in every sin. Whether we term it justice or consequence, the end is the same. God is no idle spectator of this tragedy of evil. He reminds us in a thousand ways that the wages of sin is death. The sinner himself feels this to be true better than others can tell him. There is no wreck like a human soul. Every day one meets upon the streets the living answers to the old question: "Who hath woe? Who hath sorrow?"

At last Lot awakes to a situation that he should have felt before. One naturally thinks first of his own, and his family was urged to flee the city. Lot himself lingered, but the angels forced him, his wife and two daughters beyond the gates. Again be halted, as the half persuaded so often do. But every Sodom, whether a city or a glass of rum, must be abandoned entirely or not at all. The plain about Sodom is as dangerous as the city itself. Lot escaped, but the past had been burned deep into his soul. With his daughters he retired to a cave, only to be followed by those bestial demons with which he had become so familiar. Reform is the work of a lifetime. Temperance is largely a personal virtue. No one can save another against his will, and abstinence alone promises safety.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

ANALYSIS—For the sake of Abraham God spared Lot. But only those were finally saved who were willing to be saved. Lot lost that for which he had compromised his family, and while seeking wealth went out of Sodom poorer than he entered it.

Lust, when it hath conceived, beareth sin (James 1:15). What were the moral conditions of the doomed cities? President Seeley of Amherst College said upon his return from India in the '60s that he had preached about sin from his youth, but he never knew what sin was until he got outside the atmosphere of a Christian community. The Sodomites are not the only race known to history which has been exterminated because of incurable vices.

Lot was himself contaminated by the companionship he had sought for the sake of wealth—and, after all, instead of leaving his children "independent," he left them pauperized, and degenerate besides. Lot's course still brings forth its Dead sea fruits. Political economy is founded upon virtue; and the only "practical politics" is "Sunday school politics." Except for grace to Abraham, Lot would have perished with the companions he had chosen.

Family of Lot Spared for Sake of Man He Wronged

Verse 12—God is not "a principle" which must work its own relentless way, but a person whose acts are not due to force but ruled by love. Lot, who had abused Abraham's generosity (ch. 13:7-11) and been saved by Abraham's courage (ch. 14:14-16), was now delivered, together with all related to him who would flee, because of God's affection for Abraham. Natural law makes no exceptions, but love does. Even republics pension the wives and children of soldiers, irrespective of personal merit.

Verse 13—God's verdicts are as certain to be carried out as his promises are to be fulfilled. Abraham believed God's goodness, but Lot, at least, had no doubt of God's judicial severity. "Do not tell me there is no hell," said a reformed drunkard lately, "because I know better. I've been there." The man who has known only God's tenderness may sometimes doubt his severity, but Lot never does.

Verse 14—Abraham could save his nephew, but Lot could not save his sons-in-law. Bad as Lot and his offspring were, there was something in them which was not in any Sodomite They might have wronged Abraham, but they believed in him. It was this which proved their salvation. Lot could not deliver a warning as impressively by word of mouth as Abraham did by his conduct. The Christian who lives among the worldly or the wicked as the worldly and the wicked do, makes a poor preacher and has few converts.

Second Warning and Divine Compulsion Added That Lot Might be Saved

Verse 15—Said a minister recently in the hearing of the writer, "When I have delivered my message I have freed my soul. I have no further anxiety about the matter." A man may say that, an angel never does. The angel repeats the message in more alarming form and adds to it a gentle but irresistible compulsion of love. It is not the minister's whole duty to preach, it is not the whole duty of a teacher to teach. Preaching and teaching must be followed up by repetition, "here a little and there a little," and the repetition by the friendly, guiding hand.

Verse 17—Renouncing the world must be a determined business. It will not answer for the saved soul to camp just outside the walls of the doomed city. "I have quit drinking, but I have not given up my old friends," said a convert to total abstinence at a temperance meeting. "I shall show the boys that I am as much attached to them as ever." That man stopped "in the plain" and did not heed the warning to "escape to the mountain." He died in delirium tremens inside of three years.

Verse 26—A reluctant convert is not a genuine convert. The professed disciple who would follow Christ after he had paid a visit to his home, doubtless hostile to Jesus, was told either to come now or not come at all (Luke 9:62). The old gambler who will no longer play but "loves to watch the game" is not yet saved. It is all or nothing when it comes to obeying the command, "Come ye out from among them." Conversion is wholehearted or it is a mockery and a snare.

"He that being oft reproved hardeneth his neck shall suddenly be destroyed."

Sodom lay all the time over the very fires which were to destroy it. The whole region was, and is, full of bitumen pits (Gen. 14:10). It is probable that the walls of the city and of the houses were smeared with this inflammable substance. It was as ready to blow up as an oil field. The inhabitants danced upon their own tombs. And when such a region is swept by fire the destruction is beyond description. The writer of these notes, ascending the slopes of Vesuvius, noticed in a wide lava field a patch of yellow, while the field was dark brown. He called the attention of his guide to this and asked him what it meant. The guide answered, "That spot of yellow shows where a stone house once stood. It simply melted down and merely gave that part of the lava a different color." If stone be so easily burned, what shall we say of pitch?

The death which is occasioned by drink may not be so spectacular as the fall of Sodom, but it is due to its own internal causes, just the same. Every sin contains within itself the elements of its own penalty. Those who demand "a merry life" regardless of moral issues, must be content with "a short one," for such a life is built over an oil well. And if the end be delayed, in the mercy of God, it is no less sure than that of Sodom, and is, like the destruction of that city, due to causes hid within its own nature.

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning March 2, 1913

HOME MISSION TOPIC—An immigration policy.

Never before in history has there been such a social movement as is seen today in the thronging of the foreign hordes through the immigrant ports into the United States. There have been other vast movements of population in the past; never one like this. Those were the movements of armed masses, pillaging and devastating; but this is wholly a movement of peace.

The department of immigration of our Home Board has issued a booklet entitled "The Presbyterian Church and the Immigrant." It is replete with interesting and valuable information; and from it we quote the following paragraphs:

"The cheap labor of southern and eastern Europe has made possible the expansion of American mining and manufacture. Underneath and supporting the great industries of this country with their huge production of new wealth there is a substratum of peasant immigrant labor—men, women and children. Of 160,000 employees in bituminous coal mining in Pennsylvania in 1910 107,000 were foreigners. A recent federal investigation, including 619,000 industrial workers, showed that 346,000, more than half, were foreign born. In thirty-eight principal branches of industry only one-fifth of the total number of wage earners were native white Americans, while three-fifths were of foreign birth.

"The most casual student of this vast movement learns at once that since 1883, which marks the beginning of this new era of industry, the character of the immigration has changed. The older stock from the British isles—Scotch, Irish and English, and the sturdy German—has been supplanted by the so-called new immigration from Italy, Austro-Hungary, Russia and the Balkan states. Seventy per cent of our recent immigration comes from southern and eastern Europe. As a class these new immigrants are largely unskilled laborers coming from countries where their highest wage is small compared with the lowest wage in the United States, though the fact that a single year will bring 125,000 skilled laborers and more than 10,000 professional men, entered as immigrant aliens, is often overlooked. The majority of the present-day immigrants are strong, sturdy, able-bodied peasants—83 per cent being between the ages of 14 and 45, the most productive period of a working life. More than 35 per cent are illiterate as compared with 3 per cent of the old immigration. More than 250,000 above the age of 14 were admitted in a single year, wholly illiterate, being unable to read or write their own or any other language."

All of us on this continent are more or less immigrants. No man, except the full-blood Indian, can go far back in his family history without coming to the generation that entered the land. And gratitude for the blessings of freedom and opportunity, which we ourselves have found here, demands that we safeguard these blessings and use them again for the good of those who are following in our wake.

The government sees to it carefully that the foreigners who enter are free from contagious or loathsome diseases, and are not likely to become public charges. This is for the protection of the health and well being of the nation. And stricter laws are about to be enacted. But the government might still do much that has not yet been done to look after the actual settlement of the strangers in the country after they have been once admitted.

It has been discovered that the ease with which the various nationalities are assimilated sustains a steady ratio to the kind of religion they profess. They may be divided into three large groups as follows:

1. The first group includes the English, Scotch, Germans, Scandinavians, Irish, Finns, Letts and Slavs—the relative ease of assimilation being indicated by the order in which the names appear. Except the Irish and some of the Germans, these are generally Protestants.
2. The second group includes the Magyars, Bohemians, French, Ruthenians and Greeks. The Catholics are here the largest class.
3. The third group includes those that are hardest to evangelize and Americanize, and whose presence makes the problem most difficult. They are the Poles and Italians, who are Catholics, and the Hebrews. In this classification Asiatic immigration is omitted, as constituting a distinct problem.

Our Home Board in 1908 established the department of immigration under the superintendency of Rev. Charles Stelzle, and in 1910 erected it into an independent department under the superintendency of Rev. William Payne Shriver.

During the past year the department has elected three fellows, two from Union Theological Seminary and one from San Francisco Theological Seminary, and sent them to those parts of Europe which provide the chief supply of immigrants, in order that they may there study the problem from the viewpoint of the people before they leave their homes. These fellows will study the languages of the immigrants, their home customs, their ideas, folklore, religion; and then they will return to this country to meet the incoming population with sympathetic understanding of their aims and hopes.

The problem is most pressing in New York City; and here a force of over forty pastors, visitors and students are at work under the direction of the department. In the Presbytery of New York there are sixteen churches using a foreign language. The most conspicuous work is the American parish, established by the home missions committee of the presbytery, manned by five pastors and an efficient staff of workers, and directed by Rev. Norman M. Thomas. In Baltimore Rev. Paul Fox has made a conspicuous beginning in work among the Poles. At Gary, Ind., the synod has established the Southside chapel and Neighborhood house, with which the Home Board cooperates. In Kansas City there is a Fellowship house for work among the Slavs. And in San Francisco Rev. Dr. Walker has organized work in the Italian district, close to the infamous "Barbary coast," and is already seeing results of his labors far beyond the most sanguine expectations of the promoters of his mission.

A great, new field of operation will open to the department as soon as ships from European ports begin to pass through the Panama canal to ports on the American Pacific. Already the steamship companies are selling tickets on the installment plan to prospective immigrants in Italy, Spain and Greece.

"Parthians and Medes and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, in Judea and Cappadocia, in Pontus and Asia, in Phrygia and Pamphylia, in Egypt and the parts of Libya about Cyrene, and sojourners from Rome, both Jews and proselytes, Cretans and Arabians, we hear them speaking in our tongues the mighty works of God."

No man is ever converted to God except through the preaching of the gospel in the language in which he was born. Our English words in their Italian or Polish ears do not reach the depths of their souls. Only their home language touches the hidden springs of their life, mingles with their lost memories and brings the old longing into sympathetic relations with the new truths.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

March 9, 1913

EVERY MAN'S OWN LAWGIVER

TOPIC—Obeying conscience. I. John 3:18-24.

Happiness is not in things. The child who cries for a painted toy and the man who is avaricious for a million dollars are alike on the wrong scent. Nobody was ever made fully content with life by the mere possession of material things. The springs of happiness are within the human breast. The only truly blessed person is he who has "a conscience void of offense." Outward condition can bring no happiness if inner peace be lacking.

Conscience is not the last word in duty. There is a supreme court to which its decisions may be appealed. For conscience is limited by its enlightenment. There are persons who conscientiously believe that they are justified in taking human life if their "honor" is touched. The law of the land says that the private conscience is no proper judge of such matters. A man who kills another, except in self-defense, is a murderer. In a multitude of particulars one's conscience may be undeveloped, and therefore an inadequate guide. The supreme court which reviews the decisions of conscience is the law of God. The final measure of man's life should be the divine will. If conscience and clear Scripture clash, then conscience must give way to the divine law.

They who follow the clearest light they have are led into more light. Groping souls are not left in darkness. God does illuminate the conscience which seeks to know his will. As the saying of Rabia has it:

"Who comes an inch to God, through doubtings dim,
In blazing light God will advance a mile to him."

A good conscience is the surest guaranty of a good time.

To suffer for conscience' sake is the noblest privilege of man. The oak-hearted heroes of all time, who have been loyal to their convictions even amid the fires of torture, are the beacon lights of history. They are signals summoning souls to the heights. No person ever really fails for conscience' sake, for he gains in individual character and renders a genuine service to the world. No wise man ever pitied those who have suffered for their highest convictions; for theirs are the crowned souls of life, the pioneers of tomorrow.

"Whatever creed be taught or land be trod, Man's conscience is the oracle of God."

There is no witness so terrible, no accuser so powerful, as conscience, that dwells in every breast.—Polybius.

A few days ago I talked with a longtime leader in the cause of civic righteousness. He was retailing some of the efforts of corrupt politicians to "get" men conducting civic reform movements. "Every chapter of a man's past is searched out by these cunning wolves," he said. "If they can find any blot on a hidden page they threaten him with its exposure. Some people wondered why, a few years ago, a certain reformer upon whom the public built its confidence should suddenly have failed them. Those of us who knew the facts were sure of the man's sincerity and integrity. He desired above all things else to serve the people nobly. His own character, for more than a decade, had been beyond reproach. But many years before he had done that which he dared not have the public know. He thought it was buried in the past, and forgotten. But there is no grave deep enough to hide a disgraceful record from the enemies of decency. So he was threatened with exposure unless he should cease his reform activities. The poor man was afraid to let the truth come out. That was the secret of his tragic treason to reform for which the world so roundly condemned him. His ignoble past had risen up and made his noble present prisoner. If young men but knew what it means to their future, they would keep their records clean, if only for prudential reasons."

In other words, the best armor for practical life, on the battlefield of hard knocks, is a "conscience void of offense." In a wider meaning than we sometimes read in the quotation, the true and knightly soldier's—

". . . strength was as the strength of ten,
Because his heart was pure."

MISSIONARY WORK

China's Fierce War on Opium

The Chinese Students' Monthly gives a translation of the terrifically drastic law recently enacted in China aiming to suppress the use of opium completely. This law actually makes it a capital offense to smoke, sell, grow or transport the drug. The magazine holds that there is not the least likelihood that the law will be allowed to serve as a dead letter. Indeed, it has already been enforced by the execution of two opium criminals at Changsha. The statute in English translation is as follows:

"All opium criminals of the first degree will be shot until they are dead. A person or persons who shall be convicted of any of the following offenses will be punished as an opium criminal in the first degree:

"1. A person who shall actually smoke the opium drug.

"2. A person who shall actually smoke the opium drug, and secretly sell the same.

"3. A person, planting the poppy, who shall create any disturbance with force and arms, when government officers are on duty to enforce the opium extirpation law.

"4. When three persons, or more, shall form a combination to smuggle or transport the prohibited drug, and who shall create any disturbance with force and arms, when these persons are put under arrest or detained by authorized officers, or by gentries of the locality where the illegal trade is found."

Blessings from a New Hospital

The opening of the Duncan hospital at Chung Ju, Korea, has vastly strengthened the work of that mission station. The physician in charge is Dr. W. C. Purviance, and for head of the nursing staff the Severance hospital at Seoul sent up a young woman just graduated there, who is proving very efficient. In the first month of the hospital's work nineteen cases were dismissed as cured or greatly benefited, and there were in all twenty-two surgical cases. Of the latter, one of the most interesting was an abdominal operation to remove a needle which a woman had forced into her flesh, believing it to be, as native medicine men claimed, a sure cure of disease. The needle when extracted proved to be four inches long. Ordinarily these needles are no longer than an inch. Happily the woman made a good recovery.

The preeminent case of the whole month, however, in Dr. Purviance's judgment, was a very successful operation for cataract performed upon an old woman who had been blind for many years. Her grown son brought her to the hospital and she told the doctor that he was only a little boy when she went blind, and she asked nothing else than to be permitted to see the son's face. That desire was granted when the son came to the hospital to take his mother home. They left the hospital together, and she proudly walked ahead of the son in order to show that she had no longer the need of any guide.

Marvelous Change at Lienchow

Rev. S. J. Kunkle, who, as The Continent said some months ago, has been holding the fort alone in the interior city of Lienchow (the station made sacred by the memory of the martyred Peels, Dr. Chesnut and Mrs. Machle), writes that conditions are very seriously disturbed in his part of China. There is a local insurrection on hand which the provincial authorities have not yet mastered, and robberies are very frequent. But in vast contrast to the situation ten years ago, when missionaries were massacred in the town, it is now the missionary who is more secure than anyone else in the whole community; for while the Chinese of different factions are preying on one another, they all unite to show consideration to the missionary and to assure him of protection. When highwaymen rob the missionary or his friends by mistake, they always take pains to return his property as soon as they learn his identity. This is so well known that the persons who can travel in company with the missionary now regard that safer than to go with a guard of soldiers.

In these conditions Mr. Kunkle finds that there is no need to resort to any extraneous devices to secure attention to the gospel. Nothing else attracts a crowd so quickly as a simple sermon about Jesus. He and his native preachers have only to stand up in the market or on the street corners and begin to talk in order to insure themselves great crowds of most devotedly attentive hearers. In the street chapel in Lienchow preaching goes on consecutively from three to six hours each day. Special meetings for women are held each week in connection with the city day school. The itineration is reaching out just as far as possible in country towns. In fact, the whole region is so alive to the gospel that in a neighboring community it is learned that a report is abroad, "They are all turning Christian down at Lienchow."

Though Mr. Kunkle is alone in this station so far as white assistance is concerned, his work is not limited, for the Brooks Memorial hospital is being kept open in charge of a very competent Chinese physician, Dr. Lei, who has treated 3,000 patients in the last six months. Mr. Kwu, an old friend of the famous Dr. Sun, is the chief of Chinese preachers assisting at the station. Mr. Kwu refused an invitation from Dr. Sun to take a government place at Peking, preferring rather to continue in the humble work of a country minister.

The picture shows six of the faculty (seated) and recent graduates (standing) of Severance Medical College, Seoul, Korea. There are sixty-six students in the school, all of whom are Christians. A new college hall was recently built by L. H. Severance of New York City. The teaching force is contributed by several denominations now operating in Korea.

Place for a Church Bell in Montana

The town of Hysham, on the line of the Northern Pacific in Montana, half way between Miles City and Billings, is five years old and growing rapidly. But its first church building is barely completed. It has taken the pastor, Rev. William Crosby Ross, a long and weary time to get it finished, because there is so much building going on in the town that it has been hard to hold the local carpenters down to the church job—a token in itself of how much the church is needed. The structure belongs to the Presbyterians, of course, but is really the parish church of the village. The pastor has solicited most of the funds from the local community, and the Presbyterian Board of Church Erection has contributed $400. There is not enough margin left, however, to provide what is very necessary in a community of this sort, a church bell, and Mr. Ross is hoping that some donor from a self-supporting congregation will supply that. Any person or congregation willing to bear this expense is invited to communicate with Dr. Charles L. Thompson, secretary of the Home Board at New York City. It is better to write to Dr. Thompson than to Mr. Ross, because there may be more than one offer, and Dr. Thompson will know what to do with any surplus, while quite possibly Mr. Ross would not.

The Adirondack Lumberjacks' Mission

Rev. Frank E. Higgins has finished his survey of the lumber camps in the Adirondacks and has returned to join the eight men of his force who are working in the camps of Minnesota, where he will remain until the lumberjacks come out of the woods in April. The explorations of Mr. Higgins in the Adirondacks discovered 3,000 loggers in the camps and practically no Christian work whatever being carried on among them. Before leaving the Adirondack region the "sky pilot" arranged for Rev. A. W. Maddox, pastor at Tupper Lake, and Mr. Smith of Cranberry Lake to begin touring the lumber camps immediately. Mr. Maddox is to give all his time to this activity, and his first year's salary is already provided for by money which Mr. Higgins raised in the churches adjacent to the Adirondack region before he started West. Mr. Smith will preach at the camps during the week, while retaining his Sabbath preaching appointment at Cranberry Lake. Rev. Thomas D. Whittles of North East, Pa., formerly associated with Mr. Higgins in Minnesota, accompanied him on this trip through the Adirondacks and assisted in gathering the desired data.

Missionary Brevities

—From Ningpo, China, Rev. E. F. Knickerbocker writes that it seemed quite homelike and American to watch the Ningpo-Hangchow railway in process of construction past the Presbyterian mission compound. The new station is within two minutes' walk of the missionary's house. But one thing about the scene was quite un-American—among the workmen, who were all Chinese, the missionary has never seen one drunken man, and not a single grog shop has been set up anywhere along the line. Instead, there have been built a number of large tea shops, and the peaceable workmen patronize these liberally.

—The national convention of the Y. M. C. A. for China met in Peking with 300 delegates planned for as the probable attendance. So great was the interest in the meeting, however, that 450 actually appeared. The whole body went to the palace to call on President Yuan Shih Kai. He received them in person and made a speech which praised the association heartily, and expressed the hope that the Christian spirit would be widely disseminated through the republic. A number of eminent members of the government addressed the convention.

Board Notes and Announcements

—Hope was the keynote Friday morning from the Bible lesson, Hannah's hymn of thanksgiving, at Room 48, Chicago. The bulletin of Pasadena First church, which supports six foreign and two home missionaries, was a well from which the leader, Mrs. Graham of Chicago Third church, drew much refreshment. Rev. Herbert Blair of Korea and C. H. Bandy of India added notes of gladness. They claimed the constant upholding of prayer as the only help whereby what has been could have been done, and what must be can be done. Mrs. Shaw welcomed most cordially three student volunteers, who quietly confessed their joy in awaiting God's call. The India secretary reported twelve letters from that field and made thankful mention of the missionary spirit quickened among McCormick Seminary students by the words of Mr. Bandy.

SOME NEW BOOKS

Irishmen Past and Present

THE LIGHTER SIDE OF IRISH LIFE, by George A. Birmingham. Mr. Birmingham (to use his pen name) has attained repute as a humorist, and the present book is described by the publishers as his "most humorous work." It may well be so; yet the humor is of the tender, mildly ironical kind that a man might indulge in at the expense of his mother while exposing, explaining and excusing her foibles.

He begins by describing the Irish "As Others See Us"—the typical Irishman of the novelist, made up of an impossible combination of nonmoral Puckish traits, who may once have existed, but has long since vanished. The contemporary Irishman, according to the author, is free from illusion and possessed of a power of facing facts, full of nervous industry, sharpened wits and sensitive pride. He is thus naively contrasted with his rulers: "We know quite well that the Englishman is our superior in many matters. He succeeds where we fail, grows rich while we remain poor; and although he is, as a rule, much stupider than we are, he continues to govern us in spite of our efforts to prevent him, although we ought by rights to be governing him."

The history of Ireland, Mr. Birmingham explains, broke off abruptly and made a fresh start after the famine of 1846-7-8; old Ireland ended and new Ireland gradually began to be. Even the very type of faces has changed, but the country has not become Americanized, though thousands upon thousands of her sons and daughters are in America. A special chapter entitled "The Yank"—meaning Yankee—deals with emigration and returned "Yanks." The generosity of the American Irish to their friends at home is freely conceded, and besides financing the homes, says the author, they also "finance our politics"; but for all that the home land is not fond of them. American Irish will enjoy the book, even though it may not lead them to go "home" to live.

Mr. Birmingham's style is easy and diverting and makes the reader forget the somewhat disjointed and disconnected range of subjects and anecdotes. The sixteen illustrations from water color drawings by Henry W. Kerr, specially mounted on tinted paper, are a joy to the eye. Most of them depict the old rather than the new Irishman. [Frederick A. Religious Works of Note

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA, Volume XV. With the approval of the censor, Oct. 1, 1912, the great Catholic Encyclopedia, begun more than five years ago, reaches its completion in the fifteenth volume. The general plan and characteristics of the work have been previously described in its process of publication. The last volume faithfully adheres to the plan of the editors, or editorial board, and conserves the excellent features of the whole work. Perhaps the longest article, and certainly one of the most interesting, is under the caption "Vatican." It gives a fairly full account of the capitol of Catholicism from every imaginable point of view—archæological, historical, descriptive and political. Other articles of distinctively Roman Catholic interest are those on "Tradition," "Trent," "Virgin" and "Vulgate." This last, of course, interests the Protestant biblical scholar also. The editors have taken care to include among the Catholic biographies in the volume those of such eminent artists as Von Beethoven, Verdi and Weber; and the lives of Cardinals Vaughan and Wiseman naturally fall in this volume. A rather extensive article on union brings into view the history of union movements following schisms in the ancient church, and the whole theory of Christian union as it presents itself to the Roman Catholic in our own times. What might be regarded purely Protestant subjects have not been altogether excluded, as is evident from a very fair and compendious report of the reformer Zwingli. The Catholic Church and the editors of the encyclopedia in particular are to be congratulated on the auspicious completion of this great work. [Robert Appleton and Company, New York. $6 net.

THE MEANING OF GOD IN HUMAN EXPERIENCE, by William Ernest Hocking. Probably nothing has appeared within the last twelve months on the philosophy of religion which more rightfully deserves the attention of careful thinkers and students than this work by Professor Hocking of Yale University. Dr. Hocking's effort, like that of his illustrious predecessor, Dr. Samuel Harris, is directed toward providing a philosophical basis for the theistic interpretation of the universe; unlike Dr. Harris's monumental work, it does not aim to affiliate faith in theism with the conventional philosophy of the early part of the nineteenth century, but with the science of religion as it presents itself to the thinker today. The fundamental assumption upon which it proceeds is that the basis of religion is superrational or subrational, i. e., moral, psychological, social, historical, pragmatic or mystic. Of course the author does not place the contents of all these terms on a basis of equality, nor does he regard them as mutually exclusive. On the contrary, he believes that an adequate conception of theism must combine the truth of the standpoints furnished by every one of these superrational grounds for religion. He also believes that, in the effort to approach the idea of theism from any one of the standpoints thus furnished, certain aberrations and confusions follow. Thus it is necessary to do critical work in connection with each of them. Dr. Hocking's method with them is, therefore, partly critical and partly constructive. To trace his thought or even indicate in the briefest way his conclusions would necessitate a review far beyond the limits possible here. It may suffice to say that the work is characterized by a keen analysis, a firm grasp of the difficult problems involved and unusual clearness and directness of statement. Dr. Hocking excels especially in his exposition of mysticism. [Yale University Press, New Haven.

The Loeb Classical Library

LOEB CLASSICAL LIBRARY, edited by T. E. Page and W. H. D. Rouse. The first volumes of this most commendable new work are before us and deserve the eager attention of all scholars. The aim of the library is to reprint the great body of classical and early Christian literature, giving the original Greek and Latin texts with English translations on the opposite pages. The cloth bindings appear in some cases to be a little flimsy, but the paper is excellent, the workmanship careful and the type (particularly the Greek) presents a beautifully clear face. The volumes are of most convenient size, being only 4½ inches by 6¾. Among those already received are the following: EURIPIDES, in four volumes, translated by A. S. Way; PROPERTIUS, by H. E. Butler; ST. AUGUSTINE'S CONFESSIONS, in two volumes, by W. Watts; THE APOSTOLIC FATHERS, in two volumes, by Kirsopp Lake; PHILOSTRATUS'S LIFE OF APOLLONIUS OF TYANA, in two volumes, by F. C. Conybeare; TERENCE, in two volumes, by J. Sargeaunt; LUCIAN, the first of eight volumes, by A. M. Interesting New Drama

KISMET: An "Arabian Night" in Three Acts, by Edward Knoblauch. A dramatic version of the Oriental play acted last year with such success by Otis Skinner. The leading figure is an Arabian beggar, who, for one glorious day, defies fate ("kismet") and penetrates the wonders of a Bagdad fairyland. There is poetry here in abundance, as well as comedy and a haunting vein of fatality. And, though in reading one misses the gorgeous spectacle of Orientalism seen in the production, Mr. Knoblauch's language is so pictorial as to produce practically the same illusions. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1 net.

THE LOWER DEPTHS: A Play in Four Acts, by Maxim Gorky. Mr. Gorky makes no attempt to solve problems in his drama; he merely presents a group of people—types varying from thieves and street walkers to blacksmiths and barons—who have formed the deadly habit of lying about themselves and about life, with the result of being forever unable to face reality. The very lack of moralizing makes the thing the most powerful kind of sermon. [Duffield and Company, New York. $1 net.

Some Recent Fiction

BUBBLES OF THE FOAM, by F. W. Bain. How much of his story Mr. Bain gets out of Hindu manuscript and how much originates in his own brain the reader of this and his previous volumes may not always be sure. But he succeeds in interpreting the spirit of Hindu life and thought in a way which makes a mighty appeal to the imagination. The desert with its vastness and mystery, its elusive and fantastic garment of distance; the littleness of man and the futility of his planning; the power of love, which has "its origin in dream, its acme in ecstasy and its catastrophe in disillusion"; and finally, the grim hand of fate—these grip the reader's interest. Love and the moon have always been related, but in Hindu thought the words for them are practically identical. The moon looks down upon the white bones of a camel laughing back and saying to the orb of night, "By the help of thy beams I am whiter than thyself," but the night wind rushes over and scatters oblivion upon them. So are the dreams and ambitions of human life. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.50 net.

THE GIFT OF ABOU HASSAN, by Francis Perry Elliot. This is an amusing and fantastic story, laid in modern New York, but reading like the tale of the 1002d night. A young and not overmodest clubman sees a pretty girl outside the antique shop of a Persian dealer, where she has gone in quest of a wonderful rug. The rug is like none other, for whoever steps upon it can neither be seen nor heard. The young man falls in love at first sight, and the way in which he proceeds to make the girl's acquaintance, the tale of the wooing, complicated by events for which the magic rug is responsible, furnish entertaining reading. HADEN WILSON, by P. H. Wilkerson, is a story told with some degree of art, the scene of which is laid in Oklahoma when it was yet the Indian Territory. It purports to give the career of a young missionary who made his home in one of the half-breed border towns, and, after conquering the good will of its rough inhabitants, married and settled down to work among improved conditions. The story is said to be absolutely true, and those who passed through the Cherokee nation in the last decade of the last century will easily believe it all. Books of Sermons

THE ORIGIN AND AIM OF THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, by J. M. Wilson. This little volume contains six sermons preached in Worcester cathedral during the Lenten Sundays of 1912. The preacher's use of the works of such authorities as Harnack, Ramsay, Blass, Kirsopp Lake, Glover and Knowling gives the sermons a considerable value in a scholarly way, and yet the style is simple enough to be understood by all. The book is designed to provoke an intelligent reading of the book of Acts. [Macmillan Company, New York. 80 cents net.

MORRISON'S SERMONS, Vol. III.: The Afterglow of God, contains twenty-five or thirty evening addresses by this celebrated Glasgow preacher. Those who have already Dr. Morrison's "Wings of the Morning" and "The Unlighted Luster" will be sure to wish this third volume of the series, for there are few more suggestive and charming preachers in the pulpit today than he. Ways of Working

Drowned "Mr. Debt" in the Pacific

Another plan for a congregational meeting which can be used at the annual meeting or on some special occasion is that suggested by a recent debt raising campaign at Beloit, Kan. The church owed $2,350. A chart was drawn with familiar cities at different distances from Beloit along a route which Mr. Debt could take to reach the ocean. A movable disk indicated his progress toward oblivion and within fifteen minutes after the plan was suggested he had traveled 866 miles. Before long he had passed Salt Lake City and was on his way toward the mountains. Within twenty-five days the obnoxious gentleman had reached the Pacific and forty-four miles from shore disappeared.

The pastor, Rev. F. L. Benedict, at a Sunday evening service following displayed his talent as a cartoonist by sketching one of the committee members officiating at the departure of Mr. Debt over the side of the vessel. The mechanical device used in the campaign added a spice, so that no oysters were sacrificed and no money was received from outside the church. The church also during the same time contributed largely to benevolences and has been growing rapidly.

Study Methods of Other Churches

A simple method of stimulating interest in church affairs which has attracted the attention of a number of churches was tried with conspicuous success not long ago by North church, Binghamton, N. Y. Rev. A. C. Sawtelle, the pastor, appointed five committees of seven members each, with instructions to investigate wherever they pleased how other churches are managing various departments of their work. These committees investigated church finances, Sabbath school, stated services, young people's work and church societies. One church service was given over to a presentation of the plan of investigation and the names of the committee members were published in the church calendar.

These thirty-five persons were given six weeks to study the practice of other churches along the lines they had determined upon and a congregational meeting was called to hear the reports. It was the livest congregational meeting that church had ever had.

One result of the investigation which had a direct bearing upon the work of that church was a change in the church finances. There had been some discussion of the proposal to change the financial system from the rental of pews to the budget plan. It had never seemed to be popular and people said that it could not be done in North church. Upon the report of the church finance committee, however, showing that other churches were having large success with the budget plan that system was immediately adopted without a dissenting vote.

One of the incidental results of this investigation and series of reports was the interest aroused in the general work of the church. One man said, "I never realized what an institution this church is nor what a broad field it covers." The people felt more pride in their church and are working eagerly to carry into effect the best things which each committee discovered to be applicable to North church.

Pastors and Churches Introduced

Although the work of the committee on vacancy and supply through the recently elected secretary, Rev. Walter H. Houston, has not been in progress for many months, a number of pastors have been placed with churches through this new agency of the church. Dr. G. N. Luccock, chairman of the committee, says that reports show that the number of churches seeking ministers is about equal to the number of applications of ministers who want pulpits. Mr. Houston still has his office at Columbus, Ohio, and is using most of his energy gathering information about the churches.

The brotherhood of Second church, Bloomington, Ill., is working for the success of the evening service.

Waiting for the Boat

"I desire to return to our Board of Relief my heartfelt thanks for the $25 check received as a Christmas gift. It would be difficult to tell you what joy it gave us, or to tell how much it helped us in our time of need. I am now about to cross the line into the 89th year of my age, and view myself as a man on the bank of the river waiting for the boat to come to take me over. I hope to be able to say when it does come, "I am ready." Rev. —— (an old personal friend) is gone. We have sat together in church for about eighteen years and have been close friends for twenty-three years, but he has reached home a little ahead of me, but I shall soon be with him, and our corner in the church will be vacant. God bless our Board of Relief is the writer's prayer. I have received no blank this year for clothing, and I will not ask for one for fear I will take away from some more needy. Again I thank the board for the $25 check."

While this aged servant of the church "waits for the boat" he ought to be enabled to wait in comfort and in peace.

The Open Hearth

Look After the Children

The Sunday school statistical report of Dr. W. H. Roberts, recently referred to in The Continent, calls for serious attention. If the figures are accurate (and in view of the well known carefulness of Dr. Roberts we must believe that they are substantially correct) the situation is certainly appalling. In some 2,000 Sunday schools "not even a single child to confess Christ." Among 38,000 Sunday school children not one appears to unite with the church during the past year.

If this condition should continue for the next ten years our churches will be compelled to report a steady loss of membership. Calling to mind the fact that 80 per cent of the additions to the membership of our churches comes from the Sunday school, such a situation cannot continue without disastrous results to all of our churches.

It is a matter of deep regret that there is, apparently, such a widespread apathy respecting the situation. Our churches need to be aroused to a sense of impending danger. There is no subject of such vital importance to the future growth and the spiritual life of the church as this. The next General Assembly should appoint a commission, composed of both laymen and ministers, to study the causes of this widespread failure and suggest means for improving both the educational and spiritual efficiency of our Sunday schools. F. W. O.

Would Not Fight Socialism

The position of Joseph Muhr against the statement that the church college is a foe to socialism is well taken. Such statements are harmful to the church. It is a flattery, or seeking the favor of a wealthy man—J. J. Hill—and an impudence to the workingman; a favor to one man at the risk of insulting almost a million plain Americans. It creates a prejudice against the church which we cannot afford.

The socialist movement is the laboring man's demand for justice, and any attempt on the part of college and church to check it puts them directly on the side of vested interests in opposition to the millions of poverty stricken and oppressed humanity. In so far as either college or church takes this position, it ceases to be Christian, no matter how much J. J. Hill and his kind can give to college and church. Consequently, the plain man will come to think the church no friend of his, but an enemy to be fought. His thought will rule his decision.

This is exactly where the Roman Church is meeting its most serious problem since the reformation. It takes no prophetic vision to say it must reverse its decisions or go to ruin in its opposition to socialism. The laboring man has come to know his rights and also his power. The Protestant church has consequently laid at her feet the largest opportunities and responsibilities. Her field now is the laborers of the world. They need courtesy and sympathy from the church. I do not say the laboring man is always right, but Mirabeau's saying will apply here: "When the people complain they are usually right."

When moral issues are at stake we cannot safely say we are unbiased. There is need of righteous bias. Now the socialist movement, while it is practical, is also moral and ethical. It is Christian, too, in what it aims to do. It is growing with such rapidity that sooner or later the Christian church will be forced to take sides. It may even be the cause of division like the question of chattel slavery. The sympathy of the church, at least, should be on the side of the social movement for the emancipation of the workingman.

GATES E. W. YOUNG.

An Effective Story

A novel that can call young men to the gospel ministry is surely a story worth while. Such a novel is "The Echo of Union Chapel," by Clarence E. Hatfield, who, I am informed, is a Presbyterian preacher in Missouri. This story of church, love and difficulty worked out in the Ozark hills called one of my own sons to the work of the Master, as well as the son of a neighbor. Do I rejoice? Those who have had like experience know. I am in hope the author is a reader of The Continent and that I can some day meet him face to face. J. T. J.

Lay Moderatorship Again

Your recent articles on the question of an elder as moderator of Presbyterian judicatories suggest the following considerations:

There are several official and ministerial functions which belong exclusively to an ordained minister as such, which no elder can exercise. Foremost among these is that of preaching. The services of the moderator of presbytery or General Assembly are very frequently desired as preacher on special occasions. This is perfectly proper. Those desiring the moderator at such times exercise the privilege of mutual honors. They consider it an honor to the moderator's office to invite him, and an equal honor to themselves to have him. An elder could not fill the duty.

Next may be mentioned the need of the presence of a moderator to ordain new men to the ministry. There are many candidates who rightfully desire the favor of being ordained by the incumbent of the moderator's chair as a happy memory to cherish all through their ministry. An elder could not serve. Also, it is often pleasant to have a moderator present at intallation services of newly chosen pastors in many places. Men have their choices in such matters, and the flexibility of Presbyterianism does not infringe them. An elder would be incompetent. The moderator is often wanted at dedication services of new churches. His presence adds dignity and the weight of the entire presbytery or General Assembly to the occasion. An elder could not do this.

Many persons like to have a moderator officiate at baptism of their children, or at weddings in the family. These functions an elder could not exercise.

It is an easy matter to reserve all these privileges to the ministry by electing only ministers to the moderatorship. It is no invidious comparison between the ministers and elders to keep their functions distinct. It is fully honoring the elders to elect them as vice-moderators. They then have the ecclesiastical authority of the office, without in any way intruding on or interfering with the functions belonging to the ministry. S. C.

School and College

Huron College has issued to its friends a statement showing that it costs $137 a day to run the college. The income per day from tuitions and endowment is $97.

By the will of the late James Archer of Steubenville, Ohio, for many years a member of the board of Muskingum College, the institution will receive $20,000. The state oratorical contest for Ohio was held at Muskingum Feb. 14.

Muskingum College won the first place in the Ohio state oratorical contest held at New Concord recently. During the five years that Muskingum College has been a member of this league it has won first place three times, second once and third once.

Joseph W. Cochran, D. D., secretary of the Board of Education, and Rev. George G. Mahy, secretary of Assembly's evangelistic committee, were at Hanover College Jan. 29 to Feb. 2. Nineteen young men and twenty-three young women took Dr. Cochran's "student volunteer pledge."

The day of prayer for colleges was observed by Parsons College in Barhydt Memorial chapel. Rev. John B. Rendall, Jr., pastor of the church at Muscatine, Iowa, gave the address in the morning. This was the initial day in the eight day evangelistic campaign, in which Mr. Rendall assisted President Parsons.

Founder's Day, Feb. 5, at Mount Hermon Boys' School, which Dwight L. Moody founded at Northfield thirty years ago, was made notable this year by the dedication of the new Schauffler memorial library, the gift of Mrs. A. F. Schauffler of New York City in memory of Dr. William G. Schauffler, long connected with educational and missionary work in Turkey. Mount Hermon with many new buildings in recent years has been kept true to the original purpose of Mr. Moody, keeping the price of board and tuition low and opening its doors only to those who cannot afford to go to a more expensive school. It maintains a unique position in that the school is open all the year round; the dignity of manual labor is taught; and each student is required to take two hours a week in Bible study. Kenarden hall on Northfield Seminary campus was also dedicated Feb. 5.

Occidental College did not celebrate the day of prayer for colleges in the conventional way. A general prayer service each day for one week was given over to special meetings under special leaders. The young men gathered in the Y. M. C. A. room by themselves each day and the young women in their own room. The last day of the week a special assembly was held and all the students and the faculty were together. The speaker was E. F. Hallenbeck, D. D., of San Diego. There are about twenty-five students in Occidental College pledged to Christian work.

There are as yet very few Presbyterian colleges which include in their faculties professors wholly devoted to teaching the Bible. In most cases the required Bible teaching is distributed among various members of the faculty. But Huron College is now preparing to join this small and select list. Mrs. Blackfield to the Rescue

"Anything left of Mrs. Blackfield, Marcus?"

"We have put in a day, sir," said Marcus, who also had lunched on milk and corn flakes.

Beplumed and bedraggled—for she had rehatted with the creation intended for the luncheon, and she had dripped her tailored skirt like a fishwife—with shining eyes and the color he used to see in her cheeks in the old days, Mrs. Blackfield gave a final whisk and ran out to her husband.

Mr. Blackfield read the history of the day in one comprehensive glance. He was used to situations. He could tell by the swing of an iron welder's back whether the man was going to stay on the job or walk out tomorrow. And there were no lost opportunities in his biography.

Mr. Blackfield claimed advantage of the twilight and the recessed door and took his wife in his arms. Then he reached down and back into the vocabulary of his youth and addressed her:

"Gee, but you're a peach!" And he kissed her as he had kissed her in the old days.

How Antonio Became Famous

"My lad," he said, "you have done a piece of work of which the greatest artists would be proud. Who are you, and who has been your teacher?"

"I am Antonio Canova," said the boy, "and I have had no teacher save my grandfather, the stonecutter."

All the guests crowded around Antonio. They were, many of them, famous artists, and they knew the little lad for a genius. When they seated themselves at the table, they insisted that little Antonio have a seat with them, and the dinner was made a feast in his honor.

The next day the count sent for Antonio to come and live with him. The most noted artists in the country were sent for to teach the little lad; and, instead of carving butter, he cut and shaped marble, and became one of the greatest sculptors in the world.

"His father's testimony."

"Father, you don't know that the old man who died was Mr. Horton's father."

"Don't know? Of course I know. Let us have done with this. You do not know men. I do. A man of such grade, such class——"

Before her father could finish the girl broke in, "Grade? Class? What do you mean?"

"I mean that this man who seems to have bewitched you is low-born. I cannot understand your interest in him. He is beneath us. He can never attain to our standing."

"The worse for the standing," she answered hotly. Then, softening her tone, "What do you mean by 'beneath us,' father?"

"Why, that we are of the genteel sort. You are a lady. In the veins of your ancestors flowed the best blood of the colonies, and those back of them belonged to the nobility of England. There was once, Eleanor, a Lord Elmore of Devonshire, and between us and this drunken pauper's son——"

Then the cloud of the girl's wrath burst. She sprang from the stool where she had been sitting by him and her words fell on his head like hot rain.

"I a lady," she cried, "and you a lordling? Oh, you are wrong! I am only a plain American girl who despises shams. And you? I thought you were a just, true, sham-scorning American man, and I am finding—oh, the shame of it!—I am finding you, my father"—she paused a moment, then ended her sentence—"only a common snob!"

Then, the color flooding back into her face that had paled with anger, and with her heart in a tumult, she rushed from the room.

CHAPTER XVII.

LIGHTNING STROKE AND CLOUD

ELEANOR and her mother were already at the table when Mr. Elmore joined them for dinner. The girl had regained her composure and serenely did her best to conceal the situation from her mother and to make the hour pass pleasantly for all three. Her father, however, was in no mood to be pleased. Anger, shame and resentment possessed his soul, and he did not comprehend that his daughter's serenity had cost her a struggle and was intended as her peace offering. Anger is often the supremest selfishness. In all his life Mr. Elmore had never been so angry, never so conscious of himself.

At the end of what was for him a wretched hour, "Eleanor," he said, as they rose, "I would like to see you in my room."

The girl understood her father's mood; she knew that the request meant more misery. Resolving that she at least would contribute nothing to it, and that she would make peace if possible, she agreed promptly. "We'll be back pretty soon, mother," she said as she established Mrs. Elmore in a pleasant spot in the parlor. "You wait here."

Upstairs in her father's room she took her usual place on the stool at his feet.

"I'm sorry, father," she began, without waiting for him to speak first, "very sorry for this afternoon." The look in her face was of the tenderest love, could her father but have seen it. For a moment he almost relented, then resentment returned and mastered him. His answer contained no acknowledgment of the apology that had cost her such an effort.

"Do you realize what you said to me this afternoon, Eleanor?"

"Yes, father. As I say, I'm very sorry."

He did not heed the pleading in her eyes. "Do those words represent the estimate you place on me after years of devotion, years in which no want of yours has been denied?"

"No, dear father, it was not an estimate. It was a surge of anger."

"That will not do, Eleanor. You deliberately insulted me for the sake of a man of whom you know nothing, and of whom I know far too much."

"Please, father, don't let us quarrel. It was not deliberate, it was a flash. It was not for his sake but for the principle that underlay the matter. I'm very sorry for what I said; I'd gladly recall it all. I hoped that was why you asked me up here—to give me a chance to take it back. I am sorry, father."

"You may well be." As her humility brought him gratification, it also increased his sense of injury, and he sought to humble her further. "You have said to me what I shall never forget. An Elmore called a snob by a slip of a girl just out of school, and all because of her silly notion about the honor of a——"

"Don't, father, oh, don't!" she cried. "I was very angry this afternoon. I'm very tired and sad now. Don't make me angry again. Let us be friends once more, father."

"'Was angry'? 'Don't make me angry again'? What right has a girl to be angry at her father? Have you forgotten the commandment, 'Honor thy father'?"

"No, dear father. I want to honor you, and will, if you don't prevent me."

New York G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS London

"You want to honor me? Why then have you disobeyed me in the matter of this man Drum? I told you to have nothing more to do with him. Yet when you returned to college after the holidays you allowed him to ride in the same car seat with you——"

"No, sir!" The girl jumped to her feet. "Not for a moment. Mr. Sleighton sat by me. Mr. Horton was at the other end of the car, and I did not know that until just before reaching the junction. Then Mr. Sleighton——"

"That will do. Mr. Tappan saw him with you, and told me."

"Oh, father! What has come over you? You are so unfair."

"Hush, Eleanor. In June last you wrote to him. You——"

"Father, you go too far. I wrote three lines to him asking him to take Charlie and get him into Yale. I did it because Charlie wrote such a pitiful letter to me. Everyone had tried and failed; I thought I would try for your sake, for Charlie's sake, for the sake of us all. Oh, why will you be so unkind?"

Then once more her father changed his point of attack. "What made Malcolm Stuart go on to Hongkong alone?"

It was a fatal question. The girl accepted the issue. Her tone, which had been pleading and tender, became cold, steady and emotionless. "The fact that he was alone, I suppose," she answered.

"Eleanor, do not evade my questions. I will not have it. You know he intended to stop at Shanghai."

She made no answer, and he grew impatient. "Why do you not reply?" he urged.

"You asked me no question."

"Did you not know he intended to stop here?"

"I knew he thought perhaps he might."

"What made him change his mind so suddenly?"

"Did he change it suddenly?"

"Eleanor, I will not have this. I will have my questions answered. Did Stuart ask you to be his wife?"

"What makes you think he did, father?"

Mr. Elmore was nearly beaten, but pride made him say one more thing.

"Because he asked me, Eleanor, if he might offer himself to you. I told him yes. I never for a moment supposed you would refuse such a man for the sake of that other nameless——"

He went no further. With one of those swift movements peculiar to women she was at the door.

"Good-by, father. I'll go before I commit a worse offense than that of this afternoon. I will never speak again as I did then. You have become possessed with the idea that I am infatuated with Mr. Horton, a man to whom I have spoken only twice, and neither time for more than five minutes. He cares nothing for me, and if he did I would not marry him, should he ask me, until he had your consent and until you had told me it would please you."

She had spoken with her hand on the knob, and as she finished passed out into the corridor. But before the door was quite closed behind her she heard a hurried call from within. "Wait, Eleanor! Wait!"

She turned back to see her father with hand outstretched, risen from his chair. "Did you mean all that—all of it?" he asked in a shaken voice.

"Yes, father," she said proudly, still holding her place at the door across the room from him.

"Come back then, Lennie! Come back!" But before she reached his side the weary brain, overwrought by passion, had given way and he had dropped unconscious into his chair.

Baptism as a Way to Unity

Rev. William A. Cutler, an honored member of Milwaukee Presbytery, has recently written and issued a paper-covered booklet of some fifty pages on the general theme of baptism—"One Baptism That Will Unite All Christians Into the One Body of Christ." Mr. Cutler refers to the spirit of unity as shown in the missionary conference at Edinburgh and in the American Federation of Churches.

Greek Letter Societies to Go

Ending a long agitation on the subject, the trustees of Wooster University, by a vote of 13 to 10, have ordered the abolition of all the Greek letter societies in the college, both among the men and among the women.

Over 18,000 Converts at Columbus

Meetings by W. A. Sunday Attract Thousands —Preaches 112 Sermons in Seven Weeks—Chief of Police a Personal Worker.

COLUMBUS—What was without doubt the greatest evangelistic campaign ever conducted in America closed in this city Feb. 16. For seven weeks Dr. W. A. Sunday preached afternoons and evenings in the tabernacle erected for the meetings and his workers, with the aid of local churches, carried the gospel message to every corner of the city.

The tabernacle had a seating capacity of 10,000 persons, and generally 2,000 additional were permitted to stand around the sides. The afternoon audiences ranged from 6,000 to 10,000, while the evening audiences generally packed the building, and not infrequently as many more sought but were unable to gain entrance. According to newspaper men, who kept a daily record, the total attendance was 825,000, or an average of 8,800 at the ninety-three meetings.

Billy Sunday gave Columbus a remarkable example of strenuosity, preaching 112 sermons. Cards were received with the names of 18,333 persons who signified their acceptance of Christ. Of these about 3,000 came from the meetings conducted for children and young people. About 1,000 represented persons from outside the city. These figures by no means include all, as often the number was too large for the force of workers and many were not registered. The last three days were specially remarkable. Friday 1,235, Satuday 965 and on the Sabbath 2,189 different persons signified their desire to become Christians.

Many things were discussed in a characteristic way, but these were all incidental to the presentation of the great central theme, "The wages of sin is death, and salvation is alone by repentance and faith in the atoning blood of Jesus Christ."

Among the converts were city and county officials, saloonkeepers and professors, society women and shop girls, school children and gray-haired grandmothers and grandfathers, infidels and agnostics. Every class was represented. It is said that more than fifty members of the Franklin county bar were among the converts. Chief of Police Charles E. Carter was an early convert and became an effective personal worker, as did Saloonkeeper Gill, Hotelkeeper Young and many others. It is said that every newspaper reporter regularly covering the meeting was converted.

On a recent evening Governor Cox occupied a chair on the choir platform. Congressman-Elect Brumbaugh attended and worked in the meetings. Most of the churches are now engaged in holding special follow-up services.

College Farm Work for Profit

At a recent meeting of the trustees of Blackburn College, Carlinville, Ill., it was voted to add to the college a self-help department. Beginning next fall the college farm will be operated by students under the direction of a trained agriculturist in such a way that the farm will prove both a laboratory and a means of profit to the students. The state university has been operating for four years twenty acres of the land owned by the college as an experiment station, and the remainder of the farm of eighty-five acres will be operated along the same lines by Blackburn with student labor.

The dormitory for women is to be thoroughly overhauled and a woman trained in the art of home making is to be put in charge. The work in the dormitory will be done by the young women and they will be given courses in domestic science in the most practical way. By this means the college will be able to reduce the cost of living to a minimum and to enable many young people to obtain an education who otherwise would be denied the privilege.

Dr. J. A. Marquis, president of Coe College, is suffering from a nervous breakdown and has gone to Texas for rest.

Wrestle with Board Problems

Executive Commission Meets in New York—Moderator Matthews Speaks at Many Meetings—China Campaign Pushed by Women.

NEW YORK—The Executive Commission of General Assembly began its midwinter session at the Hotel Savoy, Wednesday, Feb. 26, and will continue Thursday and possibly a third day. The commission is wrestling with the request Assembly made of the Board of Church Erection to put a good part of the Kennedy endowment out at once to help weak churches in the West; also the suggestion that one purchasing agent should buy all supplies for the boards. The late Dr. William H. Hubbard is greatly missed.

Moderator Busy in East

Moderator Mark A. Matthews left Seattle Feb. 17 and arrived in New York Saturday night, Feb. 22. Mrs. Matthews was to have accompanied him and they were to have been the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Yereance. But one Matthews child was ill and at the last moment the little boy also took sick. Dr. Matthews preached Sunday morning in Central church and Sunday evening at a union service of Scotch church and Fourth church in the latter. The pastors, Doctors Edgar W. Work and David G. Wylie, were in the pulpit. Monday morning he addressed the preachers' meeting of Philadelphia and that evening the Philadelphia Social Union. Tuesday he was in New York at a meeting of the committee on church work. Wednesday evening he was due to speak before the Newark, N. J., Presbyterian Social Union, the meeting being postponed two days at his request. Friday evening, Feb. 28, he is scheduled to make an address in Baltimore. He will be in Washington over Sunday and will preach in New York Avenue church, Dr. Wallace Radcliffe pastor. He will remain at the capital for the inauguration, returning to New York in time to speak at a mass meeting in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, of the Protestant churches of that borough, Wednesday evening, March 5. The following day he plans to leave for the West.

Landreth H. King has been elected president of the New York City Federation of Churches for its nineteenth year. The other officers are James H. Post, vice-president; Dr. J. Lewis Hartsock, a Methodist, recording secretary; Arthur M. Harris, treasurer.

The offering at Brick church on a recent Sunday, when Dr. William H. Foulkes of the Board of Relief and Sustentation presented his cause, was $3,628.

Dr. Charles F. Aked of San Francisco, but until two years ago of Fifth Avenue Baptist church, this city, preached in Madison Avenue Reformed church Sunday morning and evening, Feb. 23.

Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, pastor of Westminster Congregational chapel, London, will be the speaker March 18 in Carnegie hall at the annual spring rally of the evangelistic committee of New York City.

Dr. Andrew Henry, for seventeen years pastor of First U. P. church, Jersey City, N. J., died Feb. 18. He was 67 and had long been ill.

Many clergymen of New York City, headed by Rev. W. P. Swartz of the Sabbath Observance Society, went to Albany Feb. 19 and opposed a bill permitting attendance of children at moving-picture shows without their parents or guardians.

The men's club of Central church, Dr. Wilton Merle-Smith pastor, held its annual dinner at the Princeton Club Feb. 18. George I. Wilson, vice-president of the Equitable Life, was toastmaster. Addresses were made by William R. Willcox, a former public service commissioner; Dr. John H. Finley, president of the City College; Frank S. Hutchens and Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin of Madison Avenue church.

The funeral of General Stuart L. Woodford, who died Feb. 14, was held from "old" First church, Dr. Duffield, the pastor, having charge.

Campaign Opens on Friday

Meetings in connection with the China campaign conducted by the Women's Board of Foreign Missions will begin next Friday at 3 p. m. in Central church, with Mrs. Merle-Smith presiding and addresses by Rev. F. W. Bible, Dr. Arthur J. Brown and Miss C. E. Hawes. At the same hour in Greenwich church the speakers will be Rev. J. W. Cochran and Dr. Mary H. Fulton. At luncheon Saturday, March 1, at Hotel Astor Mrs. J. A. Hatfield will preside. Sunday afternoon, March 2, there will be three meetings—3 o'clock in Beck Memorial church, at the same hour in Faith church an important meeting for young people, at 4 o'clock in the Y. W. C. A. building, East 52d street, a meeting to which doctors and nurses are especially invited. On Monday at 3 p. m. in West-Park church Dr. Robert E. Speer will speak. At the same hour in Northminster church Dr. W. M. Hayes, Mrs. J. A. Williams and Dr. W. Merle-Smith will give closing addresses.

The men's club of First church, New Rochelle, celebrated its fifteenth anniversary recently by a dinner. One of the most important features of the occasion was an address by the newly elected pastor, George Reynolds, D. D.

Dr. J. C. Garritt has arrived in New York on furlough from Nanking, China, where he is the president of Union Theological Seminary. Dr. Garritt a few years ago served temporarily as a secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions during the absence of Mr. Speer on a tour of the mission fields.

Dr. David J. Burrell of Marble Collegiate Reformed church has been at the Union Theological Seminary of the Southern Church, Richmond, Va., delivering the addresses provided for by the Sprunt lectureship. Dr. Burrell's subject was sermon construction and delivery.

The Church of the Covenant, Dr. George S. Webster pastor, has a "go-to-church band" of seventy children from the Bible school. It is maintaining a high percentage of attendance at the regular Sunday services.

Although it is still three years off, "old" First church has begun to plan for its 200th anniversary. The original building stood in Wall street, near Broadway, and if the property had been kept Presbyterianism might have had as valuable a piece of property in New York as Trinity. The next oldest Presbyterian congregation in Manhattan is the Scotch, which was organized in 1756. Then comes Brick church and the fourth was Fifth Avenue, originally in Cedar street in 1808.

Plan Definite Church Extension

Big Meeting of Detroit Presbyterians Is Addressed by Dr. E. P. Hill—Ninth Generation of Ministers Represented by Candidate.

DETROIT—A notable meeting in the interests of the new plans for church extension in Detroit was held at Fort Street church Feb. 17. At the banquet all of the churches were represented, though the number had to be limited to 400. It was the most representative Presbyterian gathering held for many years. At the popular meeting in the main auditorium Dr. Pence, who is chairman of the church extension committee, introduced Dr. Edgar P. Hill of Chicago, who concentrated into half an hour a wealth of information and inspiration as to the methods pursued in Chicago, with some of the results accomplished. Dr. William T. Jaquess, the new superintendent of church extension, showed a large number of excellent slides, giving the social, industrial, moral and religious conditions of the city as they have never before been brought to the attention of Detroit Presbyterians. Dr. Vance, in a brief closing speech, stirred all hearts to put into practical shape the conclusions of the evening.

Detroit Presbytery met at Fort Street church house Feb. 17. A new budget of apportionment was made upon the various churches and accepted. Scarth Inglis, son of the late Rev. James Gale Inglis, was received under care of presbytery. He is the ninth in direct line of those who have given themselves to the gospel ministry. Arrangements were made for the installation of Rev. J. Earl Webber as pastor of the church of Northville March 13.

Ferdinand Schiverea, who was converted under the preaching of Dwight L. Moody, has been for two weeks conducting a most successful series of evangelistic services in Scovel Memorial church, of which Rev. James D. Jeffrey has been the only pastor.

James T. Black, D. D., of Bethany church, holds every year an evangelistic series of meetings, doing the preaching himself. These meetings are now in progress, with large prospects.

Bishop Charles D. Williams of the diocese of Michigan recently gave a fine address at the Presbyterian ministers' meeting on "The Christian Church in Relation to Modern Sociological Movements." William Bryant.

Would Enforce Bible Reading

Ministers Indorse Bill Concerning the Public Schools—Northern Liberties Church Has Largest Number at Brotherhood Rally.

PHILADELPHIA—Presbyterian ministers at their Monday meeting approved of the bill before the legislature providing that teachers of the public schools "shall read, at the opening of each session, at least ten verses of the Bible, without comment"; failure to comply being punishable by dismissal. A resolution warning parents against the increasing dangers of theaters and moving-picture shows was adopted. A request was directed to be sent President Taft to sign the bill prohibiting inter state transportation of liquor into dry territory.

The third of a series of rallies of Bible classes representing churches of all Protestant communions under the auspices of the Philadelphia County Sunday School Association was attended by about 400 members. Joseph McCutcheon, superintendent of Trinity Presbyterian church, presided and personal evangelism was discussed.

Announcement of the sudden death Feb. 18 of Mrs. B. B. Comegys, Jr., came as a great shock to the church in Philadelphia and vicinity, as she had been within a very short time apparently in vigorous health. She was an officer of the Women's Board of Foreign Missions and president of the Women's Foreign Missionary Society of Philadelphia Presbytery. Her father was George Junkin, LL. D., one of the prominent laymen of the church, and her grandfather of the same name a distinguished moderator and educator. She will be greatly missed in this city.

Moderator Matthews Speaks

Moderator Mark A. Matthews addressed the Presbyterian ministers in Witherspoon hall on Monday forenoon, Feb. 24. In the evening he was given a reception at the Bellevue-Stratford hotel by the laymen's social union.

The midwinter meeting of the Women's Home and Foreign Missionary Societies of Philadelphia North Presbytery in the Wakefield church of Germantown was largely attended. The exercises were conducted by the two presidents, Mrs. W. B. Jennings and Mrs. Albert M. Barnes. Rev. Henry W. Bloch, a former missionary in Salt Lake City, and Dr. Mary H. Fulton of China were the speakers.

Rev. Frank W. Bible of China and Rev. Herbert E. Blair of Korea have been delivering missionary addresses before the societies of Tabernacle, Fourth and Tenth churches.

Dr. W. H. Oxtoby of Tabernacle church gave his new lecture on the Waldenses before the Waldensian societies of Buffalo, Rochester and Cleveland last week.

The Presbyterian Superintendents' Association was entertained at its February meeting by the ladies of St. Paul's church. Decision Day was discussed by Harry E. Paisley, Murdo McKenzie, Walter W. Allison and Edward S. Bowman, D. D.

First church of Northern Liberties won the banner for largest attendance at the last monthly meeting of the Philadelphia union of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip. It had seventy-one men present. Twenty-six chapters were represented.

First Italian church is growing and has now about 450 communicants.

The sentiment against any increase in the number of saloons in the city is very decided, and it is understood that the license judges intend to respect it. In the adjoining county of Chester citizens are petitioning for revocation of licenses and obtaining remonstrances against the licensing of many hotels.

Dr. John B. Rendall, president of Lincoln University, recently addressed the West Chester Business Men's Association on "Business Ethics." W. P. White.

Church, Presbytery and Synod Record

"Annual Statistics," a blankbook ruled according to the Minutes of the General Assembly, one edition for churches and another for presbyteries and synods, has been published by Vernon N. Yergin of Auburn, N. Y. The book when written up gives all the statistics of a church from its organization, and of presbyteries and synods from the beginning of the summaries. Mr. Yergin has given the matter of the proper handling and recording of church statistics long and careful study.

Bellevue Dedicates New Building

Dr. Little, the Pastor, Going to Philadelphia— —Open Forum Popular with Laboring Men —Many Hear Dr. Matthews.

PITTSBURG—The Bellevue congregation dedicated a new stone church building Sunday, Feb. 23. The dedicatory services were in charge of the retiring pastor, R. M. Little, D. D. The morning sermon was preached by Dr. James H. Snowden of Western Theological Seminary, and the evening sermon by Dr. Samuel McCormick, chancellor of the University of Pittsburg. The new building and ground cost in the neighborhood of $90,000 and is one of the finest suburban churches in the city. Following the dedicatory services a special program was arranged to lead up to communion service Sunday, March 2. Thursday evening J. Denny Oneil will give the address. Sunday evening, March 2, the pastor preaches his farewell sermon and leaves at once for Philadelphia, where he will take charge of the Society for Organized Charity of that city.

Sewickley church observed its seventy-fifth anniversary during the week beginning Feb. 23. The program consisted for the most part of historical addresses by former pastors and members. The church was organized Feb. 17, 1838. During that time the church has had but five pastors, the first four pastorates covering seventy-two years. The present pastor, Hugh L. Hodge, D. D., took charge Dec. 15, 1910. A remarkable thing about these pastorates is the fact that no pastor ever left to take another charge; each ended his ministry with the church.

The open forum under the auspices of Pittsburg Presbytery, launched in Second church Sunday afternoon, Feb. 16, was pronounced a decided success. The opening address was delivered by Dr. James H. Snowden and a general discussion followed. Much interest is being manifested by the laboring classes.

The churches of Kittanning are preparing for an extended evangelistic campaign under the leadership of Evangelist D. S. Toy. The ministers of the town, assisted by forty laymen, constructed the tabernacle in two days. Six churches have united in the movement.

Eva Ballington Booth spoke in the Nixon theater Sunday afternoon, Feb. 23, on the life and work of her father, the late General William Booth. Immediately after the address she left for Denver, Colo.

The W. C. T. U. of Allegheny county held its annual banquet at McCreery's dining room Thursday evening, Feb. 27. The principal address was made by J. Denny Oneill.

An unusually large crowd of men turned out to the Presbyterian Union dinner Friday evening, Feb. 21. Samuel Callen, D. D., pastor of Fourth church and president of the union, presided. The principal address was made by Dr. Mark A. Matthews. P. W. SNYDER.

Los Angeles Ministers Dine

Evening Meeting Addressed by Guests—Home for Working Girls Dedicated—Notable Visitors in Southern California.

LOS ANGELES—The Presbyterian ministers of Los Angeles recently made an innovation regarding the weekly meeting and once a month hold it in the evening as a banquet and invite each minister to bring his wife and one or more elders and their wives. The second meeting was at Bethany church. The chief address was by Rev. Joseph A. Stevenson of Santa Ana on "The Habit of Happiness." There were two or three guests from the outside who spoke—Mrs. W. P. White, Rev. F. G. Coan of Urumia, Persia, and Andrew Stevenson of Chicago.

Feb. 8 there was dedicated the Mary Andrews Clark Memorial Home for Working Girls, the gift of Senator W. A. Clark to the memory of his mother. Mrs. Clark came to Los Angeles from Iowa about twenty-eight years ago. She was a member of Third church and her benevolent character was a blessing to many. The deed to the property was given to the Y. W. C. A., which agreed to take charge of it.

Rev. Williell Thomson, who had not been in the active ministry for some years because of his health, was called home Feb. 6. His remains were borne to the grave by his four sons—Henry, who is in Oregon Agricultural College; Williell, Jr., who until called home by his father's failing health was teaching in the mission school of Santiago, Chile, and who will enter the theological seminary this fall; Fred, who is a senior in Princeton Seminary, and Harrison, who is still in his academic studies.

Guy W. Wadsworth, D. D., who is field secretary of General Assembly's temperance committee for the western territory, with headquarters in Denver, has been for some weeks in southern California and is making his presence felt through his strong and timely addresses. For many years he was the beloved president of Occidental College immediately preceding Dr. Baer.

Sol C. Dickey, D. D., is also a guest here. He is with his brother-in-law, A. E. K. Hackett.

A. A. Dinsmore, D. D., of New York City, who did most to provide funds to build the first building on the Highland Park site for Occidental College after its destructive fire in 1896, is here. He came out to marry his daughter. ELIJAH OXYMEL.

Are Driving Out the Saloons

Voters of California Cleaning Up the State—Two Presbyteries May Unite—Oakland Ministers Oppose Segregation.

SAN FRANCISCO—California is working hard and making good progress in the cause of temperance. A bill is before the present legislature to exclude liquors from the grounds of the Panama-Pacific exposition in 1915. Two years ago the legislature passed a local option law. Since that time eighty-four supervisoral districts have voted dry, 818 saloons have been put out of business and Califorina now has 682 dry towns. Rev. H. F. Dobbins, pastor of Colusa church, has been for several years president of the Colusa County Anti-Saloon League, and under his leadership a large part of the county has banished the saloon. An effort to reestablish racetrack gambling at the last election was voted down by a large majority.

For the first time in its history Newark church, James Curry, D. D., pastor, entertained Oakland Presbytery at a regular meeting Feb. 11. O. E. Hart, D. D., was reelected pastor-evangelist. Dr. Hart not only counsels with the churches and preaches the gospel but also dons his carpenter outfit and assists the smaller churches in erecting houses of worship. Rev. R. S. Eastman, Rev. Arthur Hicks and Elder W. A. Underhill were appointed a committee to confer with a similar committee from San Francisco Presbytery upon the matter of reunion of the two presbyteries. In opposition to the proposal of some in authority to segregate the social evil in Oakland, presbytery put itself on record as unqualifiedly opposed to its toleration and in favor of the enforcement of existing laws.

Rev. W. C. Spaan has been pastor of the church at Mountain View, ten miles north of San Jose, for five years. Jan. 19 it dedicated a new $10,000 house.

At the ministers' meeting in San Francisco Jan. 27 E. A. Wicher, D. D., of the theological seminary, gave a clear and instructive paper on "The Interpretation of Parables."

Mrs. R. M. Stevenson, wife of President Stevenson of Westminster College, Salt Lake City, was given a reception by the Woman's Synodical Board of Home Missions Jan. 17. Mrs. Stevenson was president of this board in its infancy twenty-five years ago.

The Presbytery of Oakland has arranged to meet March 20, three days before Easter, for the purpose of prayer and conference and a communion service. JAMES CURRY.

There will be two vacancies in the home mission churches of the Presbytery of San Francisco April 1. They are in rapidly growing residence communities and the only Protestant work in the community. Rev. William K. Howe, 23d and Capp streets, is chairman of the home mission committee.

Since the first of the year special meetings have been held by Pastor-Evangelist D. B. McLaughlin at Dryden, Wash., where a promising organization was effected; at Moses Lake, where Rev. James Thomson has work ready to organize, and meetings are now in progress at Omak, which under the efficient leadership of Rev. David Brown comes to self-support this spring.

Want Presbyterian Building

Dr. Shaw Starts Idea for Centralization of Work and Home for Industrial League—Dr. Fox Begins His Labors.

CHICAGO—A committee of ministers has been appointed to investigate the feasibility of attempting to obtain money for a Presbyterian building for Chicago. Dr. John Balcom Shaw is chairman of the committee which was ordered after indorsement by him and Dr. Boyle of the idea that the Christian Industrial League should have better quarters. Rev. George A. Kilbey of the league told the ministers Monday morning of the work of that organization and suggested that a building to cost perhaps $250,000 was needed to care for the work now carried on at needless expense in an old warehouse. Dr. Shaw indorsed this idea and said Chicago ought to have a Presbyterian building to house this work and the offices of the boards and allied interests in this city. The committee appointed by Dr. A. S. C. Clarke may be enlarged by adding laymen. An exhibit of harness and tables and chairs made by the men at the Industrial League attracted the attention of the ministers.

Dr. S. Hall Young, the Alaskan missionary, will be in the city three more Sundays and will speak to the ministers March 9 in Assembly hall. At two churches last Sunday he was offered a bell and a boat for the work in Alaska. He is making about nine addresses a week among local churches.

Talk of Work of Education Board

The educational committee of presbytery gave a luncheon in the Grand Pacific hotel Wednesday noon, Feb. 18, in honor of Dr. Joseph W. Cochran, secretary of the Board of Education, and Rev. George G. Mahy of the Assembly's evangelistic committee. Doctors Stone, Shaw and McClure were the speakers of the meeting. The work of the board was explained.

Work among the men of this city under the direction of Dr. F. M. Fox, associate secretary of the brotherhood, has commenced at Austin church, Dr. R. H. Beattie pastor. Last Saturday a meeting of the officers of the church and subsidiary organizations was held and at a meeting of the men of the church Monday night the plans to be followed during the time Dr. Fox is with them were presented. The response to this new work so far has been excellent. Other churches will be visited soon.

Dr. W. H. Foulkes, secretary of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, will address presbytery at its meeting next Monday morning.

The social unions of the Presbyterians, Baptists, Congregationalists and Methodists will join Friday night in a dinner at the La Salle hotel. President W. O. Thompson of the Ohio State University will be the speaker and a large attendance is expected. Judge W. H. McSurely will preside.

The extension department of Moody Institute has received word that Mrs. Catherine Booth-Clibborn, a daughter of the late General William Booth, will soon come to this country to conduct a series of union evangelistic meetings.

Doctors Stone, Zenos and McClure and Rev. David Creighton took part in the installation of Rev. Thomas W. Stewart as pastor of Christ church last Friday evening.

Presbyterian Day May 12

The foreign missions and church extension committees of presbytery, in cooperation with the United Presbyterians, have requested that one day of "The World in Chicago" exposition shall be designated Presbyterian Day. Monday, May 12, has been chosen as the date. It is hoped to have present as speakers the moderators of the General Assemblies, en route to the meeting at Atlanta; prominent home and foreign missionaries and representatives of the various boards in New York and Philadelphia, the day's program to close with a banquet. Other church bodies are planning similar denominational days.

Mrs. Samuel P. Parmly has just given up the leadership of a class in the Sunday school of Sixth church which she has had for thirty-five years. She took the class when the present members were small boys and has continued with them ever since. From this class there have come ministers, Sunday school superintendents, elders, deacons and trustees.

Boy Scouts and other groups of boys in some of the churches of the city are preparing models and diagrams of mission buildings for use in "The World in Chicago." This is proving acceptable winter evening amusement for a large number of boys.

Suggestion is being made to the workers in "The World in Chicago" that they plan to have all their friends attend this missionary exhibition during the first week that it is held in order that the inspiration of members may persuade others to attend.

Officers of the Christian Endeavor City Union are making plans for the year book. Local societies have been asked for their best plans of work for inclusion in this volume.

During the last nineteen years the Bible Institute Colportage Association has published 5,753,375 books in six languages under 121 titles. Of this number 2,328,702 Bibles, testaments and gospels were printed. The association was founded by D. L. Moody in 1894.

The church fellowship club of the Sears-Roebuck branch of the Y. M. C. A. has a plan of visiting every newcomer in the building, suggesting regular church attendance. The Division Street department has been able to persuade a large number of boys who have run away from home to return to their parents.

Three Churches Survey Parish

Buffalo Congregations Strive to Learn Facts About Community—Charts Will Show Need of Future Work.

BUFFALO—Three leading city churches are engaged in making parish surveys. This is a step in the direction of assuming definite responsibility regarding the nonchurch families of the respective neighborhoods. The churches are Lafayette, North and Central. Each has long employed the best up-to-date methods of card index and mailing lists for reaching likely persons in different parts of the city. They have now made parish maps, marking definitely the limits of their respective parishes; the boundaries being fixed with reference to contiguous Presbyterian churches. New and systematic efforts are being planned to reach the unchurched within these limits.

By means of house to house canvass definite facts are being learned and recorded regarding each family, and each member of the family. This first stage of the work has been most carefully planned by each church; one has employed a trained worker to make the canvass, another is having it made by the assistant pastor and the third is using the volunteer service of the men's association, the work having been carefully marked out and distributed by a trained leader.

Results of the canvass will be exhibited by charts to arouse the church to a deepened sense of neighborhood responsibility and will also be used by the leaders of each church to shape the policy of its work.

The follow-up work will be done carefully. It is said that seven churches out of ten which make social surveys fail in following up the work. These three churches are developing interesting plans to guard against like failures.

A Chicago Missionary Anniversary

The third anniversary of the great Chicago convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in Orchestra hall will be celebrated March 11 with a dinner at the Auditorium hotel. George Innes of Philadelphia and J. Campbell White of New York will be the chief speakers. At this meeting an effort will be made to find if the churches have lived up to the resolutions adopted three years ago. The dinner is being arranged under the direction of the committees of the movement at work in Chicago. Dr. A. S. C. Clarke of Evanston is chairman of the pastors' committee. F. J. Michel, field secretary, 19 South La Salle street, is making arrangements.

President A. R. Taylor, who is retiring as president of James Millikin University, has built up the remarkable university at Decatur from the ground and is its founder in a more direct sense than the man whose name it bears. But he had a long and distinguished career as an educator before he went to that work and has served as teacher and college executive for more than forty years.

Fear Pastor May Leave Tacoma

Harrisburg, Pa., Wants Dr. McLeod—Whitworth College Prepared for Week of Prayer by Group Meetings of Students.

TACOMA—So great was the interest in the week of prayer in First church that meetings were continued three weeks. The pastor, Dr. Murdock McLeod, spoke each evening. Since then the congregation has been greatly disturbed lest Dr. McLeod should leave them. A Harrisburg, Pa., congregation made overtures to him and he yielded so far as to go east and spend two Sabbaths with them.

Whitworth College fittingly observed the week of prayer for colleges. For some time the students had been holding group prayer meetings regularly in preparation for it. On the day of prayer for colleges they were aided by Rev. Norman B. Harrison, pastor of University church, Seattle, and student pastor for the University of Washington. He held two services during the day and was ably assisted at the forenoon service by Professor P. B. Bilham. In the evening a third meeting was led under direction of the student body by Dr. Mason of University Congregational church, Seattle.

The college students with the young people of Bethany church maintain an unusually helpful Y. P. S. C. E. The women's missionary society of Bethany at their annual praise service were addressed by Mr. McGinnis, an Episcopal missionary to Japan.

Rev. T. Davis Acheson, for some time financial secretary for Whitworth College, has again taken up that work.

Rev. Robert H. Milligan of Immanuel church felt the need of rest and spent two weeks in southern California.

What the Men Are Doing

The brotherhood of Marshalltown, Iowa, has planned a series of revival meetings to be held by Rev. Hugh E. Smith beginning March 16.

The fifth annual dinner of the brotherhood of First church, Ashland, Ohio, held recently, attracted a large number of the men of the congregation.

There were 137 business men at the recent banquet of the Bible class of First church, Wichita. Kan. Plans were made for increasing the work of the class.

A brotherhood of sixty members has been organized in Burley church, Idaho. A men's Bible class and a boys' club are taught by the pastor, Dr. John B. Robinson.

West Side church, Englewood, N. J., Rev. James G. Bailey pastor, recently held a men's dinner attended by 145.

The brotherhood of Second church, Spring field, Ill., in the February issue of its paper The Brotherhood Messenger, included a large number of pictures and personal reminiscences of Lincoln.

The keynote of the second brotherhood convention of the presbytery of Ewing at Albion, Ill., Feb. 27-28, will be every man in the presbytery engaged in definite Christian service. The program of the meeting includes discussions and papers on practical subjects by pastors and laymen of southern Illinois. Rev. Walter Getty, the national secretary, will conduct a conference on men and methods and also speak at the dinner Thursday evening. Brotherhood men in relation to the country church and to traveling men will be considered at the Friday morning session among other subjects.

Men of First church, Spearville, Kan., were recently organized into a brotherhood of twenty-five members. Men at Work, the magazine of the brotherhood movement, was subscribed for by thirty-three men. A series of bimonthly men's mass meetings are being held Sunday afternoons in the Berlin theater. The speakers are business men of Dodge City, Larned, Hutchinson, etc. The men are planning to hold a farmers' institute, with expert instructors in charge from Manhattan Agricultural College, in the early spring. A home department in the Sunday school has been organized. Rev. L. Vroman Schermerhorn is stated supply.

Rev. L. C. Kirkes, formerly pastor of Boyle Heights church, Los Angeles, has been appointed field secretary of Occidental College.

Good Things in This Issue

To the missionary enthusiast who would like to see a copy of this issue of The Continent in the hands of every college student in the country, the best thing in this number is the article by Mr. Ellis on Dr. Janvier, the Philadelphia pastor who is going to India. This article may inspire more than one person to a life of self-sacrifice.

The results of the survey of the community of Fourth church, Chicago, will be studied by many. This census is the most comprehensive made of any church in recent years. Every reader of this article by Mr. Stelzle will also be interested in an item in the news department about surveys by three Buffalo churches. Similar surveys can be made by any church.

For the Next Issue

Next week The Continent will remember the birth of David Livingstone with three articles and a special cover portrait of the famous missionary. Dr. Speer of the Foreign Board and Professor William P. Patterson of the University of Edinburgh have characteristic articles. Miss Winant of the Missionary Education Movement has an article which will appeal to the young folks.

Every woman will be much interested in the account of the work of the Central Eleanor Club, an institution which is helping young women in downtown Chicago. It will appear on the Home Council page.

Financial Situation

Illness of One Man Causes Flurry in Stocks—Large Investments in Mexico—Small Bank Has Much Money.

An incident occurred recently which shows in a striking manner the very intimate connection existing between the men who make their living by buying and selling stocks and securities and those who are leaders in the finances of the country. J. P. Morgan, who has recently gone to Egypt in the course of a winter vacation, had what one newspaper writer has called a stomachache. By the time the news reached New York his ailment had been magnified several times and the effect upon Wall street was to depress prices of stocks to a considerable degree. This occurrence has been used as an additional argument by those who prefer farm mortgages or bonds rather than stocks as a form of investment to show the apparent lack of stability which the current prices of the stocks possess.

The civil war in Mexico, which has been manufacturing history faster than the daily papers can print it, had less effect on the stock market than this reported illness of the man who controls so large a portion of the capital of the nation. According to estimates by financial authorities Americans have invested in Mexico about a billion dollars. Mexican capital is said to amount to about $793,000,000 and English capital less than half this sum. This investment by Englishmen, however, is said to be the reason for a reported preference of English statesmen for American intervention in Mexico. Neither the Mexican trouble nor the continued war in the Balkans seems to have had a decided effect upon financial centers the last few weeks, although it is said that French peasants are hoarding their gold.

The disturbances to governments are, however, being watched with keen interest by bankers in the large centers. Banks in the United States meanwhile, both in large and small towns, are adding to their resources. A recent report from the Bank of Dallas Center, Iowa, in a village of 800 shows that it has deposits amounting to $1,200,000. This is larger than the average, but deposits generally have been growing during the last month.

Let your money make 6 per cent—NET
The three or four per cent the savings bank pays does not fairly represent your money's earning ability. It is simply the small end of the profits. The bank keeps the big share as their fee for re-investment—re-investing your money in mortgages—something you refuse to do for yourself By investing direct you can at least double the profits of your savings as they now accrue to you. Oklahoma first mortgages—amply secured by two to four times the amount of the loan—make this possible—the same kind banks and insurance companies buy.
Why Insurance Companies Buy Oklahoma Mortgages
Experience showed them that in order to meet competition they must secure as high a rate per dollar as sound business judgment allowed. Investigation proved that Oklahoma offered the best field for investments of this kind. Approximately $415,000,000.00 is now invested by the insurance companies in farm mortgages—and a good share of this in Oklahoma mortgages.
Surely you can't do better than follow the example of these trained buyers of conservative investments. So decide now to give your money a chance to make good for you.

many years. Many of these people have turned to farm mortgages as the best solution of their problem.

—An estimate has recently been made, based upon statements from 250 farm mortgage men, that the total amount of money loaned upon farms each year is not far from $300,000,000.

—A graphic showing of the amount of money spent for tobacco is revealed in the report that during the past two months sales by the United Cigar Stores Company alone have been at the rate of $40,000,000 a year.

—Private sleeping rooms and baths are to be features of a new banking house for J. P. Morgan and Company at Wall and Broad streets, New York. The ground is worth $4,000,000, but the building will be only four stories high and occupied exclusively by this firm.

home missions $1.32 per member and to all benevolences about $7 per member. The duplex envelope system is used.

Pierce Park church, Boise, is at present without a house of worship, but it is hoped that one can be built in the spring. Preaching services and Sabbath school are held in the public school building. Rev. E. N. Murphy is pastor.

The synodical committee on home missions held a conference at Caldwell recently. Plans were considered looking to the betterment of conditions in the synod. It was decided that at the next meeting of synod a half day's time should be asked, if so much were needed, for full discussion of synodical organization.

Indiana

Rev. John S. Hamilton of Cleveland, Ohio, has just closed a series of meetings at Kendallville, with over 500 decisions for Christ. The meetings gripped the men of the city.

A tabernacle seating 1,000 has been erected by the three churches of Walkerton—Presbyterian, Methodist and United Brethren. Meetings will continue until March 23. Rev. Mr. Honeywell is conducting the revival.

During the pastorate of Rev. D. D. Tullis, who recently resigned, the Sunday school of Washington Avenue church, Terre Haute, has grown from a handful to over 300. The church membership has also increased largely.

A unique feature of the installation service of Rev. J. B. Ferguson over Hopewell church March 6 will be that all participants were at one time members of the church—Rev. Ezra VanNuys of Goshen, Dr. W. C. Covert of Chicago and Rev. D. B. Bant of Spencer. An adjourned meeting of Indianapolis Presbytery will be held at 6:30 p. m.

Ohio

During the first year of the pastorate of Rev. Robert Humphrey at Lowellville a parsonage costing $3,500 was erected and the interior of the church renovated.

Last year there was spent $300 redecorating and recarpeting First church, Delta, Rev. Cyrus A. Price pastor. The congregation also recently increased the pastor's salary.

Rev. R. D. Wheatley on account of his long and serious illness has resigned from College Corner church. His successor has not been chosen.

First church, Bellefontaine, has a large men's Bible class, with an attendance of nearly 100. During the two years' pastorate of Rev. William L. Barrett 163 members have been received. The benevolences show large increase. The salary of the pastor has been increased twice.

Illinois

Rev. C. R. Adams, First church, Champaign, has begun an important series of Sunday evening sermons on topics of interest to the social welfare of the nation.

Meetings for the furtherance of home mission endeavor under the new Presbyterian alliance were recently held at Willow Avenue church and at Second church, Joliet.

At a recent meeting of the Danville Ministerial Association a committee of three from the trades and labor council conferred with the ministers concerning closer cooperation between church and labor.

South Dakota

The church at White Lake, Rev. Edward Van Ruschen stated supply, has recently reached self-support. A new department of social service has been added to the church and the outlook is hopeful.

Committees have been appointed to proceed with the erection of a new church at Sioux Falls. The present building may be moved to the rear of the lot and used for Sunday school purposes. It is expected that the cost will be about $25,000.

Nebraska

Five churches of Superior have recently united in special services under Dr. Samuel Dodds of Grove City, Pa. First church, Rev. Thomas A. Stamp pastor, received a number of additions.

Canada

St. Paul's church at Hamilton during the past year sold the Laidlaw Memorial mission for $7,000. This sum was given to the church extension union to be used in the erection of a new church in East Hamilton.

Reports of all the Presbyterian churches of Winnipeg show that without exception they are growing rapidly. The congregations of Knox church and St. John's have decided that it will be necessary to erect new and larger buildings. Knox church now has over a thousand members. Augustine church, with 928 members, gave over $29,000 to missions.

New Jersey

First church, Newark, keeps a careful attendance record and Dr. W. J. Dawson, the pastor, reports that during the three months of November, December and January 39,532 people came to the church. Of this number 6,799 were in attendance on the Sunday evening services. The meeting which Dr. Dawson says shows worst in the list is the Tuesday evening prayer meeting, average attendance of ninety-four, which most churches would call a good sized meeting.

New York

Churches of all denominations in Southold Town were represented recently in a meeting to organize a no license campaign for the spring election.

Representatives of Champlain, St. Lawrence and Utica Presbyteries recently met at Utica First church to consult with Rev. F. E. Higgins concerning the development of mission work in the Adirondacks.

The church of Junius, which was for a hundred years a home mission congregation, found recently at the close of the first year as an independent church that all debts had been paid and that all the organizations had increased their contributions to benevolences. Rev. Theodore S. Day is pastor.

The Woman's Missionary Society has established mission study classes, studying China, in various centers throughout Long Island Presbytery.

The forty-fifth anniversary of Memorial church, Utica, was recently observed by a gathering of the congregation in the chapel. Dr. D. W. Bigelow is pastor.

North church and Dewey Avenue church, Rochester, have united with four other congregations for a campaign for larger attendance. Special meetings will be held in one of the cooperating churches beginning March 2. Meetings for men and women have been held during the last month. To visit all nonchurch-going people an organization of 125 women and seventy-five men has been formed.

Pennsylvania

A series of special meetings has been arranged preceding the March communion in Jersey Shore church, of which Rev. J. L. Ewing is pastor. Use of the duplex envelopes during the last two years has solved many of the financial problems of the church and permitted additions to the equipment.

Massachusetts

The largest men's class in Boston has been developed in First church, of which Dr. William Tufts is pastor. Additions to the membership and to contributions during the past year have been large.

District of Columbia

The Presbyterian Ministerial Association of Washington recently adopted a minute concerning Dr. Daniel W. Fisher, who recently died in that city. He spent twenty-eight years as president of Hanover College.

Southern Men in Largest Convention

BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS, Editor Afield of The Continent

That the new idea of stimulus and education by mass meeting is applicable to other subjects than foreign missions the Laymen's Missionary Movement of the Southern Presbyterian Church has demonstrated by its third, and largest, general convention held at Memphis Feb. 18-25. This was distinctively a home mission gathering, yet in numbers, personnel, interest and lifting power it went beyond its two notable predecessors at Birmingham and Chattanooga. The East was not so fully represented as formerly, but the South and West more than made up for any lack.

These Southern Presbyterian conventions are unlike anything the North knows. They are homogeneous. The church's leaders are present, but they do not run the meetings; they are merely a part of this refreshing democracy. The family feeling, which makes the men acquainted with the whole work and all the workers, links the gathering into extraordinary oneness. The delegates are all of a type—and a powerful Anglo-Saxon type at that.

Morning, noon and night, the commodious Second church, into which nearly 2,000 persons can be crowded, was filled with ticket holders. In the evenings overflow meetings were held. The delegates enrolled numbered 1,500. There were several visitors from the Presbyterian Church U. S. A., and a notable porportion of northern men on the program. The oneness of the church's worldwide work was made clear by the fact that the leaders of this home mission convention were the identical men who have led the foreign missionary advance in the denomination. I saw Rev. Lacey Moffett of China, one of the Forward Movement pioneers, doing dray-horse committee work behind the scenes. Memphis did its part in the traditional way, including the providing of entertainment for the delegations of students from all the theological seminaries.

The convention was a table spread with strong meat. Instead of the anticipated, everyday diet of home mission staples the men were served with new problems. There was the social evil, to cite the most notable instance. The address by Dr. Stewart R. Roberts of Atlanta, "The City with Its Social Evil," made one gasp by its frankness. Without the slightest circumlocution or euphemism the social evil, with its attendant physical blight, was set squarely before the convention by a scholarly Christian medical man. As a man—a fighting man—the convention arose to the occasion and demanded the printing of the paper by the publication committee.

Another Atlanta man, John Eagan, who could say, "Of which things I also was a part," told the thrilling story of how Atlanta's Christian men have, within recent months, cleaned the city of all its houses of disrepute and have cared for more than fifty of the inmates, all who could be persuaded to a better life. The medium adopted in this vice crusade was publicity—paid advertising in the daily newspapers.

If anybody thinks the Christian men of the South are indifferent to the negro question he should have heard Rev. John Little's addresses, or the speech by a member of the South Carolina legislature (no friend of Governor Blease, of course), Hon. W. F. Stephanson. The attitude of this convention presages important action by at least one of the Atlanta Assemblies on the subject of the negro.

Daily "quiet hours," by W. R. Dobyns, D. D., of St. Joseph, were a distinctive feature of the program. These men seemed sincerely pious, with a zest for the devotional utterances. Music was provided largely by a quartet composed of students from Union Theological Seminary, Richmond.

To rewrite the program, covering all the speakers and themes, is impracticable here—the gamut of home mission questions, from mountaineers to immigrants, was swept. A really great speech, which aroused much comment and some enthusiasm, was Joseph E. McAfee's presentation of the progress attained in federated work. Unhackneyed, brilliant, stimulating, this address dealt faithfully with the subject of overmuch competition in the past and of the growing cooperation of the present.

Obliged to leave after my own talk Wednesday evening, I was unable to witness the culmination of the convention in the Thursday sessions. Two days' attendance was sufficient to assure one that history was made at Memphis by the Southern Presbyterian men.

Ministerial Obituary

Rev. James N. Currens

Rev. James N. Currens, for the past nine years pastor of Salem and Tranquility churches, near Traer, Iowa, died of pneumonia Feb. 12, after an illness of five days. He was born in Gettysburg, Pa., March 15, 1856. When he was 4 years of age his parents moved to Plymouth, Ill., where he grew to young manhood. It was while he was in Peabody, Kan., that he felt the call to the ministry. He took up work as a local evangelist and for a year supplied the church at Walton, Kan. In 1896 he entered Omaha Theological Seminary and was graduated in 1899. During his seminary course he supplied the church at Marne, Iowa. For the next five years he was pastor at Logan, Iowa. Nine years ago he was called to the pastorate of Salem and Tranquility churches. A few weeks ago Salem church was burned to the ground, nothing being saved. With characteristic energy the work of rebuilding was taken up. Subscriptions almost sufficient to complete the building free of debt had been secured. The new building will stand as a monument to his faithful service.

The funeral was held in Tranquility church, conducted by Dr. C. H. Purmort of Des Moines, assisted by Rev. W. C. Miles, of Streator, Ill., a brother-in-law of Mr. Currens; also by the pastor of the U. P. church of Traer and Rev. L. P. Crome of Grundy Center, Iowa.

Mr. Currens married March 25, 1880, Josie Hawley at Carthage, Ill., who, with two sons—John R. of Traer and Professor Frederick H. of Omaha University—and three brothers—Dr. Randolph of Two Rivers, Wis.; Rev. Charles H. of St. Louis and Rev. Jesse W. of Boulder, Colo.—survives him.

Rev. James Linn Reed

Mr. Reed was the senior member of Wheeling Presbytery. He was born in Washington county, Pa., and graduated from Princeton University and Western Theological Seminary. He was a veteran of the civil war. His pastorates were at Independence, Pa.; Pueblo, Colo.; Barnesville, Ohio; Shields, Pa., and Follansbee, W. Va. At the last point he inaugurated the work and prepared for the building of a beautiful church. He spent his last years in quiet because of prolonged and increasing ill health. He entered into rest at the home of his mother at West Alexander, Pa., Feb. 9, at the age of 68.

Recent Evangelistic Activities

Rev. W. V. McAdoo of Mount Vernon, Ill., has recently been conducting meetings in Broadway church, Mattoon, Ill.

Edward M. McMillin, formerly of First church, East Liverpool, Ohio, is conducting a ten days' series of evangelistic services in First church, Marietta, Ohio.

After two weeks of special services at Wadena, Iowa, in charge of F. H. Seger and Captain O'Brien, a large number were added to the church, which was formed only a year ago.

Rev. Joseph C. Ludgate has been holding union meetings in Churdan, Iowa. Two meetings were held each day and at 9 o'clock each morning the church bell called the people to prayer.

A profitable series of meetings has just been concluded at Ninth Avenue U. P. church, Monmouth, Ill., under the direction of the pastor, Rev. E. P. Smith, and Evangelist J. C. Beitel of Wichita, Kan.

In the union tabernacle meetings now being conducted at Harvey, Ill., near Chicago, by Evangelists Hart and Magann, there were 115 conversions on a recent Sunday night. The meetings will continue a month.

The union meeting at Ukiah, Cal., conducted by Rev. Elmer P. Loose of Waukesha, Wis., and party closed Feb. 2. There were 300 conversions. The women of the churches have formed a young people's social union. Efforts are being made to establish a Y. M. C. A. and a Y. W. C. A.

A special meeting of three weeks has just been concluded at Seven Mile, Ohio, conducted by the minister, Rev. H. G. Rice. All the activities of the church have been refreshed and new life and impulse given. A chorus choir of twenty-five very ably aided the pastor. Mr. Rice also held a special meeting of two weeks at Overpeck, Ohio. A church debt of $150 has been canceled, the aid society enlarged and a new Sunday school of forty members organized between Overpeck and Hamilton.

Bethany church, Fort Wayne, Ind., welcomed many into the church following services by Thomas B. Terhune, D. D., chairman of the evangelistic work of the state, who spent two weeks with the pastor, preaching every evening.

Rev. David McMeekin Conn begins on March 1 a union evangelistic meeting in Lemington church, Pittsburg, Pa., of which Dr. Charles Reed Zahniser is pastor. The neighboring Methodist church unites in the services. Mr. Conn goes to Pittsburg from a good meeting at Hopedale, Ohio.

Under the evangelistic committee of Rock River Presbytery, W. C. Crofts, Morrison, Ill., chairman, meetings have been held in five churches with a large number of additions to the congregations. Two new Christian Endeavor societies have been organized. Dr. H. P. Dunlop of Chicago has been the evangelist.

Jamestown Meetings Close

Between 3,000 and 4,000 people made the decision for the Christian life at Jamestown, N. Y., in the series of evangelistic meetings recently conducted by W. E. Biederwolf, D. D., and his corps of workers. Disagreeable weather conditions prevailed, but the big tabernacle, with a seating capacity of 5,000, was filled practically at every week night service and on Sunday nights and special nights thousands were refused admission.

The campaign is being followed as is usual at the close of Dr. Biederwolf's work with a simultaneous campaign of individual evangelism, in which each church in the city is organized into a corps of individual evangelists pledged to endeavor to lead one person to Christ before the close of another five weeks.

Rev. N. B. Barr of Olivet Institute, Chicago, is visiting his father in Nebraska. Together they will spend several weeks in Florida.

Obituary

Death notices will be inserted at the rate of one cent a word. Payment must be sent with the notice. Those who ask their pastor to write such notices should be careful to hand him the money to forward with the copy.

Brown—General S. Lockwood Brown, who died at Tucker Forge Farm, Monson, Mass., Dec. 13, 1912, in his 88th year, was the son of William H. and Harriet Seward Brown, pioneers of Chicago. He had the distinction of being the only remaining member of those who joined at the first communion shortly after the organization of the Second Presbyterian church, Chicago, seventy-one years ago. General Brown was a man of deep piety, and of earnest religious activity, always devoted to the interests of his church, and faithful to his duties as a member. With several others of his church he founded the nucleus of Christ church Sabbath school, Bethel mission, at Kinzie and Cass streets, in 1844. He was with its successor, Erie Street mission, until the great fire, when that school consolidated with the Howe Street mission which later became Christ church at Center and Orchard streets. He was superintendent, also teacher for many years. Every night he asked God's blessing upon "the dear old mission" which lay so close to his heart. The funeral exercises at the Farm were conducted by his dearly loved friend for more than fifty years, L. Clark Seelye, D.D., of Northampton, Mass. His remains were cremated at his request, and the permanent burial will be in Graceland later.

As he was a valiant soldier in the army of the Lord, so in the war of rebellion he served his country, receiving a captain's commission at the hand of his friend Abraham Lincoln, and was honorably discharged as a brevet brigadier general. In the quartermaster general's department, during his years of service he disbursed more than $33,000,000. He was actively interested in the negro race, and during his residence in Washington, D. C., in war time organized a mission school of several hundred members, for colored children, in connection with the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian church, where may be found today some of the old pupils who recall him and his labor of love for their redemption from spritual bondage. He is survived by a sister, Mrs. Mary C. Tyler of Hyde Park, Chicago, and his widow, Mrs. Eleanor Chester Brown.

Root—Lucius Reed Root died at West Baden, Ind., Feb. 1, aged 48 years. He was the son of the late Rev. L. I. Root who was an occasional contributor to The Interior and who at the time of his death was a professor in Park College, Mo. L. R. Root came to Chicago in 1900 and when he died he was vice-president and treasurer of the Amalgamated Roofing Company. He joined the church very early in life and always retained his active membership. He was a member of the Ravenswood church, Chicago, as were all the members of his family. He leaves a widow and two sons. He is also survived by his mother, Mrs. F. T. Root of Greencastle, Ind., and by a brother and sister. Mr. Root was a member of the Hamilton Club, the K. P., Royal Arcanum, the Y. M. C. A. and Ridgemoor Golf Club. He was respected and loved by his business and social associates.

Rutherford—George Rutherford, Sr., elder and clerk of session of Elmira Presbyterian church, Stark county, Ill., from its organization in 1881, departed to be with Christ Jan. 29, aged 79 years.

This Beautiful Calendar

FOR THE ASKING

The following illustration is a reduction of a large beautiful photograph taken on one of our thousands of attractive and prosperous Idaho farms. I framed a few copies of the photograph in artistic calendar form without any advertising and mailed one to each of our customers who are CONTINENT readers. One of the acknowledgments reads as follows:

"The beautiful Calendar came today. It is certainly a work of art and I appreciate it highly."

¶ I shall be pleased to send one of these handsome calendars free of charge to any other readers of THE CONTINENT who desire to invest their funds safely and profitably. The actual cost of these calendars is $3 each, but I shall be glad to give them to [illegible] clients.

¶ The IDAHO TITLE AN[illegible]tising in the columns of THE CONTINENT for considerable time, and is becoming well known [illegible] to get still better acquainted with you, I am using this simple form of announcement, just as if I were talking to you personally. As to my reliability and experience in making safe and profitable investments, I can refer you to ten banks, to Presbyterian ministers, and to CONTINENT readers in various parts of the country. The readers will be pleased, I am sure, to tell you in what manner I have handled their own funds.

¶ The following investments will meet the requirements for safety and good profit not only for the institution or individual who has a considerable amount to invest, but also for the man or woman who merely has a small amount available or who desires to place small monthly sums where they will earn considerably better interest than the savings bank rate.

No. 1. FIRST MORTGAGES on some of the most profitable and attractive farms in the Northwest; $1,000 to $15,000; 6 per cent interest payable annually. Loans range from one-third to one-fifth of the actual cash value of the land; also FIRST MORTGAGES on income city property; 40 per cent of cash value; in amounts from $300 to $5,000; will net you 7 per cent per annum, payable semiannually.

No. 2 GUARANTEE CAPITAL Fund Certificates: In amounts from $100 to $5,000. These certificates are backed by First Mortgages on improved real estate; 8 per cent annual interest, and as much more as the earnings of the Company will justify. These certificates entitle you to participate in the earnings of the Company. The premium at this time is only 3 per cent. These are better than any investment in real estate, because you have only 50 per cent of the cash value of real estate invested, and the increase in value of your certificates will be much greater than the annual increase in real estate values. This issue covers only $100,000, and nearly 70 per cent have already been sold.

No. 3. GUARANTEED INVESTMENT CERTIFICATES: For small investors: You pay $3 per month, or any multiple thereof, for twenty-four months, or as long as you like. You can draw out your money and 8 per cent per annum, interest compounded semiannually, any time after twenty-four months. These certificates are also backed by First Mortgages on improved real estate and sell at a premium of $1 on each $100 certificate.

I have loaned money on Idaho lands for eighteen years and have sold a very large number of Mortgages. In no instance have I failed to pay principal and interest when due. Besides being President of the IDAHO TITLE AND TRUST CO., I hold the same office in the NATIONAL TRUST AND SAVINGS CO., and among my associates are many bankers and retired capitalists. Write for complete information about the one of these three forms of investment that fits your means best.

Around the Shop

The Around-the-Shop Man is not easily embarrassed. He has had the experience of being the lone man with more than 200 vivacious young woman students at a college dinner and got through without putting salt in his coffee. But—well, he did feel a bit out of his element the other day. Having a private appointment with the judge of an important court, he was seeking a retired seat in the rear of the courtroom, when his name was called and he was summoned to sit in all his magisterial dignity alongside his friend while the concluding evidence in a divorce case was being heard!

The A.-t.-S. Man is proud of his acquaintances among the judges, who as a class are a splendid body of men. And he is proud to add to the list one whom he never saw, but who took the trouble to write the following "to the Around-the-Shop Man." It comes from Hon. William H. Pope, United States judge for the district of New Mexico:

"I took my Continent in to lunch with me today on the eastbound Santa Fe limited. I wanted to read, during my intervals between soup and scenery, what Mr. Ellis had to say about my old friend Charlie Rowland. Across the aisle was a fellow passenger. I first became aware of this when in going out she said: 'I see you are reading The Continent. That's my paper. Won't you please lend it to me when you have finished it? I haven't had one for three or four weeks.'

"I promised, and did, and the wife of a prominent New Yorker spent the afternoon reading 'her paper,' a veritable 'letter from home.'

"All of which leads me to ask why you don't have the Santa Fe install The Continent as one of its Limited magazines? There are lots of the Continent family on the road to California all the time, and it will be good for those who don't belong to the family."

One Sabbath a Pastor was absent

He asked Tom Blodgett, a wholesaler of Wichita, to take charge of the evening service. Mr. Blodgett called on his friends for help—all recent converts of W. A. Sunday

And 19 were Converted

That was the first of many meetings held by laymen of that city. Twenty-four teams of business and professional men have been at work in the year that has followed. These groups sometimes go 200 miles to conduct services, and men they have won in turn formed more teams to pass on the work. This "epidemic of lay preaching in Kansas" will be told in full by Andrew Melrose Brodie next week. Every reader will want to know of this result of the Sunday meetings in Wichita.

A Companion Volume to "The Crises of the Christ."

The Teaching of Christ

By G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, D.D.

Dr. Morgan has been called a "prince among expository writers." He earns the title afresh in every book he issues. His "Crises of the Christ" was an interpretation of the vital events in Jesus' life. This complementary work is an interpretation of Jesus' oral teachings, the doctrine rather than the deed. What Jesus declared as to his own Person, concerning God and Man, Sin and Salvation, and concerning the various phases of the Kingdom of God are delineated here with fidelity and with that vital glow which characterizes Dr. Morgan's writing. Net $1.50

James Sprunt Lectures

The Sermon: Its Construction and Delivery

By DAVID J. BURRELL, D.D.

The work is the result of forty years of observation not from a homiletic chair, but from the viewpoint of a busy pastorate. Its criticisms of current methods are frank but deferential and they are offered in the profound conviction that the preacher for our times should in loyalty to Christ and his commission preach as a living man to living men. Net $1.50

The Struggle for Christian Truth in Italy

By Prof. GIOVANNI LUZZI, D.D.

Professor Luzzi's lectures, delivered at Princeton and subsequently throughout various American cities, are the basis of this volume. Coming as a deep inspiration from the Old World to the New, it traces the history of Christianity through the Protestant development, giving a concise history of the Bible in Italy, the founding of the Waldensian Mission and a study of the present "Modernism" movement. Net $1.50

Religious Unrest and Its Remedy

By JAMES A. ANDERSON, D.D., LL.D.

The author restates the old truths in new terms, not because truth has changed, but because the terms themselves have come to have a different meaning. The book is a stimulus to faith, presenting in most compact form the salient facts about Christ, the Gibraltar of our faith. Net 75c

Devotional Readings for a Year. With a Short Series of Prayers by Lauchlan Maclean Watt, M. A.

These delightful devotional suggestions show Dr. Watkinson at his best. All who are familiar with his helpful, discerning writings will need no second invitation to this latest volume. It contains a series of daily readings for a year, with a Scriptural thought for each day, together with Dr. Watkinson's meditations, rich with the illustrative qualities for which the great preacher is famous. Net $1 25

PERCY C. AINSWORTH

The Silences of Jesus and St. Paul's Hymn to Love

Of Mr. Ainsworth's work Dr. Robertson Nicoll says: "I had not read for five minutes before I recognized that in Percy Ainsworth the Church had a great preacher, one of a thousand. His sermons have an extraordinary reality." Net $1.25

HENRY W. STOUGH

Across the Dead Line of Amusements

The author is known wherever the Chapman band of evangelists have worked. He has given the subject of the Dance, the Theater and Cards conscientious study, avoiding indiscriminate condemnation and presenting intellectually valid arguments in a sane, sympathetic way.

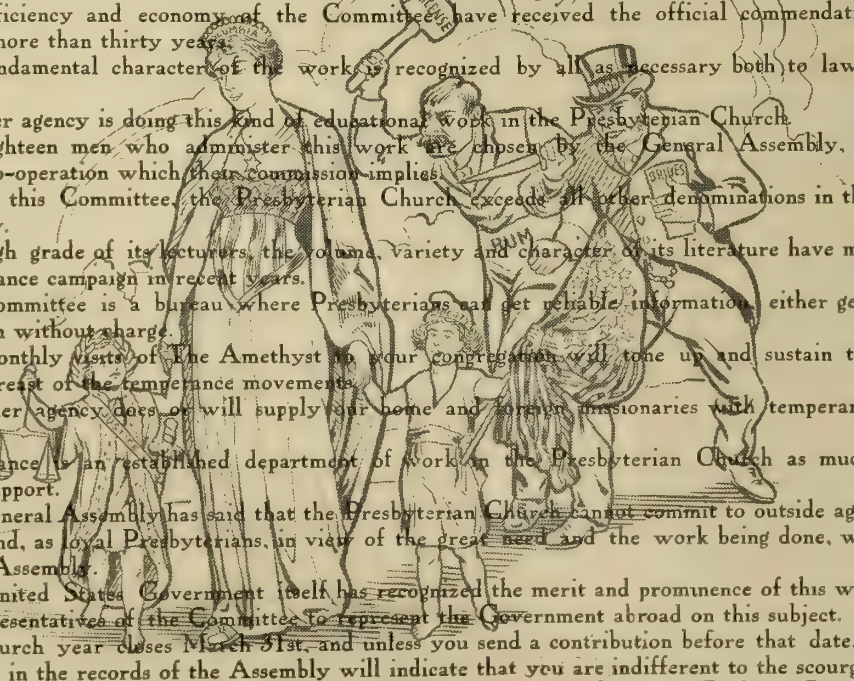
The Presbyterian Temperance Committee

Some Reasons Why You Should Support It



Because it is the only authorized agency of the Presbyterian Church for the promotion of the reform.

Because every cent contributed is accounted for in detail in the published records of the Assembly.

Because the efficiency and economy of the Committee have received the official commendation of our General Assembly annually for more than thirty years.

Because the fundamental character of the work is recognized by all as necessary both to law enactment and law enforcement.

Because no other agency is doing this kind of educational work in the Presbyterian Church.

Because the eighteen men who administer this work are chosen by the General Assembly, serve without pay, and are entitled to the co-operation which their commission implies.

Because, led by this Committee, the Presbyterian Church exceeds all other denominations in the scope and variety of its temperance activity.

Because the high grade of its lecturers, the volume, variety and character of its literature have made this Committee a factor in every temperance campaign in recent years.

Because the Committee is a bureau where Presbyterians can get reliable information, either general or specific, on any phase of the question without charge.

Because the monthly visits of The Amethyst to your congregation will tone up and sustain the sentiment of the people and keep them abreast of the temperance movement.

Because no other agency does or will supply our home and foreign missionaries with temperance information and literature free of cost.

Because temperance is an established department of work in the Presbyterian Church as much as missions and deserves proportionate support.

Because our General Assembly has said that the Presbyterian Church cannot commit to outside agencies, duties which God has laid upon her and, as loyal Presbyterians, in view of the great need and the work being done, we should honor the request of our General Assembly.

Because the United States Government itself has recognized the merit and prominence of this work, having on two occasions appointed representatives of the Committee to represent the Government abroad on this subject.

Because the church year closes March 31st, and unless you send a contribution before that date, the blank opposite the name of your church in the records of the Assembly will indicate that you are indifferent to the scourge of intemperance.

Make all contributions payable to Rev. John F. Hill, D. D., Treasurer. Conestoga Building, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Consecrating All to God

AT THE LIVINGSTONE CENTENARY, which this issue of The Continent commemorates, no other note of character from the life of Africa's great apostle can be more instructive for Christians to reflect on, nor more worthy for them to emulate, than the missionary's famous consecration vow, reprinted at the center of this page.

However much of a superman Livingstone may have been in personality, however much of a hero in achievement, he was in this simple act of religious resolution nothing but a plain Christian, standing on a level with any other man or woman who has ever sincerely meant to take the service of Christ as life's supreme, all-inclusive obligation.

In high moments of Christian decision the church's requirement for vows surrendering all to Christ may be freely and truthfully met. But no depth of honesty in such a promise saves the practical man or woman later from reactions which make the pledge seem unreal, if not a mockery.

> "I will place no value on anything I have or may possess, except in relation to the kingdom of Christ. If anything will advance the interests of that kingdom, it shall be given away or kept, only as by giving or keeping of it I shall most promote the glory of him to whom I owe all my hopes in time and eternity. May grace be given me to adhere to this."—David Livingstone, in his Journal, May 22, 1853.

All that one possesses has been thus solemnly devoted to God; yet afterwards in the unromantic light of everyday necessity a man plainly sees that in simple fact the most of what he can earn must go for maintenance of his own household and himself. In sincere minds the contradiction soon produces an intolerable sense of inconsistency. Some way out must be groped for. Many are thus led to argue that consecration of all life and belongings to God is a false demand to lay on ordinary Christians—that the most to be required is a tenth of income and a seventh of time for religious uses. Some, repudiating still more completely the seemingly unworkable ideal, blandly assume that the benefits of religion can be appropriated without any serious return whatever in either service or sacrifice.

Others, driven by conscience in the opposite direction, seek or restlessly hope for a chance of entering some "religious calling," unable to conceive any other road by which they may arrive at total consecration of what they have and are.

The escape is unfortunate in either direction. Either outlet implies consent that there shall be two standards of Christian fidelity in the kingdom of God—as indeed the Catholic Church teaches that there are—one for the "religious" and a lower standard for secularized persons.

But the whole range of Christ's teaching and his apostles' preaching is without suggestion of any such difference. They knew only one religion and one fashion of being religious.

The right adjustment is that which David Livingstone's canny Scotch common sense phrased so convincingly. He knew well enough that all Christians cannot enter occupations where specific spiritual service is the sole thing in view. He knew well enough that a man ordinarily circumstanced cannot put the whole of his income to purposes which average opinion classifies as religious.

Unity and thoroughness of consecration can come then only by a rule which comprehends the secular responsibilities of a man along with what would be commonly called his religious duties—something that covers buying and selling as well as praying and preaching. And Livingstone did set up for himself a rule which was just as real guidance to him when he turned explorer as when he was a preaching missionary.

Livingstone attained this by a right vision, in the first place, of the breadth of his Lord's concern for the world, and by a right understanding, in the second place, of his own place in his Master's purpose. The Scotch missionary comprehended that more things are sacred in the eyes of God than exercises of worship and formal proclamation of Bible truth. Even though these things be first, yet in the present world all right thinking and right deeds, all gain of enlightenment and extension of fraternity, all fidelity in trust and honor in responsibility, all fine things of living anywhere are quite as truly factors in the kingdom of God. God seeks them all. God is concerned for civilization.

And Livingstone knew he had no possible purpose in the world except, by living as nobly as Christ had enabled him through grace, to add to the sum of good things which Jesus would establish among mankind by means of the kingdom.

So he was all for the kingdom—in great tasks and small. He perceived the area of the Lord's purpose so large that he could never get out of it. There was nothing outside except evil. He lived in the service of God's will, wherever he went. He was naught but a servant of Christ. If he spent anything on himself, he was genuinely giving it to God, because he himself was God's.

Therefore, he could keep for the glory of his Lord as well as give for his glory. The only question was which would accomplish more for the Master—keeping or giving.

The application of this principle runs to the uttermost limit of human experience. What parents spend on a home, for example, may be sinfully selfish if the intent is only to produce a proud display. But if their thought is to establish a safe garden where beautiful lives may be developed in their children, their outlay there is just as much a contribution to the kingdom as if the sum went into the missionary collection.

Likewise, money invested in business is waste if only the making of more money is purposed. But it is, in no strained sense, a religious investment if the motive hope is to serve the will of God by supplying life's comforts to fellow humanity.

Education sought for success is selfish. If sought as equipment for usefulness it is as unselfish as the usefulness later built upon it.

Provided only that he sees all the truth of his opportunity and his obligation, the man who follows Dr. Livingstone's broad devotion of "anything I have or may possess" need never fear to get outside the possibility of keeping this vow in letter or spirit—so long as his daily occupation is any genuine service to other men.

The World

A New President and the Nation's Hopes

By the time The Continent reaches its readers this week a new President and Vice-President will have been inaugurated, heading the first Democratic administration the United States has had for sixteen years. The change is an epoch-making one for this nation and for other nations, for it will mark a distinct change in many policies, and connotes advance steps of lasting significance. No nation is standing still, least of all the American; a real or fancied tendency toward the stationary on the part of the last administration was doubtless largely responsible for the political upheaval which occurred on November 5 and was ceremonially marked on March 4.

Seldom since Lincoln's day has a President been confronted with so many vital and so critical questions, both foreign and domestic. The new President, as has been well said, understands the temper of the times and the hugeness of the task to which he has set his hand. He has confidence in himself and America has confidence in him. The last four years have been prosperous and peaceful, but material prosperity is not the only nor the ultimate end and aim of a progressive state. A new President—the twenty-eighth—is now seated in the White House at Washington. The people of the United States have a right to expect much from Woodrow Wilson, and the signs indicate that their reasonable expectations will not be disappointed. The prayer in last week's Continent is being reechoed throughout this wide land: "God aid the President!"

Double Triumph for Friends of Temperance

It is unfortunate that one of President Taft's last acts was a veto of the Webb-Kenyon bill to prohibit the shipment of liquor into dry states. Hardly had Mr. Taft and his attorney general, Mr. Wickersham, finished their quibbling about the constitutionality of the act when it was promptly repassed by senate and house by overwhelming majorities—majorities larger than when the measure was originally carried. It was the first time during President Taft's administration that one of his vetoes had been overridden.

Senator McCumber stated that both the President and the attorney general had misconstrued the grounds upon which Congress had passed the prohibition law. He said it had not attempted to give the states the right to interfere wih commerce but had simply declared liquor an outlaw and had then prescribed conditions under which it might enter interstate commerce. So familiar were the arguments in behalf of the bill and so purely technical were the objections that but little time was needed for debate in either chamber.

A double victory has thus been secured for the friends of temperance and law enforcement in a single congressional session—a thing considered hardly possible heretofore.

Pujo Majority Finds "Money Trust" Exists

A "money trust" is an actuality and not merely a figure of speech or a figment of the imagination, according to the majority report of the Pujo committee presented to the house of representatives on Friday. Chairman Pujo and the six other Democratic members of the committee define a money trust as an identity and community of interest between a few leaders of finance, created and held together through mutual stock holdings, interlocking directorates and other forms of domination over banks, railroads and corporations, all of which has resulted in a vast and growing concentration of the control of money and credit in the hands of a few.

As leading parties in this combination or community of interest the report names J. P. Morgan and Company, George F. Baker and James Stillman and their banks; the international banking houses of Lee-Higginson and Kidder-Peabody, both with headquarters at Boston; Kuhn-Loeb of New York, with large foreign connections; and the biggest three banks in Chicago. Radiating from the principal groups are large and small financial institutions. The report declares that although the bulk of the wealth of the nation is not controlled by one set of men, yet these men do monopolize the great financial transactions and are able to dictate the credits that shall be extended or withheld from more important and conspicuous business enterprises. Just how this is done is explained at length.

With the report two bills were presented, one rigidly regulating stock exchanges and forbidding the use of the mails to those exchanges which do not comply with the regulations, and the other making stringent requirements for clearing house associations and restricting national bank officers and directors. Samuel Untermeyer, counsel for the committee, helped to formulate the conclusions reached.

A minority report signed by three Republican committeemen holds that the investigation has not disclosed the existence of a money trust but has revealed a dangerous concentration of credit in New York and to some extent in Boston and Chicago. Mr. McMorran of Michigan made an individual report flatly disagreeing with the findings and recommendations of the majority and stating that in his opinion American citizens should be proud of the fact that they have a city where there is sufficient capital and ability to handle enterprises of magnitude.

Just before the filing of the report J. P. Morgan and Company sent a long and notable letter to the committee giving their expert views on the questions lately under investigation. These famous private bankers blame the financial evils of the day upon the present banking and currency laws, and they strongly assailed the idea that groups of financiers created or averted financial panics. In particular they denied the popular impression that the monetary convulsion of 1907 was forced.

Labor Department for the Cabinet

Congress worked industriously during the closing days of the session, even sitting on Sunday to clear its calendar of long standing bills. One of the most important measures passed created a tenth cabinet office, the department of labor. It was represented that the department of commerce and labor was overcrowded with work. Bureaus have multiplied in Washington with the growth of the country and its possessions, and many of them are said to be without adequate cabinet supervision. Among the duties proposed for the secretary of labor are the adjustment of industrial controversies and the possible prevention or settlement of strikes. The so-called "children's bureau" under Miss Julia Lathrop also comes within the new department.

Budget Plan for Apportioning Government Revenue

The expending of more than a billion dollars a year is a tremendously big business transaction and should be managed according to a carefully prepared-in-advance program, but according to a message sent to Congress by President Taft a week before his retirement the business of the United States government is run on a hit or miss plan when it comes to correlating proposed expenditures to expected revenues. He recommended the adoption of a budget system and that Congress as well as the government departments should have at hand all the data obtainable in regard to income and outgo. Mr. Taft asserted that the United States was the only great nation in the world which does not use the budget system in making appropriations.

The President proposed the creation of a sinking fund and also a budget committee of Congress. To wipe out the national debt in twenty years it was proposed that Congress appropriate $45,000,000 a year, to be invested in 3 per cent government bonds. A stricter classification of federal employees would make possible large salary reductions. Other savings as well amounting to millions were also suggested.

Britain Harassed by Suffrage Warfare

What to do with the suffragettes, as the militant suffragists are known, is a serious problem which is worrying Great Britain, where "the war" has proceeded by progressive stages from heckling political speakers and disturbing sittings of parliament to smashing window glass in public and private buildings, destroying letters in street mail boxes, acts of arson and vandalism in parks, and attacks on the homes of cabinet ministers by fire and bomb. Members of the cabinet must be attended by bodyguards, for nothing short of human life is now held sacred by the militant bands. Moral crime is justified on the theory that it will advance the cause of "votes for women"—a phrase that has become almost obnoxious to ears originally inclined to be friendly.

Chancellor Lloyd George still stands firm for equal suffrage in spite of the recent bomb outrage at his country house. Mrs. Pankhurst, the contumacious leader of the militants, assumed responsibility for the occurrence and she was last week arrested and released on bail. She and others now face prison instead of mere jail sentences. Her release exasperated the public, and the rougher element has been taking revenge as opportunity offered. For example, two women who were stamping their war cry with green paint on park benches had the paint turned over their own heads. The physical force propaganda may have exactly the opposite effect from that intended.

Professor Max Nordau refers to the militants as "the Furies." Mrs. Philip Snowden, the wife of a British member of parliament, an Englishwoman of note who has been traveling in the United States, is quoted as utterly repudiating the lawlessness employed by the militants. Their numbers, she says, are small—"not more than a hundred or so"—and opposed to them is the great body of Englishwomen.

Suffrage Campaign Here Spectacular but Orderly

One of the few occasions when Americans can safely congratulate themselves at the expense of England is when we compare the orderly, albeit aggressive, campaign in behalf of equal suffrage in this country with the hatchet throwing, window breaking, house burning tactics of the votes-for-women crusade on the other side of the Atlantic. The spectacular march of Rosalie Jones and her band on foot from New York to Washington and the impressive parade and pageant in the capital on the day before the presidential inauguration attracted general attention and aroused much enthusiasm. It all served an educational purpose, at the same time giving no excuse for hostile criticism. The American people will settle the suffrage question on its merits and probably without great delay. Dr. Anna Shaw, president of the National Equal Suffrage League, at Kansas City recently predicted that the women of every state will have the ballot by 1920—a peaceful revolution within seven years.

"Iron Hand" in Mexico Restores Order in Part

A considerable measure of peace and quiet was secured in Mexico last week by President Huerta after another one of the Madero brothers and the chief of police of the capital of Chihuahua and numerous other mutineers had been killed; these in addition to the men who fell in battle or were murdered during and immediately following the eight days of cannonading in Mexico City. So long as Huerta, Felix Diaz, Blanquet and Mondrago refrain from flying at each other's throats, so long does it seem probable that a semblance of order can be preserved. Huerta, who was the chief beneficiary through the death of his former chief, President Madero, has been giving out stories for American and foreign consumption to the effect that the dead president and vice-president were accidentally killed in a fight between their guards and would-be rescuers. The new government, which rests on a foundation of assassination and treachery, was threatened by a counter revolution from the northern states and by forces in the field under Zapata, Emilio Vasquez Gomez, Carranza and other ambitious factionists. Orozco was reported friendly. Danger from the north appeared to be averted for the time being, though a serious clash between Mexican federal soldiers and United States troops was reported from Douglas, Arizona, Monday.

Huerta was long a disciple and trusted officer of Porfirio Diaz—who, by the way, sent Huerta a cablegram expressing his "gratitude"—and from the deposed presidential despot and from the recently slaughtered president he inevitably learned much as to how to rule the Mexican people. Last Friday he announced that in order to bring about the pacification of the country he should use all the measures provided by law and would suspend constitutional guaranties in certain places—meaning that his government might summarily execute persons found bearing arms or in any manner aiding rebels.

Turkey Seeks Peace; New Terms Suggested

Again the end of the Turko-Balkan war is in sight. The Turkish government is understood to have placed itself unreservedly in the hands of the six European powers, and requested them to bring about peace. In this way Turkey hoped to obtain better terms than by negotiating directly with the allies, but the allies are inclined to insist as a matter of pride and strategy that the foe should make overtures to them. It was reported from Rome on Monday that the Balkan combatants would demand the surrender of Adrianople, Scutari and Janina and the cession of the Gallipoli peninsula; the Bulgarian frontier to extend from Rodosto on the Sea of Marmora to Midia on the Black sea; the cession of the Ægean islands now occupied by Greece and a gross indemnity of $300,000,000. The sultan is to be allowed a special religious representative in the Balkan territory. With revolt threatening at Constantinople, the Young Turk leaders seem in no position to cavil even at these hard terms, though the powers may moderate the demands.

Honolulu Moved by Smith and Robins

The first news of the Men and Religion pilgrimage of Fred B. Smith and Raymond Robins around the world comes naturally from Honolulu, their first stopping place on the tour. There the assemblage of 1,600 men who met to hear these speakers is reported to have been the greatest men's meeting ever held in Hawaii. The capacity of the largest audience room in Honolulu was the only thing which set this limit to the attendance. Hundreds rose for prayer, and 127 signed decision cards. Eight or ten meetings were held each day during their stay, and the institutes which they held were well attended, the smallest meeting numbering sixty. Of Robins the general secretary of the Honolulu Young Men's Christian Association, Paul Super, says:

> "Raymond Robins talked at the high school and Oahu College and stirred teachers and students as they have never been stirred before. He took hold of the business men as I did not know they could be gripped. He is deep, refined, popular and polished, and he knows. Men here will long speak of the story of his life as he told it."

The churches of Honolulu responded enthusiastically and felt the stir of a very significant awakening. They have taken hold of the follow up work most vigorously. Bible study enrollment has, as Mr. Super writes, "become a mere matter of asking."

Presbyterians of Canada Plan Mass Meeting

While Presbyterians of the United States are planning a general rally for May in Atlanta, the Presbyterians of Canada are working out plans for the beginning of June which will bring together at Toronto an even more general representation of the active workers of their local congregations. The idea is a mighty mass congress of Presbyterians in the interest of missions, both home and foreign. The home and foreign boards of the denomination are alike putting full strength into the development of the plan, which originated with the chairman of the Home Board, Dr. A. S. Grant. The Presbytery of Toronto has also taken up the matter in the capacity of host. Wealthy Toronto Presbyterians have guaranteed the cost.

Invitations are being sent out to all missionaries in home fields throughout Canada and Newfoundland, and to all missionaries from foreign fields now at home on furlough. Beyond this, effort will be made to have every congregation in the church send as delegates to the congress its pastor and one lay representative. A proposal to include in the program the interests of ministerial education and ministerial relief, as well as topics of social and moral reform, has met with favor, and supplementary sessions may be arranged to extend the view of the conference over these fields. All in all, an inestimable stimulus to the aggressive spirit of the entire church is anticipated as a result of this national popular rally.

Qualified Indorsement of Social Platform

The members of the Executive Commission for the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance on the western side of the Atlantic met for annual conference in the Erskine church of Montreal, where Dr. Hanson is pastor. Principal John Scrimge, head of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of that city, presided.

The material of the program consisted of papers prepared for the event by various members and of the reports of the chairmen of special committees. Authority in matters of faith, Christological developments of the present day, the Christian ministry in relation to the present times and the need of revivals were themes thus considered. Among the reports special interest attached to the material presented by the committees on education, on Sunday school work and on federation movements. The last named report was the subject of a discussion which has been somewhat misstated and overdrawn in the daily press.

Dr. Roberts, secretary of the mission, offered a report in which the social service platform adopted by the Federal Council at its late session in Chicago was recommended for complete and unqualified indorsement. Unfortunately the commission hesitated. As is well known, this platform of social service calls for "equal rights and complete justice for all men in all stations of life"; the abolition of child labor, restriction of women's toil, abatement of poverty, protection of workers from dangerous machinery, release from employment one day in every seven, a living wage in every industry and a "new emphasis on the application of Christian principles to the acquisition and use of property." Certainly Presbyterianism is heartily for all this.

Instead, however, of voting the unreserved indorsement of all this which Dr. Roberts had recommended the commission substituted qualified language, saying that it "approved of the recognition by the council of some of those social needs which the Christian church has so long pointed out." It would doubtless be argued that this language does not take the Presbyterian denominations out out line with the social movement expressed in the Federal Council's platform. But it is regrettable that the commission's revision and weakening of the report should appear to signify a reluctant rather than a whole-hearted approbation.

It is not quite true, however, as reported in the daily press, that the commission criticised the council for "ignoring the supernatural element in social service." What it did was to adopt a resolution saying: "The power of the gospel as a source of all true social progress should have been more clearly recognized by the council in the discussion of social service."

The program for the tenth world council of the alliance, to meet this summer in Aberdeen, as prepared for the eastern section, was approved by the western section. It was announced that the Presbyterian Church U. S. A. will have 112 delegates in that meeting. The Canadian and Southern Churches will have twenty-three delegates apiece and the Reformed Church in the United States twenty-four. The United Presbyterian Church will have fourteen. Other Presbyterian denominations in the country will have a total of seventeen more. The meeting of 1914 will be held in Lafayette College at Easton, Pennsylvania.

Portland Basis to Stand Untouched

The commission of fifteen appointed by the international convention of Young Men's Christian Associations at Washington in 1907 to "consider the desirability of rephrasing the definition of the world 'evangelical' as contained in the Portland basis" has issued its report and it has been sent out to associations throughout the country to be placed in the hands of the delegates whom they appoint to attend the next international convention to be held in Cincinnati in May. The policy of the Young Men's Christian Association in this particular contrasts favorably with the old-fashioned Presbyterian notion that a report ought not to be made public prior to the assembling of the body which is to receive it.

The appointment of this commission arose indirectly out of an agitation to secure privileges of active membership and official direction in Christian associations for others than members of evangelical churches. The Washington convention acted very decisively against this proposition and voted that the old policy restricting control to evangelical church members would be maintained intact. But as a slight concession it was agreed to appoint this commission to study whether the word 'evangelical' might not be somewhat more liberally defined than it was expressed in the rule set up in the convention held in Portland, Maine, in 1869—a statement which has from that time been known as "the Portland basis." This definition is as follows:

> "We hold those churches to be evangelical which, maintaining the Holy Scriptures to be the only infallible rule of faith and practice, do believe in the Lord Jesus Christ (the only begotten of the Father, King of kings and Lord of lords, in whom dwelleth the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and who was made sin for us though knowing no sin, bearing our sins in his own body on the tree) as the only name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved from everlasting punishment, and to life eternal."

After six years of study the commission unanimously recommended against any attempt to recast this phrasing. They say it should stand unchanged lest an attempt to simplify it might be construed to be a denial of the doctrines left out. But fourteen of the members do admit that the same policy may be enforced under a different form of words and recommend that associations be fully recognized which propose either to accept active members from all the churches associated in the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, or use the definition adopted by the world's conference of Young Men's Christian Associations held in Paris in 1855. The latter is much briefer than the Portland basis, and specifies churches which "regard Jesus Christ as their God and Saviour according to the Holy Scriptures and desire to be his disciples in doctrine and in life."

From this second half of the report Professor William Hoge Marquess, now of New York but formerly of Louisville, dissents.

Editorial

Loving Difficulties

THERE HAS JUST been published a volume containing addresses and sermons by President Matthew Henry Buckham, recently head of the University of Vermont. The volume is called "The Very Elect," and by that title he refers to college and university students. It is not a bad description when it is remembered that the 18,000,000 primary and grammar students in our schools dwindle to less than 200,000 in colleges and universities

In the volume he quotes a statement from one of his colleagues, who said, "My role is a difficult one, and you know I love difficulties." That is an unusual way of putting it. There is no use in talking so to some men. They count it nonsense. Nobody loves work, they say. Anybody will take a soft snap if he gets a chance. It is all pretense to say that a man really loves difficulties.

Now that is a curious mistake. As a matter of fact, there is a multitude of strong men who have a kind of zest for difficulties, who love to tackle a really hard job. In the Old Testament it appears in the story of the twelve spies sent into Canaan to lay out a plan of conquest. Ten of them came back saying that it could not be done—the people were so great and their armies so strong and their cities so well defended that there was no use trying; they would have to abandon the effort. Two of them came back talking about those same difficulties and making them the ground on which they called the people to go in and possess the land. They loved the difficulties, and they knew that meeting them and dealing with them was the very best way of making a strong nation out of these people who had been wandering in the wilderness. In the New Testament it appears when the apostle Paul gladly faced a new opportunity of work, and gave as one reason for it that there were many adversaries. It would be a hard piece of work, and therefore he coveted it. Anybody could do the easy thing; Paul wanted the hard task.

That spirit has not died out by any means. There is a good deal of it among young ministers. When there is talk about the field to which they will go they want to know whether there is work enough to be worth the while. They are not willing to go to a little town of a thousand people, where there are already four or five churches. That task will not be serious enough. One of them talked the other day about two offers he had, and he was choosing the one that called for most exposure and hardship and difficulty because it stirred his blood and made him feel that it would be worth his while.

That is a constant feeling among missionaries. The day of self-denial has not passed by any means. Men are going out into places as difficult as those that David Livingstone found. When Stanley finally came to him in 1871 he urged him to come on back to England and receive the welcome and honors of both hemispheres. Livingstone scorned the idea. There was still work to be done in Africa, and he must go on and do it. It was not simply a spirit of adventure—it was the zest for difficulty, the love of doing the hard thing. There is a vast deal of it in the world today.

Most of us have to meet difficulties whether we like them or not. It ought to be encouraging to us to know that we can learn to like them. There is no use in our fretting and chafing over hardships. We cannot always do what we like. We can always learn to like what we have to do. It is altogether a matter of setting our minds to it and finding the likable element in our difficulties. The final touch of heroism for some of us would be in learning to love to do commonplace things that are hard for us.

Memories and Memorials of David Livingstone

Its present issue The Continent is happy to offer as a fragment of aid toward that centennial celebration of David Livingstone's birth which the foreign mission boards hope to see extended through churches of every name in all of America and Britain. The exact centennial date falls on the 19th of March, and it will doubtless be the Sabbath preceding, the 16th instant, when most churches will desire, by at least some slight reference, to recall the noble hero of God who gave his life to redeem Africa's black millions from the curse and cloud of slavery.

There is much to be found in books about Livingstone—which the Missionary Education Movement in anticipation of this anniversary has taken great pains to make available—and to that material The Continent counts it a high privilege to be able to add two illuminating studies, written directly for publication here, by Secretary Speer and Professor Paterson—than whom no other two men today, in either our America or Livingstone's Scotland, could be more able to express a just appreciation of the famous missionary. Readers who follow their estimates of the man will at least see why the centenary of his birth is deemed worthy of commemoration on both shores of the Atlantic, as befits only a world citizen of the first rank.

In addition to these brilliant essays, The Continent has great pride in being able, through the courtesy of the Missionary Education Movement, to print in this number a more intimate memento of Livingstone in the facsimile of a letter which he penned fifty-six years ago. It is here made public, as The Continent believes, for the first time. Its date and theme both show that it was written during the first of the only two visits home which the missionary allowed himself during his long African career. The friend thus confidentially addressed was his private legal counsel, and it was among the papers of this friend, as preserved by his daughter, now living in the United States, that the officers of the Missionary Education Movement had the delight of discovering this invaluable relic.

One could hardly dream of finding anywhere within the same compass a larger expression of the spirit of the man. The unqualified religious purpose which induced him to turn from ordinary mission duty and become an explorer—to exchange his missionary appointment for the service of the government—is manifested here in convincing simplicity. And quite as unaffectedly are shown the immediacy of his devotion to his Lord, his sensitiveness in regard to maintaining "things honorable in the sight of all men" and the long foresight which could see the kingdom of God approaching through many other than the conventional avenues of religious profession.

The picture of Livingstone reprinted on the cover is from a photograph taken on his second visit to England in 1864. The smaller photograph on another page, showing Livingstone with his little daughter Anna Mary, was doubtless taken the same day. It is a touching memorial of his special affection for his youngest child, who bore her dead mother's name. Mary was left in England when her father started back to Africa, and she never saw him again. But after his death she went to do mission work in his beloved Africa with her husband, Rev. Frank Wilson. Mr. Wilson died there after many years of service, and the little girl of the picture is today living in England, a widow, the only surviving child of David Livingstone. The cap lying at his hand is the official badge of a British consul and indicates his status as representative of his home government in the Portuguese port of Quilimane on the east coast of Africa, the base of his exploring journeys.

A Simpleton's Way of Extolling Washington

Along about the 22d of February every year you can always look for some blatherskite orator or cheap-john essayist to break loose with noisy annunciations of his discovery that George Washington was no white-marble statue of a demigod, but a real flesh-and-blood man, who on due occasion said cuss words and told lies. If there was nothing else disgusting about such blatant, braying talk, the everlasting repetition of it would be quite sufficiently tiresome. But its brutal idiocy is worse, and that ought to outlaw, from any circle where patriotism and sense meet, the fool who supposes that such remarks praise Washington.

Nobody is deceived about Washington in the way that this stupid smartness supposes; nobody thinks him at all superhuman nor immaculate. But George Washington, being both a gentleman and a Christian, did have the decency, on a few occasions when he was betrayed into profane language, to be ashamed of his lapse, and if he ever told a lie, either at his father's cherry tree or later, he possessed the excellent sense to know that it was no credit to him. There are surely enough Americans of his kind left surviving in the present day to frown down this circus juggling by oratorical, editorial and literary clowns who pretend to do honor to the father of his country in making parade of his few acts that were morally substandard. The only trouble is that misconceived politeness keeps such outraged souls quiet when they ought to speak out their righteous disgust.

America to its latest years will continue to honor its first President, but for his real virtues, not for what are with anæmic humor termed by some his "redeeming vices."

The Last and Biggest Mistake of President Taft

William H. Taft certainly made the worst mistake of his life when he vetoed the Webb act intended to prevent the importation of liquors by interstate commerce into dry territory. It was practically the last act of his administration, and therefore bound to be remembered as scarcely anything else that he has done. If the public could feel that Mr. Taft was solely influenced by ingenuous doubt of the constitutionality of the measure, popular judgment would be more lenient, although where lawyers just as good as the President affirmed the constitutionality of the bill, it would seem that he might have waived his doubts.

But unfortunately for Mr. Taft, circumstances make it look as if he were not solely swayed by the technical question. If his doubts were really deep-seated, they ought to have been in his mind before the bill was passed. Yet it is well known that prior to the passage of the measure Mr. Taft encouraged its friends to believe that he would certainly sign it. No question of his doing so was in anybody's mind until Washington began to fill up with the biggest and most insistent liquor lobby that ever came there. Then the President began to waver, which certainly looks very much as if the pressure which compelled the disappointing veto was not from his own mind but from the minds of selfish liquor agents who made such a tremendous assault upon him.

Happily, however, the veto did nothing worse than discredit the man who wrote it. The power of the people over Congress was shown in the prompt fashion in which the veto was overridden and the bill made law, in spite of Mr. Taft's misguided obstruction.

—The Continent is unable to share the worry which some Protestants are expressing over President Wilson's appointment of a Roman Catholic citizen to be his confidential secretary in the White House. Their fear is that Mr. Tumulty may reveal secrets of the administration to friends of his among the priests of his church, or perhaps serve as the tool of possible priestly plotters to beguile the mind of the President. But if Mr. Tumulty does not know enough to keep the secrets of the administration from everybody outside, Catholic and Protestant, clergy and laity, alike—and also to be loyal to his chief alone—his usefulness as secretary to the President will be small and brief. And in that case Woodrow Wilson, being a person well able to take care of himself, will not be at a loss for means to get rid of Mr. Tumulty. The new President, however, did not choose Mr. Tumulty to this confidential post without much intimate opportunity at Trenton for observing whether the gentleman was nonleakable and influence-proof, and it is quite safe to say that Mr. Wilson made the appointment chiefly because he felt perfectly sure in regard to those two most essential qualifications. Let us wait then till Mr. Tumulty violates the confidence he has earned in New Jersey before we assume that he is unworthy of trust in higher responsibility at Washington.

—"They say" that modern philosophy doesn't talk about sin. But Professor Josiah Royce of Harvard is considerable of a philosopher—probably at the top of the list in America just now—and in the February Atlantic he has an essay that is all about sin. Philosophy can't long keep clear of realities, and sin is quite too much of a reality to be ignored long at a time by anybody who lives in the world and thinks open-minded and open-eyed about it. To be sure, the voice of Royce on sin seems neither so clear nor so understandable as the voice of Paul, but it is pleasing to observe that, right in the midst of his liberal and modern Harvard, Royce rises up to say that at the very least Paul is a great deal more sensible and accurate about the subject of sin than Matthew Arnold was—albeit Arnold thought to compliment Paul by holding that Paul agreed with him.

—The London Daily News, which has the church census habit, was just ready to repeat in London the count of attendance in the churches which it took one fine Sunday ten years ago. But The News has called off its plan because of an appeal made to it jointly by the bishop of London, representing the Anglican Church, and Dr. F. B. Meyer, representing the Free Churches. These eminent leaders concede that a count now would show a big shrinkage in churchgoing, but they argue that numerical tests do not measure the real strength of the church, and it is unfair to discourage Christians by showing up a condition which superficially looks like defeat. On this ground the newspaper capitulated, but The British Weekly frankly says it regrets the intervention, and wishes The News had not yielded. It interprets the attitude of the bishop and Dr. Meyer as "acquiescing in the abandonment of the public worship of God as if it were almost a good thing," and characterizes this as a "most dangerous and indeed suicidal policy."

—Force of public opinion which twice compelled Congress to put through the Webb-Kenyon bill, stopping mail order liquor business in dry territory, ought now to be concentrated on temperance legislation for the army—not simply defensively to keep beer out of the canteen but aggressively to institute policies bringing some special advantage or bonus to soldiers who abstain from liquor.

—No one ever pulled himself together with a corkscrew.

DR. JOWETT'S MESSAGE

The Anger of the Saints

"AND PAUL, filled with the Holy Ghost, set his eyes on him and said . . . 'Thou child of the devil.'" And this man whose soul thus looked out through eyes of flame, and so spake with words of fire, is the man who also taught us that "the fruit of the Spirit is love." Indignation is therefore not inconsistent with true affection. Anger is an ingredient in all sterling love. Moreover the same man also wrote that "the fruit of the Spirit is peace." Therefore peace does not mean mere agreeableness—a temper which never takes heat and which never manifests itself in a consuming flame. The spirit of peace can reveal itself as the spirit of resentment, the spirit of invincible antagonism, the spirit of destructiveness, assaulting the strongholds of sin. Holy wrath is associated with the peaceful Lamb—"the wrath of the Lamb." Anger is a part of the equipment of the Spirit-filled life.

Passions That Are Never Spirit-Inspired

Now, it is needless to say that not all anger is born of the Spirit. The quality of passion is determined by the character of its source. If we would know its worth and worthiness we must trace passion back to its motive, its impulses, the originating well from which it springs. There is a type of anger which can be traced to personal disappointment; some secret ambition has been chilled or resisted or defeated, and anger has arisen in the realm of broken hopes. Another kind of anger can be traced to irritated nerves; the nerves are raw and exposed, and every keen wind excites them, and anger is always just at the birth, and its appearance has no moral quality and no sacred and purifying ministry.

There is still another sort of anger which can be traced to a blind conservatism. The soul is locked up in small traditions, like a dog sleeping in a tiny hut, and any knock from the large world outside excites to anger and brings forth wrath. This was the anger of the Pharisees in their relationship to Christ. "Beware of dogs"—the angry, snarling traditionalists.

There is anger, again, which originates in the movements of the guilty conscience. Wells of resentment are created, and they frequently pour out their unclean waters when the conscience is disturbed. A luminous instance of this kind is given us in the story of the martyrdom of Stephen. "When they heard these things they were cut to the heart, and they gnashed on him with their teeth." Their passion was born in their sense of guilt.

Indignations Ever Present Where the Spirit Dwells

Therefore, with all these possibilities, it is urgently needful that we should examine our passions and see from whence they flow. For concerning all the types which I have named the apostle has written another word: "Put ye off all these." They do not flow from the soul that is filled with the presence of the Holy Ghost.

Let it now be said that the life incapable of indignation and anger is palsied and insensitive. A life which keeps the same equable temperature under every circumstance, which is untroubled and unchanged whether it pass through fair gardens or through blasted wilderness, whether in the realm of ostentatious privilege or in black and reeking slum, cannot be in intimate fellowship with the Holy Spirit. Where the life is never stirred into ferment, where it never culminates in urgent crises, where there is no heat, there cannot be the Holy Spirit, whose baptism is of fire.

The life incapable of anger is morally insensitive. It has no vital perception of the holy, and therefore is numb in the presence of the unholy. It has no quiet responsiveness to the just, and has therefore no sharp recoil from the unjust. The passage from one to the other suggests no change of climate; the soul does not realize the startling difference between the holy and the profane.

The life that is incapable of anger is also indefensive. Fine indignation is like a wall of fire, and noble anger is one of the noblest protections of the soul. The capacity of fierce recoil is a safeguard in a moral crisis. A boy who goes to college equipped with pure and chivalrous anger is armed by his own resentments. A soul that cannot be angry with the devil and with things of deviltry is not antiseptic to his approach. The sea of glass is "mingled with fire," and that element of mystic flame has much to do in keeping the sea pure and clean.

And further, a life incapable of anger is destitute of the needful energy for all reform. There is no blaze in it, there is no ministry of purification. If a city is to be purged from its filth it will have to be by souls that are burning with moral resentment. "I will purify Jerusalem by the spirit of burning." It is the man who is "fervent in spirit" who will most assuredly "serve the Lord." "The grass withereth . . . because the Spirit of the Lord breatheth upon it." The church needs more of this withering breath and consuming energy that is born of holy wrath against all established wrong.

Flames the Spirit Kindles in the Christian Heart

We are taught in the New Testament that this power of indignation is begotten by the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit makes us capable of healthy heat, and it inspires the fire within us. The Holy Spirit never creates a character that is lukewarm, neutral or indifferent. His creations are always positive and passionate. When the Holy Spirit becomes enthroned in the life, three things are accomplished:

First of all, he inflames the conscience. He cleanses and sharpens the sense of right and wrong. For the lamp of conscience may burn dim like a lamp that needs trimming or fails in the supply of oil. And it is the blessed ministry of the Spirit to keep the lamp brilliant in order that we may scrupulously discern the difference between good and evil.

And second, he inflames the affections, for the affections can become like a smoldering fire, where there is more smoke than either light or heat. And it is his blessed ministry to feed the affections and keep them bright and clean. And when the affections are strong and radiant, other things are strong and radiant, too; pity, holy repugnance and Christian chivalry.

And third, the Holy Spirit inflames the imagination. He gives the imagination power to apprehend the ideal, the patterns of things as they might be—"the holy city, the new Jerusalem, come down out of heaven from God." And the imagination, glorious in the perception of the ideal, can then interpret more vividly the nature of things as they are. It is the same apostle who gives us the glorious description of the new Jerusalem who also gives us the most appalling description of the Jerusalem that is.

In all these varied ministries, the invigoration of conscience, and affection, and imagination, there is born the capacity of a pure and healthy anger. Anger that is born of the Spirit is always pure and clean. It is pure in its emotion, it is pure in its speech, and it is also pure in its deeds.

Danger in Modern Magazines

Not long ago there was a time when parents could leave any American periodical upon the sitting room table without misgiving. That time has passed, says The Youth's Companion. The periodicals that you do not need to examine with some care before you put them where your girls may see them are now few. Under one specious pretext or another those who control them are printing stories and articles that are far from paying the deference to modesty and decency upon which our literature used justly to pride itself.

This is a matter for very great regret. Periodicals intended for general reading seek to enter the home—on the plea always that they bring wholesome recreation if not more solid benefits. Thus they rest under a peculiar obligation they are now disregarding, to the injury of our youth.

Now it is the right and the duty and it should be the peculiar care of parents wisely to pick the counselors of their daughters in all that relates to love and marriage. This right and duty The Companion does not believe they wish to delegate to any editor—especially of the commercial type—or to any story writer—especially the story teller of meager talent, who must spice his wares if he would sell them. In respect of these matters, there is a right time and a wrong in which to impart the new knowledge; there is a right mood and a wrong in which to receive it.

If the new standards of the periodicals are to persist, the difficulty of the problem of bringing up our young people in sweetness and wholesomeness of mind is greatly increased. Their reading must be much more strictly supervised; their taste for what is good and pure and wholesome in literature must be more sedulously cultivated; and their characters must be molded to new strength to resist in a world no longer tender of them.

But must the new standards persist? Cannot the periodicals of general circulation be forced by public opinion to abandon their new license? Certainly we do not need to buy and read them and bring them to our homes; and if we do not buy them, they will not long offend.

"I Shall Open a Path . . or Perish"

David Livingstone: 1813-1873

BY ROBERT E. SPEER

Superlatives of description usually run the risk of question, but to name the greatest authority and most luminous interpreter of Christendom in the realm of missionary biography involves no doubt nor peril of dispute. That by no means small distinction belongs undeniably to the famous Presbyterian mission secretary who here writes for The Continent of the life of Livingstone at this centennial of his birth

A CLEAR AND EXAMINED life lived before the world, if lived after the pattern of the life of Christ, in its humble consecration to its Master, has a power beyond the words and exploits of men. Such a life lived David Livingstone. His early years gave no such rich promise as his afterlife fulfilled; his character hung fire, so to speak, and only when the urgent, imperative demands of Africa's needs were forced upon him, and then not till after he entered the work, did he display the qualities of mind and heart which linked him with the dark continent and made the world love him and think of Africa.

The story of his earlier years is well told by the simple inscription in the cemetery at Hamilton, Scotland:

"To show the resting place of Neil
Livingstone,
and Agnes Hunter, his wife,
And to express the thankfulness to
God of their children,
John, David, Janet, Charles and Agnes,
for poor and pious parents."

David Livingstone's birthday was March 19, 1813. He seems from his earliest years to have been of a calm, self-reliant nature. It was his father's habit to lock the door at dusk, by which time all the children were expected to be in the house. One evening David had broken the rule, and when he reached the door it was barred. He made no cry nor disturbance, but having procured a piece of bread, sat down contentedly to pass the night on the doorstep. There, on looking out, his mother found him. At the age of 9 he got a New Testament from his Sabbath school teacher for repeating the 119th Psalm on two successive evenings, with only five errors, a proof that perseverance was bred in his bone.

The many-sidedness of his character showed itself early in reading and in scouring the country for botanical, geological and zoological specimens. About his twelfth year he says he began to reflect on his state as a sinner, and became anxious to get the peace that he had heard came from having Christ. He waited, however, till a conscious supernatural change should be wrought in his heart, and so he remained uneasy and without the grace he longed for. Dick's "Philosophy of a Future State" saved him from his error, and Livingstone spoke earnestly of its effects. "It is my desire to show my attachment to the cause of him who died for me by devoting my life to his service." Henceforth the power of conscience and the glow of divine love moved him ever. The love that now began to open his heart guided him all through his journeys and lit the shadows of those last hours in the hut at Ilala when his spirit returned to his God and Saviour.

Gave First His Earnings, Then Himself

Feeling "that the salvation of men ought to be the chief desire and aim of every Christian," he had resolved that he "would give to the cause of missions all that he might earn beyond what was required for his subsistence." The resolution to give himself came from his reading an appeal by Mr. Gutzlaff to the churches of Britain and America, in behalf of China. It was the claims of so many millions of his fellow creatures and the complaints of the scarcity of qualified ministers "that led him to the determination to go." From that time—his twenty-first year—his efforts were constantly directed to this object. For some years he labored in the factories at Blantyre, acquiring mechanical knowledge and skill which were to stand him in good stead. From the first he strove to put his life at one with the Master's words, at once a warning and an inspiration, "By their fruits ye shall know them."

With the encouragement of minister and parents, he went to Glasgow to study medicine. After a course there he went to the house of Mr. Cecil in Essex to learn theology on a three months' probation. If a favorable opinion were formed the candidate was encouragingly reported to the board and, if practicable, sent to the field. Livingstone proved a poor student. He was sent once to preach for a minister who had fallen sick. Taking his text, he read it out very deliberately and then—the sermon had fled, and he said abruptly, "Friends, I have forgotten all I had to say," and hurrying from the pulpit he left the chapel. He never became a preacher in English, but he could tell the story of the cross and of human sin to the souls he loved in Africa till, conscience-smitten, they leaped up and rushed from the assembly.

Livingstone was refused after the first probation, and several extra months for trial were given. At last he was accepted. Then came the choice of field. The directors intended to send him to the West Indies, but he pleaded there was no need of medical missionaries there. The opium war shut up the longed-for entrance to China, and Dr. Moffat's presence in England led his thoughts and at last his life to Africa. On November 17, 1840, he and his family, we read, rose at 5 o'clock. With his father he talked over the prospects of Christian missionaries, and they agreed that the time would come when rich men and great men would think it an honor to support whole stations of missionaries, a consummation of which there are already growing indications here and in Great Britain. That morning David read the 121st and 135th Psalms and prayed. Then he and his father walked to Glasgow, and on the Broomielaw father and son looked for the last time on earth on each other's faces. The old man walked home with a lonely heart, yet praising God. And Africa had at last found her liberator.

Forward Into the North African Interior

The time of passage he devoted to study. Arrived at Cape Town he refused to build on other men's foundation, and was eager to press northward into the country. He saw at once that South Africa was well enough supplied with missionaries and that the Africa whose blood cried from the ground was far northward. Before he had been a year in the country Livingstone had learned to rule the Africans. From the first his genial address, simple and fearless manner and transparent kindliness formed a spell which rarely failed. He had great faith in the power of humor. His medical knowledge helped him greatly, but for permanent influence he relied most on the rules of justice and good feeling, and His words who came to die. Often he would say that the true road to influence was patient continuance in welldoing. His heart was full of the missionary spirit and the rough, yet simple, natures were quick to respond to a friend. At last he got permission from the directors to push on to the interior. "I am ready to go anywhere," he said, "provided it be forward."

Mabotsa and Chonuane were his first two stations. At Nolabeng he had his center as a station till 1853. There he had much toil and trouble, but the same consistent, lovely life. One of his journals says, in relation to his feelings at the discovery of Lake Ngami: "They might subject me to the charge of enthusiasm, a charge which I wish I deserved, as nothing good or great has ever been accomplished in the world without it." Here his fourth child died at the age of 6 weeks. "It was the first death in our family," he writes in his journal, "but it was just as likely to have happened had we remained at home at the station, and we have now one of our members in heaven." To his parents he writes: "Our last child died. A sweet little girl with blue eyes was taken from us to join the company of the redeemed, through the merits of him of whom she never heard. It is wonderful how soon the affections twine round a little stranger. We feel her loss keenly."

It was during the stay at Nolabeng that one of the great charms of Livingstone's character began to appear the more clearly because of the greater opportunities, one of the secrets of his power—his personal interest in each individual, however humble. He was thrown more and more on his own judgment and expedients, and he highly valued a saying of Sir Herbert Edwards, "He who has to act on his own responsibility is a slave if he does not act on his own judgment."

Enmity to the Slave Trade a Ruling Idea

Now another of the master ideas of his life began to take hold of Livingstone—the abolition of the accursed slave trade. Interests which some have thought wider and greater than the planting of individual mission stations came to view; the welfare of the whole continent. There would be no formidable obstacle to Christian missions if only the slave trade, black and threatening, could be removed. To accomplish this destruction Livingstone felt that the continent must be opened up, and that he must press onward. "Consider," he said, "the multitude that in the providence of God have been brought to light in this southern country; the probability that in our efforts to evangelize we shall put a stop to the slave trade in a large region, and by means of the highway into the north which we have discovered bring nations into the sympathies of the Christian world. So powerfully convinced am I that it is the will of our Lord I should go, I will go no matter who opposes. So ardently do I wish that all the world may be filled with the glory of the Lord. I offer myself as a forlorn hope. May God accept my service, and use me for his glory. A great honor it is to be a fellow worker with God. Who will go if I don't? No one. I would venture everything for Christ."

Preparatory to these more extensive expeditions northward, he returned to the Cape. Thence his wife and their children sailed for England. He was detained about two months after their departure in the midst of distrust and accusation; and before he reached Kolabeng the Boers destroyed everything and left nothing for sustenance or equipment. But Livingstone started northward, able "to work in faith," he said, "because Omnipotence is pledged to fulfill the promise. So very sure am I that I am in the path which God's Providence has pointed out as that by which Christ's kingdom is to be promoted, that if the society should object I would consider it my duty to withdraw from it. Can the love of Christ not carry the missionary where the slave trade carries the trader?"

In 1853 he reached Linyanti, a journey of about 1,500 miles from the Cape, and a year after wrote to his father-in-law: "I had fully made up my mind as to the path of duty before starting. I wrote to my brother-in-law, Robert Moffat: 'I shall open up a path into the interior or perish.'" From Linyanti he went to Loanda, on the west coast, about 200 miles south of the mouth of the Kongo, alone and solitary, praying, "I need to be purified—fitted for the eternal, to which my soul stretches away in ever-returning longings. Look upon me, Spirit of the living God, and supply all thou seest lacking."

Exceptional Honors on First Return to England

From Loanda the next journey was directly across the continent in a southeasterly course to Quilimane, amid hardships and perils greater, perhaps, than any he had yet encountered. He had no stores or supplies and was supported wholly by the kindness of native chiefs over whom he gained influence by his simple, loving character. From Quilimane he sailed for England and reached London December 9, 1856, having been absent fifteen years.

Fifteen months passed before his return to Africa. Meeting after meeting was held in his honor—England's greatest men testifying to the unexampled combination of noble qualities which formed Livingstone, astronomer, geographer, mercantile man, zoologist, physician and missionary, and how no man ever with such painstaking accuracy and so great success had performed the duties of each. His book, "Missionary Travels," was published in 1857, and its success was remarkable. As the complaint was afterwards made that he was not enough of a missionary and too much of a trader, he ceased to take a salary from the missionary society and said he would go on in the way the hand of God led him.

After many more honors and much labor to arouse more definite interest, Livingstone, accompanied by his wife and youngest son, left England March 10, 1858, for the Zambezi. From 1858 to 1863 the time was spent in explorations of the Zambezi and tributaries with Lake Nyassa. They were full of interest, but the story is too long to be told now. The years '64 and '65 were spent in England. The third and last expedition set out in 1865. In the beginning of '66 it reached Zanzibar westward to Ujiji on Lake Tanganyika, and then westward still to Manejeuma, and back to Ujiji.

It had now been so long since news had come of Livingstone that men began to fear that he was lost. He had left good stores at Ujiji, but returning in wretchedness and misery, almost a skeleton, he found the whole lot sold and traded, and himself in a position where unless help came he could not long survive. The English government and the Royal Geographical Society appeared to have deserted him, and the great man's life seemed nearly spun out. when other agencies unknown to Livingstone God sent in this dire need. Stanley and Livingstone met October 28, 1871.

We all know pretty well the story of the expedition under Stanley, sent by The New York, Herald to find Livingstone—to spare no expense, but to find Livingstone. Stanley's party marched slowly, with various adventures and difficulties, until they were close on Ujiji. Their approach created an extraordinary excitement. A voice saluted them in English, and then another; these were Livingstone's two servants. By and by the doctor himself appeared. "As I advanced slowly toward him," says Mr. Stanley, "I noticed he was pale and looked wearied. I would have run to him only I was a coward in the presence of such a mob; would have embraced him only that, he being an Englishman, I did not know how he would receive me."

"A Marvelous History," Says Stanley

The conversation began, but Stanley could not remember what it was. "I was too much engrossed to take my notebook out and begin to stenograph his story," writes Stanley. "He had so much to say that he began at the end, seemingly oblivious of the fact that five or six years had to be accounted for. But his account came oozing out; it was growing fast into grand proportions—into a most marvelous history of deeds." As Stanley went on to tell the story of the last few years in civilized lands, Livingstone kept saying. "You have brought me new life, you have brought me new life."

After four months together Stanley and Livingstone parted. Five days after the parting was Livingstone's 59th birthday, and this entry was made in the journal: "My Jesus, my King, my Life, my all: I again dedicate my whole self to thee. Accept me, and grant, O gracious Father, that ere this year is gone I may finish my task, in Jesus' name. Amen.—David Livingstone."

From Ujiji he had gone a few hundred miles to Bangweolo. He was still strong and courageous, but the 21st of April a change occurred; thereafter he was carried on a palanquin. On the 27th, the anniversary of his wife's death, he was apparently at the lowest ebb. The 29th was the last day of his travels. His faithful men managed to carry him to Ilala, where, as Dr. Blaikie tells us, he was placed under the eaves of a hut during a drizzling rain till his own house could be got ready. Then they laid him on a rough bed, where he spent the night. Next day he lay undisturbed. He asked a few wandering questions about the country, and his people knew the end could not be far off. They watched at a distance with hushed breath, and once a day came to say "Good morning, master." At 4 in the morning the boy at watch called in alarm for Susi, one of his servants. By the candle still burning they saw him not in bed but kneeling at the bedside, with his head buried in his hands in the pillow. He had passed away on the furthest of all his journeys alone, save the presence of God and his angels, praying, in that reverential attitude about which he was always so particular, commending his own spirit, with all his dear ones, as was his wont, into the hands of his Saviour, and commending Africa, with all her woes and sins and wrongs, to the Avenger of the oppressed and the Redeemer of the lost.

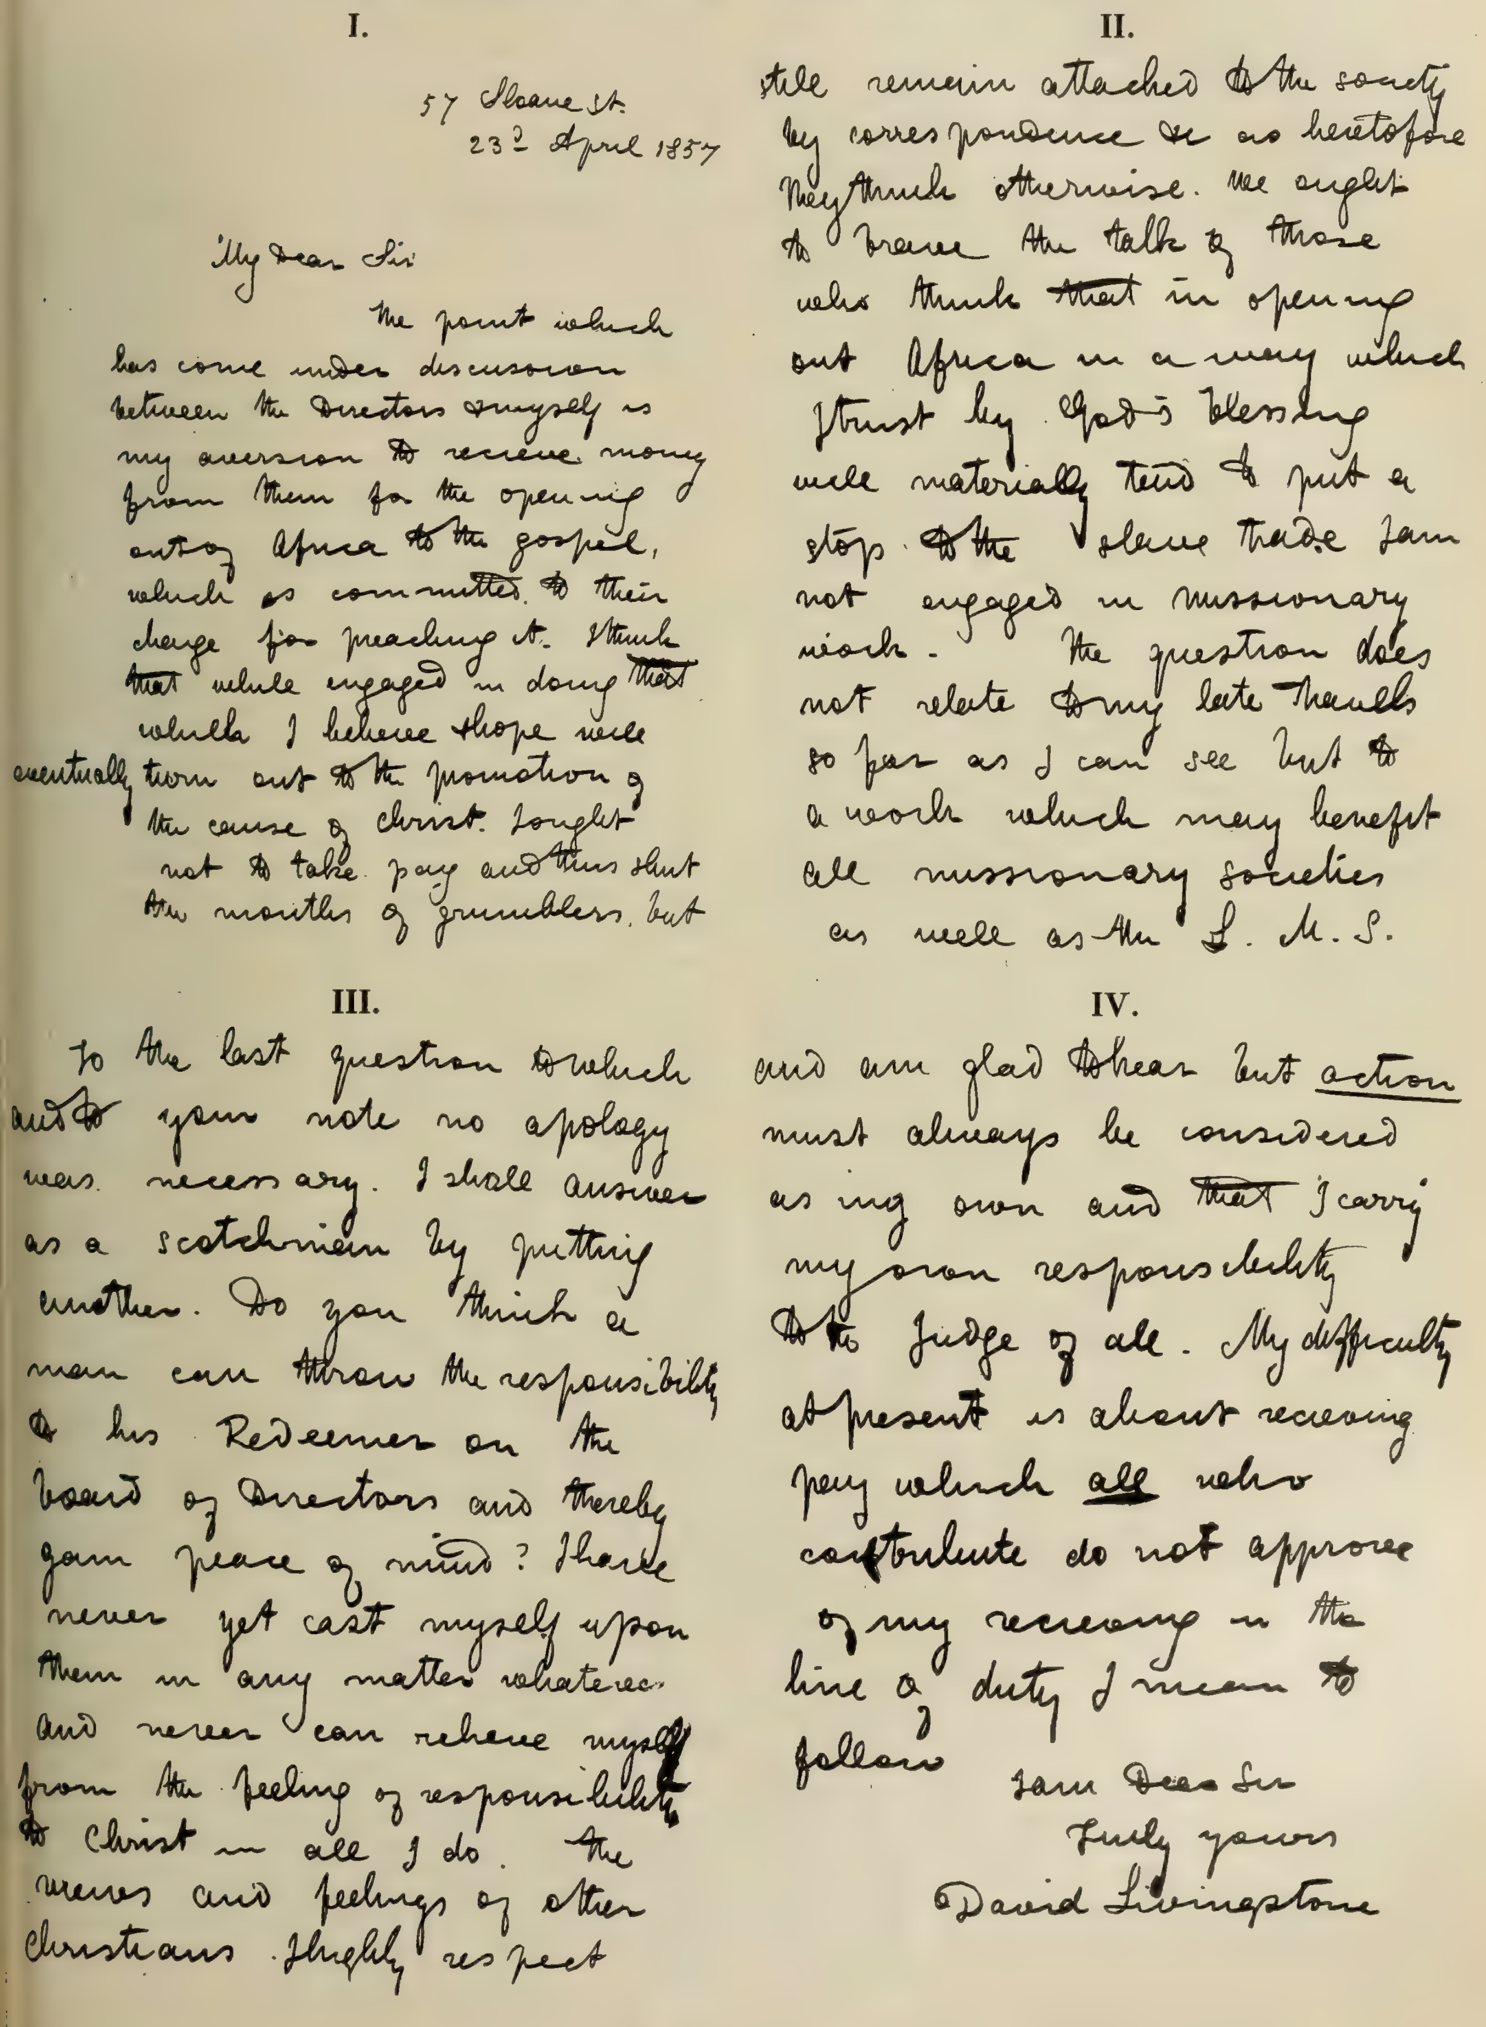
Heart Buried in Africa; Body in Westminster

One of the boys had learned a method of preserving bodies, and the men removed the heart and vitals and buried them at the foot of a tree, where Jacob Wainwright carved an inscription, and then the faithful men shouldered the body and carried it to Zanzibar. Thence it was brought to England, and April 18th the bones of the poor Scotch lad were laid to rest with pomp and solemnity in Westminster abbey, while his heart rested in the green forests he loved so well, under the moula tree in Ilala. Was that all? Nay, as Ruskin says, "of all the pulpits from which human voice is ever

"NO PAY FOR OPENING OF AFRICA"

—Livingstone

Facsimile of a newly discovered letter written by David Livingstone to a friend regarding his later relations with the London Missionary Society



I.

57 Sloane St.
23d April 1857

My dear Sir

The point which has come under discussion between the Directors & myself is my aversion to receive money from them for the opening out of Africa to the gospel, which is committed to their charge for preaching it. I think that while engaged in doing ~~that~~ which I believe & hope will eventually turn out to the promotion of the cause of Christ. I ought not to take pay and thus shut the mouths of grumblers, but still remain attached to the society by correspondence &c as heretofore. They think otherwise. We ought to brave the talk of those who think ~~that~~ in opening out Africa in a way which I trust by God's blessing will materially tend to put a stop to the slave trade I am not engaged in missionary work. The question does not relate to my late travels so far as I can see but to a work which may benefit all missionary societies as well as the L. M. S.

III.

To the last question to which and to your note no apology was necessary. I shall answer as a Scotchman by putting another. Do you think a man can throw the responsibility to his Redeemer on the board of Directors and thereby gain peace of mind? I have never yet cast myself upon them in any matter whatever and never can relieve myself from the feeling of responsibility to Christ in all I do. The views and feelings of other Christians I highly respect and am glad to hear but action must always be considered as my own and ~~that~~ I carry my own responsibility to the Judge of all. My difficulty at present is about receiving pay which all who contribute do not approve of my receiving in the line of duty I mean to follow

I am Dear Sir
Truly yours

sent forth, there is none from which it reaches so far as from the grave." From the wornout figure kneeling at the bedside in the hut at Ilala, as Dr. Blaikie says, an electric spark seemed to fly, quickening hearts on every side. The statesman felt it; it put new vigor into the dispatches he wrote and the measures he devised to suppress the slave trade. The merchant felt it. The explorer felt it. The scientist and physician felt it. The missionary felt it—felt it as a reproof of past languor and unbelief, and found himself lifted up to a higher plane of faith and devotion. "No parliament of philanthropy was held, but the verdict was as unanimous and hearty as if the Christian world had met and passed the resolution. "Livingstone's work shall not die. Africa shall live!"

He followed closely in the steps of him upon whom the Spirit of the Lord God was; whom the Lord appointed to preach good tidings to the meek; and had sent to bind up the broken hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives and the opening of the prisons to them that are bound. And when preachers and teachers speak of this man, whom Sir William Ferguson asserted to be one of the greatest men of the human race, when fathers tell their children what Africa owes to him, and when the poor Africans who knew and loved him weep for the departure of the good father and the question is asked what made him so great and so good, the answer will be that "he lived by the faith of the Son of God and that the love of Christ constrained him to live and die for Africa."

If David Livingstone speaks to any heart today, it is not from the marble tomb in London but out of the wilds of the country he loved, calling us to add our lives to the living sacrifice which is to be offered for the wounded land for whose healing he died.

Livingstone a Typical Son of Scotland

BY WILLIAM P. PATERSON

The brilliant professor of divinity in the theological faculty of the University of Edinburgh, today the outstanding theologian and philosopher of the established Scotch Church, is himself by every type mark a characteristic Scot, and so through temperament no less than through information and insight fitted to appreciate the granite Scotchness in the character of the missionary hero of Africa

I DO NOT PROFESS to estimate the achievements of the great explorer who penetrated from Bechuana land to the Upper Zambezi and the west coast, crossed Africa from Loanda to Quilimane, discovered mighty lakes and rivers, traveled 29,000 miles among savage peoples and added 1,000,000 square miles to the known surface of the globe. Nor shall I attempt to measure the work of the missionary pioneer who opened up wide tracts of the dark continent to organized missionary effort, and who besides the appeal which he made to the Christian heart stirred the general conscience by the disclosure of the atrocities of the African slave trade. In this article I shall confine myself to trying as a Scotsman to expound the character of this Scotsman.

"Livingstone," says Sir Harry Johnston, "was the greatest and best man who ever explored Africa." The remark may well be gratifying to a Scotsman, for to him Livingstone appears as the happy embodiment of a combination of qualities which are not uncommon in varying degrees among the best sort of his countrymen, rather than as the possessor of unique or even superlative gifts and graces. When Johnston made inquiries at Blantyre of those who had known Livingstone as a boy he was told that "he wasna thocht to be a by-ordinar laddie." What made the difference between his life and that of many others of his race was that an extraordinary opportunity came to him which extracted extraordinary results out of powers and virtues such as have sometimes adorned only the annals of a country town.

A Son of Scotia's Stoutest Lineage

Livingstone owed to the Scottish nation the raw material of his character, and he owed still more to the institutions which represent and mold its intellectual and religious life. He loved Scotland. The criticism is sometimes made that a Scotsman can see nothing more in the beautiful scenery of other lands than a greater or less resemblance to some ordinary Scottish landscape. Even so Livingstone writes: "Coming down the Zonga we had time to look at its banks. They are very beautiful, and resemble in some parts the River Clyde above Glasgow." But even his patriotism could discriminate against our accent. "Don't speak Scotch," he wrote to his little daughter; "it is not so pretty as English."

He had a good Scottish lineage. On his father's side he was descended from a Hebridean stock, which had doubtless in its veins the blood of Scandinavian sea rovers, while his mother probably connected him with the earnest, intelligent and industrious population of the West Country Scots. But it was the influence of the Scottish institutions of school and church that made this raw material effective, and adapted it to the special work of the man of science and the missionary.

The picture which has so deeply impressed outsiders—of the boy at the loom stealing time to study his Latin grammar, sitting up over his books after a long day's work and in due course finding his way to the university—is not so much talked of in Scotland, inasmuch as hundreds of "lads of parts" in every generation have found their way from as humble homes to "the college" to prepare for one or other of the learned professions. What rather appears surprising now is that he found it possible to get a medical diploma after four years of study, two of which had been devoted to arts and divinity. At all events it was due to its democratic university system, which enabled the son of the Blantyre tea dealer to get the benefit of a university training, that Scotland gave Livingstone to the world as a missionary explorer, who was at the same time also a good man of science.

Still more evidently did the forces of the religious life of Scotland enter into the warp and woof of his character. The piety of his parents left an abiding mark, and he also quotes the counsel of a goodly villager which had sunk deep: "Now, lad, make religion the everyday business of your life, and not a thing of fits and starts; for if you do not, temptation and other things will get the better of you." The national church was the spiritual home of his childhood; and although his father Neil became a voluntary, and joined the Independents, Livingstone continued to speak of his mother church with reverence as "an establishment which has been an incalculable blessing to the country." His doctrinal views were those of the evangelical party which was in the ascendant when he left Scotland, although like many of the best Scotsmen he combined the evangelical creed with a real dash of moderatism.

Mind and Heart of the Scotch Stamp

It would be vain to seek to determine how much Livingstone owed to the natural genius and character of the Scottish people, how much to that people as it had been educated and disciplined by school and church, and how much directly to the influences of education and of the gospel. Suffice it to say that there is scarcely a taste or trait in his character which is not matter of frequent observation—especially among the better sort of folk who people the Scottish lowlands.

To begin with, he had the alert and acquisitive mind which is common in all classes throughout lowland Scotland, and which has been attested by its abundant crop of distinguished men of science. A Blantyre contemporary of his has told me that in the early nineteenth century the workingmen of the district had extraordinary intellectual ambitions and showed the most catholic interest in philosophy, theology, history and science. When I read Livingstone's scientific description of the tsetse fly I recall the similar interest and accuracy with which the old Blantyre workman of my acquaintance went into the life history and the depredations of an injurious insect that preyed on the rasp canes of an orchard.

The Scottish quality of perseverance rising to dogged determination in the face of obstacles was the essential presupposition of Livingstone's splendid career. He found himself in collision with the Boers, and he resolved that it was the lone missionary, and not the masterful race, that was to decide whether central Africa should be opened up to the gospel and liberty. The same quality carried him with utterly inadequate resources through the difficulties and dangers of his toilsome journeys, and in the last years he struggled on through sheer force of resolute habit when his constitution had been undermined. His determination, it must be granted, even passed over into the obstinacy which we call "dourness." Sir Harry Johnston loses patience with him for refusing to be persuaded by Stanley to abandon a task which had become impossible and fruitless. He might have recovered his health if he had come back; he might have got a knighthood and been made president of the geographical society; but as he had not yet accomplished the project he had set himself of settling the problem of the sources of the Nile, he elected to go on with his explorations as a dying man among the swamps of Lake Bangweolo.

He had also the decisiveness and tenacity of opinion which is the intellectual aspect of Scottish perseverance, though he sometimes chided himself for signs of weakness. "It would be comfortable," he says, "to be positive like Baker. How soothing to be positive. In reference to this Nile source I have been kept in perpetual doubt and perplexity. I know too much to be positive." It was part of the tribute that had been exacted from the Scotsman by the spirit of science that he thought it possible he might be mistaken.

Love of Adventure and Independence

With Scottish dourness he united the spirit of adventure and daring. This combination is more exceptional, as the lowland Scot is not constitutionally adventurous, and has for the most part moved and migrated only when economic pressure and the desire of getting on prove stronger than his constitutional conservatism and caution. Livingstone, however, was undoubtedly keenly alive to the charm of adventure in the unknown, and confessed to it as cooperating with the missionary motive to direct his wanderings. "The mere animal pleasure," he writes, "of traveling in a wild unexplored country is very great. The mind works well, the eye is clear, the step is firm; and we have usually the stimulus of remote chances of danger either from beasts or men."

This spirit of adventure was doubtless part of Livingstone's inheritance from the Scandinavian ancestors of the Western isles—men of the race which in an earlier age had been brought to Scotland by Providence to insure that the nation would have a sufficient endowment of enterprise and courage to qualify it to take a large hand in the opening up and settling of the new oversea world.

There are also more distinctively moral qualities of Livingstone's character which are familiarly Scottish. He had a dislike of seeming to compromise what Burns calls "the glorious privilege of being independent." "It was not without a pang," he writes, "that I offered myself to the London Missionary Society; for it was not agreeable to one accustomed to work his own way to become in a measure dependent on others." When we realize how much this went against the grain, we must appreciate the strength of principle which made him resolutely refuse—Scotsman though he was—to secure some measure of independence by dabbling in the ivory trade, or even accepting valuable gifts of the kind which were thrust upon him.

Veracity and Honesty Unfailing

It is, again, the lowland Scot that is true to type who, as he does, places honesty and veracity in the front rank of the fundamental virtues. This, he tells us, was traditional in his house—which goes to confirm the view that the Scandinavian element had something to do with the making of the best stratum of the Scottish lowland population. Livingstone quotes his grandfather as saying to his children on his deathbed: "I have searched carefully through all the traditions of our family and I never could discover that there was a dishonest man among our forefathers. If therefore any of you should take to dishonest ways, it will not be because it runs in our blood. I leave this precept with you: Be honest."

"Should I in the following pages," adds Livingstone, "fall into errors, I hope they will be regarded as unintentional, and not as indicating that I have forgotten our ancient motto." Livingstone was conspicuously truthful—so much so that his veracity often takes the form of a realism which painfully sees things as they are, utters itself in the bluntest candor and is too honest to gloss anything over except so far as a legitimate demand may be made by Christian charity. His reverence for the missionary calling does not blind him to certain unlovely and paltry aspects of the life of the missionary community which impressed him in Bechuana land. "The missionaries on this side the river," he injudiciously writes, "are in a bad state. The devil is in the station; but they cannot see him, or, rather, won't." Even the wife whom he married for love and deeply mourned in death he sees without any idealizing additions.

The only point at which his candor seems to fail a little in point of self-examination and self-judgment is when he writes about the object of his explorations. In speaking of his last tragic quest for the sources of the Nile Dr. Blaikie writes: "He had a strong impression that it would be a service to religion as well as science to discover the fountains of the stream on whose bosom, in the dawn of Hebrew history, Moses had floated in the ark of bulrushes." Livingstone certainly says something like this, but it is rather a far-fetched explanation of his refusal to abandon the vain quest of the sources of the Nile in the upper basin of the Kongo that he hoped thereby to help to establish the credit of the patriarchal narratives of the Pentateuch.

There are no doubt many egotists in Scotland—with the egotism that is keenly self-conscious of merit, that dwells complacently on one's achievements and that makes moan over the burden of one's labors and the cross of privation and suffering. There is a contrasted type which is marked by genuine humility, which is reticent about notable deeds, and which minimizes the experience of hardship and disappointment. Livingstone was a splendid illustration of the latter type. He notes his great discoveries in his journals with little trace of exaltation and with no shadow of boasting. It was evidently distasteful to him even to write about himself. He treats very lightly the famous adventure with the lion, and says that but for the importunities of friends he had meant to have kept it to tell his children in his dotage. On one of the few occasions that he becomes sentimental he thinks of his last resting place, and no dream of Westminster abbey puts in a claim for consideration: "This is the sort of grave I should prefer—to lie in the still, still forest, and no hand ever disturb my bones."

Specially characteristic of Livingstone was the combination of tender sympathy toward the weak and suffering with a capacity of fierce moral indignation against evil-doers. This combination is common enough on the small scale in a select class of Scotsmen; they are all kindness toward dumb animals, children and distressed folk, while they can blaze out in scorn and wrath against uncleanness, meanness and inhumanity. In Livingstone these contrasted and complementary virtues showed on the grand scale. And first of the gentleness:

"There was truly an indescribable charm about him," said a friend of his early life, "which, with all his rather ungainly ways and by no means winning face, attracted almost everyone." Livingstone has remarked that the French had no idea of influencing the natives except by bullying them, and that such bullying was an entire mistake and failure. His own theory was that goodness or unselfishness impressed their minds far more than any kind of skill or power. The judgment upon the white man which they formed from his own walk and conversation is very striking. "You have different hearts from ours," they said; "all black men's hearts are bad, but yours are good." "The smallest acts of friendship," he wrote, "are no despisable part of the missionary armor."

Africa's Love for Its Noble Friend

He prayed that the Most High would grant him influence in the eyes of the natives; and the reward of his gentleness and conspicuous goodness was that he traveled unharmed through savage regions bristling with myriad dangers, and that the love of his followers even survived his death and made it seem an act of piety to carry what remained of the poor corpse to the ship that should bear it back to his native land. On the other hand he was consistently moved to a great indignation and wrath by all who did the manifest works of the devil—especially in the form of man's inhumanity to man. He came near to hating the Boers for their rapacity and cruelty; he attacked the horrors of slave raiding in words that still set the imagination and conscience on fire; and he would dearly have loved on occasion—but for consideration for the safety of his party—to have pistoled some of the scoundrels.

The religious faith and life of Livingstone, as has been said, reflected the contemporary evangelicalism. He received the Scriptures as the infallible word of God. He regarded as the kernel of the gospel the doctrine of Christ's atoning sacrifice—which he was wont to place along with the doctrine of judgment to come in the forefront of his missionary message. He lived by faith in the risen and glorified Christ, and he exhorted his children to seek and uphold a personal relation with the Saviour. The doctrine of Providence, moreover, was a great part of the strength and support of his life; and he was never weary of tracing the evidences supplied in his own experience of the superintending wisdom and care of the heavenly Father.

Along with all this, however, there went a characteristically Scottish reserve in regard to his religious experiences. After a brief reference to the subject at the beginning of his "Missionary Travels" he observes: "I shall not again refer to the inner spiritual life which I believe then began." In place of a confident assurance we have from time to time the expression of a humble hope that the good work was being continued in him and that he preserved "a living interest" in his Saviour. "Humbly believing," he says, "that through sovereign mercy and grace I have been enabled to accept salvation, and having felt in some measure its effects on my still depraved and deceitful heart, it is my desire to show my attachment to the cause of him who died for me by devoting my life to his service."

All Life Accepted as Sacred

This service he interpreted in no narrow spirit; he favored the principle once thought to be a mark of moderatism that Christianity to produce its best results should go hand in hand with civilization, and he conceived that he still served Christ when he exchanged the service of the London Missionary Society for the civilizing mission of one of her majesty's consuls. But whether as missionary or consul he made the impression that his whole life was a spiritual service rooted in gratitude to God and his Saviour. As he himself quaintly put it: "One ought to endeavor to devote the peculiarities of his nature, whatever they may be, to the Redeemer's service." Sir Harry Johnston, who does not consider too sympathetically this side of things, and contests the view that Livingstone died in the act of prayer, confesses that "his life was for thirty years one prolonged prayer for Africa."

To David Livingstone Scotland owes a vast debt for the elevation of its aims, and in particular for developing, concentrating and guiding its missionary zeal. It is also indebted to him for adding to the company of the great men who have made its name honorable throughout the world. And not least may it be proud of him as one who laid upon the altar its characteristic gifts of mind and will; and who in addition manifested them in a form in which all that is worldly and selfish and vain was burned out by the holy fire which Christ sent upon the earth, so that they were made meet and wholly effective for the advancement of his kingdom of holy love of justice and of good will.

Are You Playing on Top of the Keys?

BY MRS. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS

Girls growing into young womanhood will find food for profitable reflection in the thoughtful note sounded by Mrs. Hillis (wife of the well-known Brooklyn preacher), who here discusses such everyday practices as playing ragtime and reading light fiction, and also comments on the problem of easily made friendships. Other articles by the same author will follow from time to time

NOT LONG AGO a pianist whose work is recognized as exceptionally artistic, a musician who has spent years in study in foreign cities, and who has had great success as a teacher, was asked if it were true that musical "touch" is an inborn gift, a thing which cannot be acquired, but is a part of the equipment with which a soul comes into the world. She replied. "Not at all; it can be acquired." Sitting at the piano she illustrated her idea. "When the note is struck, it should be held with firm but gentle pressure until one gets the aftertone, the full depth of the note. Many persons, especially young girls, play on the top of the keys, and never get their full value; they lose the best part of the music."

This which the artist affirmed of music is true of the way life is commonly lived. Most people, especially girls, to whom life has not yet shown its deeper meaning, play on the top of the keys and miss the best part of the music.

Mere Pastime Which Prevents Growth

Of course a great deal of this comes from youth and inexperience, and is because girls are more sheltered and protected than their brothers, so that they know life on its surface and do not strike the deep tone. It is easier to play on the top of the keys, and a certain skill and celerity is quickly acquired, just as it is easier to cultivate a taste for ragtime and coon songs than for Wagner, and the results are similar. The swing of the ragtime commands ready attention, but the player never gets any farther and the audience is soon weary and ready for something new. The music of this season is forgotten in a few months; there is simply substitution of the fad of today for that of yesterday; there is never any growth; even worse—there soon comes a letting down and the player of "popular" music may keep on year after year, until some day she wakes up to realize that she is indulging in girl's pastime when the time has come for a woman's work.

It is not so with the student of the great composers. She is not only a better player, but she is stronger mentally, her music is never out of date, she is in touch with the permanent, she finds her music a gateway leading into art and literature and all departments of life; it does not belong to one country, it is not of a season; it is world music understood and loved by musicians and music lovers everywhere; it is its depth which is stimulating and satisfying. The difference between popular and classic music is that the former satiates without satisfying; the latter leaves always the suggestion of something beyond, so there is the stimulus to search out and find what that something may be. That is why musicians never tire of really good music; they cannot exhaust its possibilities.

The same comparison holds true of literature. The reader of the lighter novels is like the player of ragtime, only the ragtime music does not take deep hold of the emotion, and is by so much a less powerful influence; its impression is less lasting, and perhaps for that reason less harmful; its influence is negative rather than positive, a substitution of something without nutrition for real food. But a novel of passion or of strong sentimentality introduces an element which has a positive influence. Taken under proper circumstances and in proper doses, its effect may be medicinal and wholesome, but the most valuable of medicine will never take the place of regular nourishment. The power and charm of the story lie chiefly in its imaginative qualities; and imagination is but one faculty of the intellect, which must not be cultivated to the neglect of the rest.

Whether the flood of light literature, especially the short magazine stories, which is poured out upon us is cause or effect of the highly sensitive nervous condition unfortunately prevalent today may be questioned; but it is not a question that the two things exist side by side, and to such a highly organized nervous temperament an undue excitement of the imagination is particularly harmful, so that we Americans, of all people, are the ones who should avoid its abuse.

An excessive reading of short stories and novels or their exclusive reading is more harmful than such use of popular music, since while that may take the place of the better music and even spoil the taste for it, there are lurking dangers in fiction which do not exist in music. To command attention and create interest, life cannot be pictured in humdrum circumstances except by a great author, so it is given a striking or picturesque setting. This does not mean that it is a story of luxury and wealth, since it is rather the present fashion to go to the slums or to wage earners for heroes and heroines, but there is an analytical portrayal of emotions and motives which even if it be correct is taken entirely away from all the commonplace uninteresting dilution which makes endurable and livable the same emotions in real life, and prevents that morbidness which is the common symptom of the inveterate novel reader.

Or, if the novel be of another type, the "live-happily-ever-after" kind, there is the same danger to which the reader of advertisements of patent medicine is liable—a recognition in person of all the symptoms. If every heroine is lovely and charming and a creature to be petted and adored, but never by any chance to be asked to get up in the morning and assist in the housework, her understudy is apt to feel herself abused and unappreciated when this hard fate befalls her. This malady is perhaps less serious than morbidness, since like the measles the attack is likely to be over sooner or later, but like the measles also it frequently leaves after-effects and makes its victim undesirable to live with while the malady prevails.

To get the most out of ourselves, to develop and bring out what is born within us, some of our reading should be chosen to exercise the brain, as gymnastics develop the body. The old-fashioned idea that a child should read books beyond its age was much more nearly right than our modern idea of writing down to the child's level; it is as if we continued always to feed him porridge, lest solid food be too strong; if we reversed the process we would do better. We are likely with our present methods to produce a race of athletic bodies but with porridge minds; a balanced diet of reading and gymnastics would make for stronger intellects in healthy bodies.

Choice of Friends Should Not Be Superficial

In the choice of friends also the tune may be played on the top of the keys, and here most of all the best of the music will be missed if the note is not sounded to its full depth. We read the best loved of our books but seldom, we are under their influence at short intervals few and far between, but the chosen friend, the chum, is a constant and very active influence. It may sound cold and calculating to select a friend because of what she may do for your moral character or for your intellect, but these are bound to be more or less molded by the influence of the friend. Friendship is an atmosphere, and on its purity and power of exhilaration depends to a great degree our moral and intellectual health. Thoreau says: "Our friend must be broad; his must be an atmosphere in which we can expand and breathe; for the most part we are smothered and stifled by one another. I go to see my friend, and try his atmosphere. If our atmospheres do not mingle, if we repel each other strongly, it is no use to stay." This is the difference between people and books. He says elsewhere: "A written word is the choicest of relics, it is something at once more intimate with us and more universal than any other work of art; it is the work of art nearest to life itself." But that is the difference; books at best, however precious or stimulating, are works of art; friendship is the expression of life itself.

If we had, as cats are said to have, nine lives, we could afford to experiment in friendship, and squander time in unbalanced reading, but life passes too swiftly and character is too quickly set in the mold to run the risk of doubtful friendships or of reading simply for entertainment. In companionship as in reading a choice of that which enlarges our faculties and which stretches the mind, which makes us capable of something higher and better, is the only choice worth while. Otherwise we make ourselves to be of the ragtime, this season's novel type, when we might be an inspiring influence.

Lines to a Skeleton

"Anonymous" writes: "About fifty years ago The London Chronicle published a poem entitled 'Lines to a Skeleton,' which excited much attention. Every effort, even to the offering of a reward of 50 guineas, was vainly made to discover the author. All that ever transpired was that the poem in a fair clerk's hand was found near a skeleton of remarkable beauty of form and color in the museum of the Royal College of Surgeons."

Behold this ruin! 'Twas a skull
Once of ethereal spirit full.
This narrow cell was Life's retreat;
This space was Thought's mysterious seat.
What beauteous visions filled this spot!
What dreams of pleasure long forgot!
Nor hope, nor joy, nor love, nor fear,
Have left one trace of record here.

Beneath this moldering canopy
Once shone the bright and busy eye;
But start not at the dismal void—
If social love that eye employed,
If with no lawless fire it gleamed
But through the dews of kindness beamed,
That eye shall be forever bright
When stars and sun are sunk in night.

Within this hollow cavern hung
The ready, swift and tuneful tongue;
If Falsehood's honey it disdained,
And when it could not praise was chained,
If bold in Virtue's cause it spoke,
Yet gentle concord never broke—
This silent tongue shall plead for thee
When Time unveils Eternity!

Say, did these fingers delve the mine,
Or with the envied rubies shine?
To hew the rock or wear a gem
Can little now avail to them;
But if the page of Truth they sought,
Or comfort to the mourner brought,
These hands a richer meed shall claim
Than all that wait on Wealth and Fame.

Avails it whether bare or shod
The feet the paths of duty trod?
If from the bowers of Ease they fled,
To seek affliction's humble shed;
If Grandeur's guilty bribe they spurned,
And home to Virtue's cot returned—
These feet with angel wings shall vie,
And tread the palace of the sky!

A Scotchman, wishing to know his fate at once, telegraphed a proposal of marriage to the lady of his choice. After spending the entire day at the telegraph office he was finally rewarded late in the evening by an affirmative answer:

"If I were you," suggested the operator, when he delivered the message, "I'd think twice before I'd marry a girl that kept me waiting all day for my answer."

"Na, na," retorted the Scot. "The lass who waits for the night rates is the lass for me."

The Vice Problem and Religion

BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS, Editor Afield of The Continent

THE SOCIAL EVIL has of late become an acute problem in America, and in all the world. Within the past few years civilization has been fairly staggered by revelations concerning the "white slave" traffic. Vice commissions have been created in many large cities. A growing stream of literature upon the subject testifies to society's quickened interest in it. Miss Jane Addams happily phrases the existing sentiment as "a new conscience and an ancient evil."

As was to be expected, the churches have shown serious concern over these revelations. Religious bodies are discussing them. Ministers are preaching upon them. Church men are foremost in the membership of the vice commissions. New societies and missions to deal with the question have been created, and existing ones revivified. Plainly, the churches are not indifferent to the subject. Thus far, though, they appear to have only touched the surface of it—what they have been doing is mere ambulance work. The repairing of disaster has kept them busy. They have tried to save what is possible of the human wreckage. In the case of the social evil, religion is engaged chiefly in gathering up the debris.

There are signs that society is advancing beyond this stage of merely trying to remedy conditions which should have been prevented before they came to pass. Scientific studies of the subject have been made at many centers within recent years. It is clear that inequitable economic conditions open an almost inescapable door to sin before thousands of girls. They are not paid a living wage. Either they must go wrong or else they must go hungry—there is literally no alternative for multitudes. Ignorant, young, and very human, they succumb to temptation. Lack of proper home training and education, the allurements of city life and the criminal machinations of procurers are factors entering into this complex condition. Still, the moral factor is ultimately the determining one.

The heart of the vice question—the age-old and universal problem of the social evil—is how to keep men chaste. Much that is indubitably true, as well as not a little that is maudlin and merely erotically sentimental, has been written of late about "Why girls go wrong." Nine times out of ten the answer is a man. The social problem is at bottom a man problem. Let young men be kept loyal to religion's historic teachings concerning personal chastity and neither the municipality nor the sociologist will be troubled seriously by the social evil in its larger reaches.

If this reasoning is sound, it puts the issue squarely up to the churches. Their function is to determine society's ideals of character; to hold mankind up to its loftiest capabilities. Moral standards are fixed by religion. As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he. Fundamentally, the entire matter of the social evil is one of establishing proper standards of right and wrong. If the churches cannot bind upon men's hearts that law of chastity which is above the power and scope of all civil enactments, then we do not know which way to turn for an agency which will permanently remedy the hideous injustices which are bound up in this present tolerated condition. The master word is with religion—upon its power of utterance depend, in incalculable degree, the issues of happiness or misery, cleanness or impurity, of uncounted myriads of lives, the innocent as well as the transgressors.

What portents are upon the horizon? The past year has been conspicuously one of stress upon the masculine note in the churches. The Men and Religion Movement has had the right of way. The present-day task of bringing men and boys under the sway of the church has engaged the best thought of the Christian ministry and laity. Man-making is religion's business. The church cannot escape responsibility for the moral state of the times.

Here enters the hideous interrogation point of the social evil, which has leered at good people throughout more centuries than history records. Can the churches solve this old, old problem? Are they equal to this difficult struggle with human nature? The vice question is primarily a man question, and with men it is primarily a character question. And the standards of character, it must ever be remembered, are the concern of religion.

However the churches may eventuate, whatever their success or failure, the truth lies clear in every sound thinker's mind that the social sore must be healed from within outward. The cleansing must be at the springs. There is no other adequate remedy for this evil, which now newly engages the thought of church and state, than a new mind in men. The only "vice squad" that can be finally and permanently effective in arresting this disorder is a new ideal of clean and chivalrous manhood on the part of boys and men.

The creation and vitalizing of that ideal is the business of religion.

BRADFORD HORTON, MAN

BY RICHARD S. HOLMES

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS—Bradford Horton, working his way through Prestonbury Theological Seminary, becomes entangled in a money theft which not only threatens his reputation but also puts him in a false position with regard to his parentage. Two friends remain openly loyal during his trouble. A third, Miss Elmore, though less outspoken in her championship, displays sufficient loyalty to give her father considerable uneasiness. He is, therefore, relieved in mind when, at the beginning of a long foreign tour, he sees that she has won the love of a young Scotchman. His relief is short-lived, however. A hot defense of Horton in a discussion results in an open breach with her father. Mr. Elmore, resenting her defiance of his wishes, collapses under the strain.

"NO, MADAM. It is not necessarily nor probably a fatal stroke. It is what is popularly called partial paralysis. Your husband's brain has been under some severe strain, and a time of enforced rest has come. His recovery will be slow, however."

The doctor was right. The struggle with disease was long, but it brought into action the qualities long latent which made Emily Elmore a noble woman. For a week Eleanor aided her mother in watching over the unconscious man, then slowly the tired brain woke. The girl had told her mother all that had happenend, and the mother with real loveliness had softened the sorrows of the little tragedy, and spoken no reproach.

"Your father had been greatly disturbed by that Glencoe woman's letter, by what he called Mr. Horton's perfidy, and by what he feared might come between you and Mr. Horton, should you be under his influence. He is a fascinating man, dear, and your father feels that whenever he is where Mr. Horton is. Now that you have told him what you have, there will be no more trouble. It will all come right by and by."

Nevertheless, one day after her father's mind had cleared, a sight of Eleanor threw him into such a spasm of excitement that the physician who was present gently asked her to withdraw. Before he left the hotel he said to her:

"My dear, sometimes duty keeps us by a sick bed, and sometimes away from it. This is one of the latter times. Were you with your father when the attack seized him?"

"I was. For the first time since I was born my father and I had quarreled. It breaks my heart to think what I have done."

"You did not do it all. Your father evidently was in an overwrought nervous state, caused by something that had preceded this disagreement. Blaming yourself will not help matters in the least. Just keep well, so that when you see him again he will find you bright and cheery. But don't try to see him until I say you may."

So through January and February and into March the girl waited, patient, hoping, praying, sometimes against hope. At last there came a day when with clear tongue the invalid could speak, and his first words were, "Where is Eleanor?"

Then the surgeon lifted his embargo and called her to her father's bedside. He held out his good hand; she lifted it to her lips without a word, and his smile answered. Nor was the incident from the past touched upon as his strength returned.

May found the convalescent able to travel, and their journey took them to Hongkong. Mr. Elmore's walk was slow and heavy, but there was life in it, and a chance occurrence helped to bring back more robust health. Walking one day along a street lined with the shops that so delight foreigners, he and Eleanor heard an unexpected salutation.

"Hello, Elmore! This is a surprise. Where do you hail from?" The speaker was ruddy-faced and British-whiskered, with success and self-appreciation written in every line of him. He was the Hon. John Eggleston, member of Congress from New York City, and an old friend of Mr. Elmore. The hearty tone roused that gentleman more than anything that had occurred since his illness.

"Come round to our hotel tonight, John, and dine with us," Mr. Elmore added after the necessary explanations and introductions. Eleanor's heart gave a great bound of joy. That was the first note of human interest to sound in her father's voice for months, and grateful tears welled up from the depths of her life and overflowed.

"Yes, come, Mr. Eggleston," she said; "you will do father a world of good."

That night was the turning point around which Mr. Elmore came up to his normal life. It was a happy dinner party, and after the dinner they all talked together until almost midnight.

Eggleston left with a promise to return next day. For a week the two men were inseparable, and when the congressman sailed for North China Mr. Elmore was practically a well man.

October came. The Elmores turned their faces toward India and the homeward way. December found them in Cairo, quartered comfortably at Sheapard's. A Cook's tour party of Vassar girls was to Eleanor a most welcome change from the French, English and German people by whom she had been surrounded now for many months. Some of the old zest that had characterized her in Japan returned and life began to look rose-colored once more, when suddenly one morning in the garden she met Malcolm Stuart, with some other Englishmen. He lifted his hat, but passed without pausing to speak.

"Must I go through all that once more?" she asked herself.

Later, alone with her mother on the veranda, she told her of the occurrence.

"Your father will be glad to see him," said Mrs. Elmore. "He was very fond of Mr. Stuart."

"You know, mother, it was about him that father and I quarreled. I'm afraid to have father see him again."

"I'll manage it, dear. I can tell him I think Mr. Stuart is here, and can prepare him so there will be nothing sudden about it."

For her father's sake, then, Eleanor made no effort to avoid the meeting which otherwise she would have endeavored to prevent. When Stuart passed her in a garden nook she blushed rosily, but replied to his greeting graciously enough, "I'm glad to see you, Mr. Stuart, and father will be more than glad."

"I return the compliment, Miss Elmore. I regretted that I could not stop yesterday to say how heartily I do so. Is your father well?"

"Very well. You will call to see him, I hope." Much against her will she gave the invitation, which was accepted with alacrity. So it came about that the friendship between the two men, begun in the far East, was renewed on the banks of the Nile. Day after day Mr. Elmore sought out Stuart, and inevitably the party of three Americans became a party of four, of whom one was a Scotchman, an arrangement which did not terminate with their sojourn in Cairo, for when they left for Rome Stuart went with them.

Poor Eleanor felt the tightening of the cords that were slowly drawing her and Stuart nearer together. She saw her father's evident pleasure in their proximity. What could she do? Any day she might have sent him away, but she dreaded the effect upon her father. So she allowed the cords to tighten, hoping that something for which she should not be responsible would snap them, while each day she knew more surely that Malcolm Stuart loved her. But fate was kind to her wary game of preventing his declaration. Before the one thought that filled Stuart's heart had had opportunity to be spoken, telegrams summoned him imperatively home.

CHAPTER XVIII.

WRECKED BANK—RESTORED MAN

"BEEN HUNTIN' all over town fer you, mister." The messenger handed in the telegram at the door of Ansley Jickers's office, presented his book to be signed and departed after the manner of his kind. Bradford Horton tore open the yellow envelope deliberately. He had stopped in at the lawyer's office for a half hour's talk on the day before the closing of his second seminary year. He read the message, whistled gently and passed the paper to his friend.

"My trip to Georgian bay has vanished, Ansley," he remarked ruefully. "You may have the trout I was to catch."

The attorney read the brief statement of the telegram: "Come home at once. Bank wrecked. Cashier dead. Family ruined.—Conrad Vanderbosch." "Short but comprehensive," was his comment. "Who's Vanderbosch?"

"My brother-in-law."

"Cashier dead, eh? Thief, probably. Was that the bank Henry Horton founded?"

"Yes."

"Will you lose anything by the failure?"

"No, but the estate is ruined. It was never divided."

THE HOME COUNCIL

Where the Sunshine Never Fails

By Sarah Cory Rippey

If you were a business girl, eating your heart out with loneliness in rooming or boarding house, how could you get some real home cheer? Some Chicago women have found a way to answer that question, and are bringing the home spirit into the lives of many of their lonely sisters

THE SUN IS NOT to be depended on in downtown Chicago. Though it may smile reluctantly, now and then, down into the canon streets, it is likely at any moment to hide itself in a veil of cloud, or to slip out of sight behind the tall buildings. In one corner of downtown Chicago, however, the sunshine never fails. If you were to enter the new Powers building, in South Wabash avenue, take the elevator to the tenth floor and there enter the rooms of the Central Eleanor Club, you would find yourself at once in an atmosphere of cheer so radiant and of welcome so heartily friendly that, no matter how dark the day, you would feel yourself warmed through and through with that sort of sunshine which is entirely independent of external conditions. And if it happened that you were a business girl, away from home and dependent on the good—or sorry—graces of boarding or rooming house for cheer, and discovered yourself in the midst of real home surroundings such as your hungry heart had longed for through months of isolation—well, unless you have been a business girl suffering from "home-ache" in a big city you can't quite realize just what the Central Eleanor Club is accomplishing in the manufacture of sunshine.

* * * * *

There is in Chicago a noble woman who is giving her life to promoting the interests and welfare of business girls. This woman is Miss Ina Law Robertson. The Continent published three years ago an account of what she had at that time accomplished, through the Eleanor Club homes, for the proper feeding and housing of girls with modest salaries; and through the Eleanor camp at Lake Geneva in the way of providing them with a summer outing within their means.

To operate five homes (a sixth constructed with a special view to making it a neighborhood social center, is to be opened in the fall) with accommodations for 450 girls, and a summer camp, would seem to be sufficient accomplishment for one woman; but still Miss Robertson was not satisfied. She had come to see that even with 450 girls provided for the mass of business women remained unreached by her efforts. What about those hundreds of other girls, tired, perhaps isolated, and away from home? What about all the girls who needed recreation and diversion and couldn't get it, in any honest way, because every penny must be made to do the work of two? What about the after-business hours? What about the long, long Sundays, so interminable in the big city if one is alone? In a word, after the Eleanor clubs and the camp, what?

Miss Robertson was not long in finding the answer to her own question. The next logical development of the work of the Eleanor association must be a place, conveniently located, where business girls and women—all business girls and women—might, if they chose, come together for a bit of sociability and relaxation.

The Powers building opened hospitable doors to the plan and the new club found within an abiding place; with plenty of space for assembly, rest and dressing rooms—and kitchenette, for though meals were no part of the plan, social cups of tea were.

Walls were tinted, rugs laid and curtains hung in a restful harmony of green and brown. Some fine Japanese prints were hung on the walls, lights were softened with Japanese shades, the long library table was heaped with all the best of the current magazines, a piano was brought up and pushed into its place, comfortable, roomy chairs were scattered about invitingly, couches were arranged in the restroom and the thousand and one touches given which transform a mere place into a home.

All was in readiness for the opening reception on New Year's afternoon, when fire broke out in the building. But the guiding Providence of all the Eleanor work remembered the prayers and the pains which had gone into this new project; remembered, too, the business girl and her needs, and the Central Eleanor Club rooms were saved. The reception took place and busy downtown Chicago entered upon another year with a little place of peace rooted in its very heart.

* * * * *

Two months have passed since then. That the club in these two months has grown to a membership of 480, with 420 active and sixty supporting members, tells a conclusive story of its appeal and the eagerness with which those for whom it was established are taking advantage of its manifold benefits. These benefits are placed within the abilities of even a low salary by the almost nominal fee of $1 a year. This means active membership, with use of reading, rest and dressing rooms, telephone and information bureau conveniences, and the freedom of the clubrooms every weekday until 9:30, and on Sundays from 2 until 9:30 in the evening. One of the secretaries of the association is always in charge to welcome the young women who care to come. Active membership is open to business women only. Supporting membership, with a fee of $3 a year, is extended to all friends of the work.

Miss Ina Law Robertson

Although Chicago, with its constantly broadening spirit of social service, has had an ever lengthening outreach toward the less fortunate among her men and women, and her boys and girls, she has never awakened to two very crying needs—the need of a downtown waiting and rest room for women, to whom, after business hours, only hotels and depots have hitherto been open; and its sister need of a place where, properly chaperoned, young women who live in boarding and rooming houses might receive their men friends. It was left to a woman to recognize these needs and to supply them. Miss Robertson has found in her work that young women fall easily into the habit of entertaining in their rooms because they have no other place to entertain, and because "the other girls all do it." This practice is frequently the first letting down of the bars of self-respect and reserve, the first step aside from the paths of rectitude.

* * * * *

Sunday afternoons—well, those Eleanor Sabbaths must be experienced to be appreciated. No mere words can do justice to the very beautiful spirit of fellowship and cheer which pervades them, with their soft light, their hum of happy voices, their music, their hominess—and their tea! If you, a stranger, were to slip into the club some Sunday afternoon carrying, perhaps, a heart scarred with the seeming coldness and indifference of the big city, you would be whisked out of yourself so quickly that you would wonder, presently, how it had felt to be lonely and shut out from gladness.

You would be ushered into the big, cozy room and introduced and made a real "Eleanor," with a one-of-us feeling which would start some sunshine going on its own account. For that's what Miss Robertson wants especially to do—to bring about a condition of friendliness among her "girls," as she lovingly calls the Eleanors, which shall find expression in giving as each has herself received.

By and by perhaps you would like to slip into one of the big chairs and just "look on." You would see a goodly sprinkling of men among the groups or chatting tete-a-tete with some girl friend. You would see a number of members buried in newspapers and magazines, one or two writing, and a few others like yourself doing nothing but just being happy.

At 4 o'clock the musical, which is an unfailing Sunday feature, would begin, with perhaps a little talk or lecture by some person of prominence following. Then you would sip your tea, brought in fragrant and steaming from the kitchenette, and nibble a wafer or two, and chat a bit more. After it was all over and you had gone out into the night you would carry back to that little solitary room of yours the consciousness that never more would you be alone in the big city. You had found friends.

* * * * *

A fern stands upon the desk of one of the secretaries.

"I can work so much better," she explains, "if there is something growing beside me."

Unconsciously the secretary struck the keynote of the Central Eleanor Club. Growth is the very essence of its spirit—growth in friendship, in sisterliness, in mutual helpfulness, in happiness, in all that makes for a sweeter, finer living. There is to be growth, too, in the club itself if Miss Robertson and her assisting boards realize their further dream of enlarged space and scope. It is their hope that in time the Central Eleanor Club will reach the status of the regular woman's club.

In this Central Eleanor Club, as in the other Eleanor work, no denominational lines are drawn. That the business girl is still just a girl, with all a girl's needs, is the only passport to membership that she must have. All of the Eleanor work, however, is carried on in the spirit of Christ; and though, because of fear of alienation, the subject of religion is never broached, Miss Robertson's longing is that the Christ spirit may be so thoroughly in and through and about the work that her girls may unconsciously grow into the image of that One who "went about doing good."

The Central Eleanor Club has come to stay. There seems, in the forward look, no limit to the field of its usefulness and accomplishment. But if it never does anything more than just to be the place where the sunshine never fails it will fully justify its existence.

From a Pupil's Viewpoint

An examiner once visited a large school of some importance in the north of England. Among other questions he asked, "What is the cause of dew?"

No one could answer.

"Come," said the examiner encouragingly, "surely someone knows something about it."

At last one of the pupils got up. "The earth," he said, "turns on its axis once in every twenty-four hours with such rapidity that it perspires and produces dew."

The examiner closed the proceedings right there.

YOUNG AMERICA

The Man Who Made Christ His Hero

BY RUTH G. WINANT

ONE EVENING a 10-year-old boy walked into a shop in Blantyre, Scotland. He had been working all day, spinning in a cotton mill, and he must have been tired; but there was something he wanted very much to buy, and when a boy wants something very much he is never too tired to go after it.

"Please, sir," he said politely to the shopkeeper, "I want 'Ruddiman's Rudiments of Latin.'" You see he was not just an ordinary boy. No ordinary boy of 10 would be wanting to buy such a book as that. The shopkeeper rummaged about among his books till he found the one the boy wanted and handed it to him. The boy placed a shilling in the man's hand and went out, leaving the old shopkeeper wondering what a mill hand wanted of "learning." But that was because he didn't know who this little mill hand was. It was David Livingstone, born 100 years ago this month.

The next morning when David went to the mill at 6, as he did every morning for his fourteen hours of work, he carried his precious book with him, perched it up on top of the spinning frame and said Latin verbs over and over to himself as he moved to and fro at his work. He had had to leave school to help take care of his family, but he intended to get an education just the same. When the whistle blew in the evening he stopped his work and trudged up to the old schoolhouse on the hill, where the master helped him over the hard places; and then when he went home he studied until his mother took away his light. He did this every day and that is the way he got his early education.

But David liked to do other things, too, and he loved his vacation days as well as his books; for he was naturally an out-of-doors boy, and he was happy wandering over the hills and moors, lunching on roots and wild berries and gathering ferns and mosses, insects and stones, and shells along the banks of the Clyde.

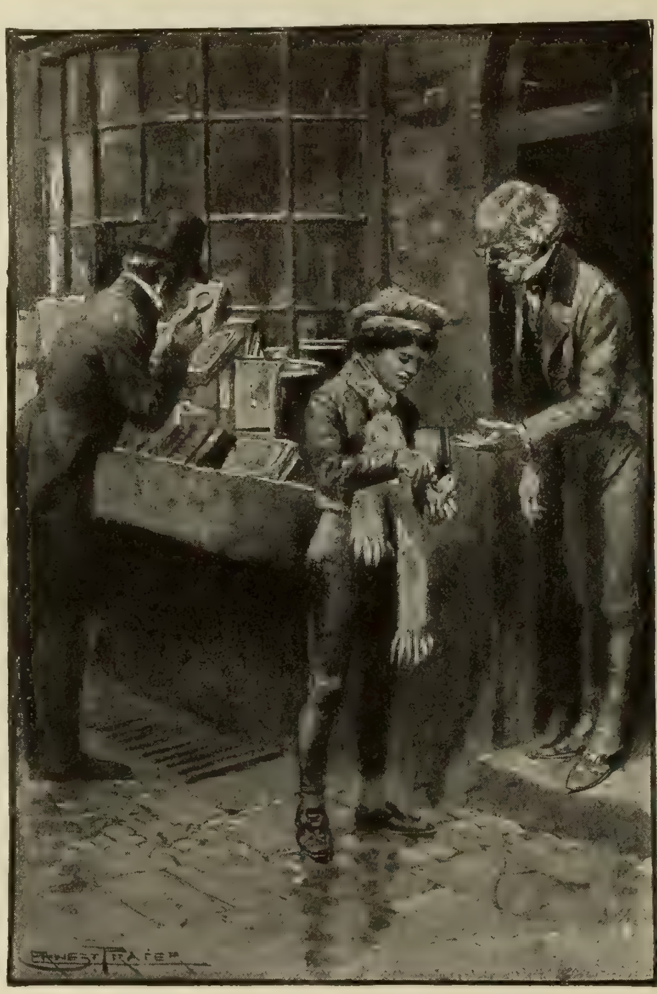
One day he took his brother Charles for a tramp, and they went fishing for trout. To his great surprise David caught not a trout but a salmon. He was dismayed, for salmon fishing was not allowed by law at that time of the year. At the same time he didn't want to lose so good a supper, and so he hid the fish in his brother's baggy trouser leg. This, of course, gave Charles a very queer shape, and everybody felt sorry for the poor child with the swollen leg!

As David grew older he began to think more and more about Christ, who was his hero, and about the missionaries who were teaching heathen people to think about him; and one day he decided that he would only keep enough of his wages to live on and would give the rest to missions. Finally he went farther than that; he said: "I will give myself. I will be a missionary."

He felt that he could do better work as a missionary if he learned also to be a doctor; so he saved his money until he had enough to enter the College of Physicians and Surgeons in Glasgow in 1836. There he lived just as cheaply as he possibly could, and instead of riding, walked wherever he went to save fare. He also took some studies in Anderson's College.

He wanted to go as a missionary to China, and to prepare for this special work he entered the London Missionary Society Training School. Here he learned how to prepare sermons, which he preached later in some small church. His first attempt to preach was disastrous. He forgot his sermon, and with an abrupt, "Friends, I have forgotten all I had to say," he hurried out of the pulpit and left the building.

When he finished his missionary training there was trouble in China, which made it impossible, after all, for him to go there; but when he heard from Robert Moffat of South Africa of a thousand villages to the north of his station at Kuruman where no missionary had ever been, he decided that Africa needed him just as much as China, and to Africa he determined to go.



"The boy placed a shilling in the man's hand"

He received his medical degree, was ordained in London in November, 1840, and set sail for Africa Dec. 10.

The voyage took three months, and on shipboard Livingstone continued to study, learning how to use the mariners' compass, to measure altitudes and to make observations by the moon, all of which would be useful to him in the almost unknown continent to which he was going.

He landed at Algoa bay and traveled 700 miles, on foot and in ox carts without springs, straight to Kuruman. But the thousand villages called and he went on to Lepelole, where he lived among the Bakuena people (people of the crocodile) for six months, learning their language and ways, but without seeing a single white man. Then he went to the Bakhatla (people of the monkey), and everywhere he told the story of the Master he loved so well. Everywhere, too, he saw the wicked slave traffic and did what he could to check it.

At Mobotsa the people were greatly troubled by lions. Both men and animals had been killed by the mighty "king of beasts." Cows and sheep had been taken from the flock in broad daylight, and the people were too afraid to do any effectual hunting. Livingtone and his servant, Mebalwe, set out with guns to try to kill the largest lion, knowing that the others would leave the place if their king were dead. The lions were on a little hill covered with trees. The hill was surrounded by natives. Mebalwe saw the big lion and fired. He missed him, and the lion broke through the circle and escaped, two others escaping with him. The people had started for home, when Livingstone saw the big beast sitting behind a tree on the end of the hill. He fired both barrels into the lion's body and the big beast, wounded and infuriated, sprang upon him as he stopped to reload, caught his shoulder and shook him as a terrier does a rat, both of them coming to the ground together.

Mebalwe reloaded and fired, and the lion, hit again, turned to attack Livingstone's servant; but another native rushed up and speared the lion, which at last fell dead. The great animal had crushed the upper bone in Livingstone's left arm, however, and it was by this splintered bone that Livingstone's body was identified over a quarter of a century later when it was brought to England for burial.

At Mobotsa Livingstone taught the boys, and here he brought Mary Moffat, his bride, and she started teaching the girls. Here Livingstone made bricks for his house and built it almost entirely with his own hands. Long years of missionary labor followed. From Mobotsa to Chonuane he went, and thence to Kolobeng. To open a way to the coast became one of Livingstone's great ambitions. Lake Ngami was his first big "find." His wife and children had to be sent to England, as the traveling was too hard for them and it was not safe to leave them.

When the path across the continent had been found in 1856 Livingstone came home to his wife and children, and to his old mother. His father had died during his first term of service in the dark continent.

England made much of him, and when he went back as the servant of the Royal Geographical Society he carried the heart of England with him. This was in 1858. His wife and youngest son accompanied him. A year later his wife died. After her death Livingstone went farther and farther in his explorations, and while traveling he wrote a book about his discoveries.

In 1864 Livingstone again went to England, when he was received by Queen Victoria and listened to by thousands of people eager to hear of his explorations. Then he went back to Africa and after a time was lost to the world. People became very anxious about him, fearing something might have happened to him, and finally Henry M. Stanley was sent by The New York Herald to find him.

How he did it is a wonderful story, but only the result can be told. One morning in 1871 Livingstone, who had been lost to the world for years, heard that an Englishman was in Ujiji. One day Stanley saw him coming toward him.

"Dr. Livingstone, I presume?" he asked, raising his hat.

"Yes," replied Livingstone with a kind smile, lifting his own hat slightly.

"I thank God, doctor," cried Stanley, "that I have been permitted to see you."

"I feel thankful that I am here to welcome

Signs of the Times

The Autobiography of an Individualist, by James O. Fagan. Mr. Fagan is a born American even if he did happen actually to be born in Scotland, and in spite of the fact that he delayed coming to his predestined home until after he had had a turn at South Africa. Known to a large American public by his unique and human articles on various aspects of railroad life and work, and by the fact that while he wrote these and other essays he still kept up the routine duties of a railroad signal tower man, James O. Fagan has carved out for himself a unique place in contemporary American literature. His autobiography will add to his reputation, for in it he reveals simply, quietly and with an unerring instinct for the vital, the important and the crucial, the story of how he came to be a railroad man, a writer of sane thoughts excellently well expressed and a Christian gentleman. He shows how in this growth the idea of personal responsibility has ever been the decisive factor; and, in the light of the relation between the workers and this idea, exhibits the present industrial situation in America. He shows how the labor unions have failed to appreciate its importance, and he considers that, in the renaissance of democracy and civic health which he sees coming, society will curb the activities of these bodies. He is weakest, however, on the very point where the industrial pressure now centers, namely, on the injustice and actual cruelty visited on the sweated and half-sweated trades where a lack of organization has left the workers at the mercy of men who are not Christian, not humane, but only efficient mechanically. Individualism is just as important as Mr. Fagan says it is, but it is only in amicable reaction with its antithesis, socialism, that the synthesis of our future society can come about. Courts, Criminals and the Camorra, by Arthur Train. The author of this book was formerly an assistant district attorney in New York City, and so we may assume that he speaks with authority and accuracy in this pleasantly written collection of stories on the most unpleasant of themes—human depravity. He leads us from the inside workings of the district attorney's office during the preparation of a criminal trial to the study of the various motives which induce American men and women to commit murder, with many sidelights on the successes and failures of the jury system. In the latter part of his book he gives us the history of the deadly Italian organization known as the Camorra. Speaking of the recent trial of the Camorrists at Naples, he is rather pessimistic as to its effect; for whatever the ultimate fate of the prisoners on trial, the publicity of the whole affair, in Mr. Train's opinion, will give the society "a new standing and an increased fascination for the unemployed youth of Naples." Conservatives will read with surprise that the political services of the Camorra have always been engaged by the conservative parties. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.75 net.

Religious Works of Note

The Greatest English Classic, by Cleland B. McAfee. This is a volume of lectures delivered by Dr. McAfee before the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences while he was still pastor of Lafayette Avenue church in Brooklyn borough of Greater New York. So far as The Continent knows, the book had absolutely nothing to do with the later selection of Dr. McAfee for the chair which he now holds in the McCormick Theological Seminary in Chicago, but with the general public, if judgment of the author's fitness to be a theological instructor is to rest on this exhibit of his talents and spirit, there ought to be no question of a unanimous vote in his favor. The marks of crystal-clear thinking and of a broad and accurate scholarship are all here, but more important than these considerations are the tokens of a sane and steady Christian faith fixed in a mind alert to all the realities of the modern time. Dr. McAfee's lectures are neither conservative nor radical, but so fair to both viewpoints and so comprehensive of the strength of each extreme that neither party could deny him appreciation. As for the book itself, it is sufficient to say that its tribute to the English Bible is compelling enough to make any intelligent man or woman ashamed of not knowing better that "greater classic." Nothing more efficient than this could be put into the hands of a young man or young woman whom parents feel to be too little interested in the Scriptures. Such a young person, if he has even the slightest degree of reading habit, will not be able to resist finishing these lectures, and will not have read them through before he has gone back to the Bible with new respect and new zest. Democracy and the Church, by Samuel George Smith. Dr. Smith is one of our foremost and sanest students of sociology and approaches the subject from the standpoint of well grounded Christian optimism. He starts out with the recognition of Jesus as the author of our modern ideals of democracy, and the church as the historic institution for securing their realization. The opening chapter is on "Jesus and Democracy," and is followed by one on "Primitive Christianity," in which the influence of the gospel upon the life and social system of its first interpreters is carefully traced. Then follows a series of studies in papacy, the social revival in Italy and the upheavals of the reformation. In this part of the work Dr. Smith is particularly strong as setting forth the reformation in its sociological as well as in its theological aspects; modern Christianity is studied, and the book closes with an inspiring chapter on the "Democracy of Tomorrow." Dr. Smith looks squarely into the face of the present social unrest and the economic ills which make predictions difficult. He treats with full sympathy the passionate demand for social and economic justice, but he avoids the fatal and popular error of much modern sociology which has as its axiom the belief that mere physical comfort is all that the world needs to bring in the millennium. Dr. Smith is an optimist because his philosophy is profoundly Christian. We commend this as a sane, strong and illuminating work, the product of a mature and well balanced mind. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.50 net.

The Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church, by Henry Barclay Swete. Dr. Swete holds among scholars an enviable record for a series of historical and critical works of the most practically helpful type. In this volume he makes a special study of the development of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, as well as of the process of the incorporation of this doctrine in the ancient creeds. Beginning with the simple facts discoverable in the Scriptures (especially the New Testament), he traces belief and discussion regarding the personality and the work of the Holy Spirit through the whole of the ancient period down to the time of the final rupture between the eastern and western churches on the question of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father "and the Son." Dr. Swete's investigation is certainly scientific and thorough. He examines the work of all the ancient fathers of the church, both Greek and Latin, reproduces their thought and justifies his interpretation of their views by adequate quotations. He carefully distinguishes the several problems that emerge in the course of the discussion and gives his attention to each separately. No modern reconstruction of the Christian idea of the Trinity, or of the Holy Spirit and his work, can afford to neglect the valuable results brought into view by the eminent English scholar. [Macmillan Company, New York. $3 net.

The Problem of Religion, by Emil Karl Wilm. Professor Wilm's viewpoint is that of the philosopher. The idea of supernatural revelation is totally outside of his purview; nor does he believe that progress in religion is facilitated by the idea of revelation. On the contrary, it is confused and entangled in a network of misleading associations. This way of looking at the subject is not an entirely new one. Professor Wilm, however, follows it according to his own peculiar inclinations and tendency. He believes in religion and he believes in its philosophical vindication. With these two positions firmly fixed he works out the problem. His philosophy is that of the idealist, and the idealist position he states with unusual clearness. The whole tone of the work is reverent and pervaded by a wholesome optimism. Professor Wilm answers the practical question, "Is there moral progress?" with a vigorous and well sustained affirmative. Problems of Marriage and Social Hygiene Race Improvement or Eugenics, by La Reine Helen Baker. Teachers, ministers, professional men in general and parents in particular ought to be informed concerning the modern movement to improve the race by eugenic methods. It is amazing that thousands of American physicians, with recent degrees from reputable medical colleges, have never even heard of this scientific movement. So dense an ignorance among men whose business it is to keep abreast of useful knowledge in their own field is an index of the pitiable unenlightenment that obtains among the laity. America as the dumping ground of foreigners representing a serious biological invasion of this new land, and America as the home of insidious race-destroying diseases, ought to welcome instruction in eugenics. And here is a little book that will serve admirably to instruct. The author has set down the main theories of the new science and proved their vital relationship to modern life. As the subtitle reads, it is "a little book on a great subject." [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $1 net.

Sex Education, by Ira S. Wile. Everywhere the trend of education as regards sex problems is toward an end that shall emphasize the importance of prophylaxis, and at the same time stimulate an intelligent interest in the sex instincts as basal factors of a virile civilization. Obviously some form of instruction in this subject is demanded as a corrective of the racial conditions to which vice and disease have given rise in this country. But up to this time no definite scheme of popularizing established facts has been proposed. Dr. Wile's book was written, as he avows, "for the purpose of assisting parents to banish the difficulties and to suggest a program for developing a course of instruction." And to those who believe in sex education, as it is understood today by eugenists and their less rational coworkers, his book should prove helpful. [Duffield and Company, New York. $1 net.

Marriage: Its Ethic and Religion, by P. T. Forsyth, was delivered as a lecture before the National Council of Public Morals in England. Beginning with the broad distinction between the bearings of marriage on individual conduct, on society and on religion, the author expounds the Christian view as insisting on monogamy, permanency and an ethical character. He then proceeds to deal some vigorous blows at the doctrine of "leasehold marriage," and closes with a vigorous plea for proper regard of the deepest interests involved in the marriage covenant. The message is a much-needed one, and it is to be hoped that Dr. Forsyth's words will find not only wide circulation but most earnest consideration. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

How to Tell the Story of Life, by T. W. Shannon. This is only a tiny pamphlet, but it will be worth a great deal to mothers who have come to share the modern feeling that children should know something of the origin of their own existence, but in their inexperience do not know how to reveal the delicate secret properly. Here are four short chapters leading up to its revelation which any mother can follow as a straight road into the inner sanctuaries of a child's reverence. [T. W. THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

March 16, 1913—The Test of Abraham's Faith

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Genesis 22:1-19. Golden Text, Hosea 6:6: I desire goodness, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings.

It may be difficult to detect the relation between our last lesson and this. One week ago we saw Abraham standing in the highway, and looking toward Sodom, whose smoke darkened the plain like the smoke of a furnace. Today we see him face to face with the great test of his faith.

But two things have happened in the patriarch's life, both of which have much to do with his subsequent history—the birth of Ishmael and the birth of Isaac. The former was the son of Hagar, an Egyptian servant, while the latter was the son of Sarah and the child of promise. Ishmael, being the older, according to Oriental custom was in the line of inheritance, a position destined of God for Isaac, the younger son. The result was that Ishmael was expelled and Isaac installed in his place.

Apparent Injustice to Ishmael Proves to Be Blessing in Disguise

The change involved no injustice. God calls no man to a service for which he has no fitness. Ishmael was designed to hold a great place among the nations of the earth, but his future and that of Isaac lay in different directions. Each had his own work and each must follow the bent of his own life. Ishmael remained in the wilderness and succeeded as a hunter. Better do that than fail as a shepherd. Failure is largely due to a lack of adaptation between the man and his work. Jonathan had a place on the field of battle, but his son, lame on his feet, could serve his country best at home. The lesson sometimes comes too late. Many a one has entered upon his life's work, only to know that saddest of all awakenings, the difference between an occupation and a calling.

God could not have done Ishmael a kinder service than to exclude him from among the fathers of the church. It may have seemed unjust, but God is never unjust. Our severest hardships may be mercies in disguise. Moses dies on Nebo in sight of the promised land, but is not permitted to enter. It must have been a staggering blow to the lawgiver, and how he pleaded against it! But his Friend above knew best, and the things that his servant could do had been done. Another life lay beyond the Jordan, and Joshua, not he, was able to live it. Nebo was more merciful than the slaughter fields of Canaan. His mission had become rest. Death solves life.

Abraham Suffers Supreme Test of His Faith in God

Abraham at this time must have been happy and contented. The ambition of his life had been attained. He was rich and powerful. An army of servants stood ready to execute his commands, and his flocks grazed on a hundred hills. Every passion of his soul had been gratified, and in Isaac lay a future still more glorious.

One day the patriarch seems to have been in a revery, or possibly a day dream, when the voice of God broke in upon his soul, "Abraham." His response was prompt, "Here am I." "Take now thy son, thine only son, whom thou lovest, even Isaac, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of." That was one of the hardest tests ever laid upon a father's heart. All the forces of justice, honor and truth must have seemed in opposition. A hundred reasons could be urged against it. Human sacrifices were not unknown to the patriarch, but they belonged to the heathen, and had no part in Jehovah's service. Moreover, God had assured him that a multitude countless as the very stars were to perpetuate his name through the line of Isaac. His death meant the obliteration of the one God, and that the world would be left to stagger on in the darkness of its own despair. And that other argument, before which all else was dumb—a father's love—must have appealed with trumpet tongue to spare his life. But whatever the patriarch may have thought, he said nothing and only prepared to obey. Men of action always have the least to say.

That three days' journey is one of the most pathetic incidents in all history. Isaac must have been more than 20 years of age, quite old enough to know that something unusual was about to take place; but he made no inquiry until the end was reached. That journey is typical of human life. Our heaviest burdens are borne in silence. God and we ourselves alone know what they are.

At last Abraham and Isaac reach the summit of the hill and the final test has come. Just which was the stronger, father or son, it would be difficult to say. Josephus, the Jewish historian, gives a fancied discussion between the two, but some things are only weakened by words, and this is one. Again the voice is heard: "Abraham, Abraham . . . lay not thy hand upon the lad, neither do thou anything unto him, for now I know that thou fearest God." There is no joy like that of reaction. Abraham and Isaac must have been nearer each other ever after. Together they had gone through the furnace and together they rejoiced on the other side. Abraham had lived the sacrifice. Those three days included all that might have come.

Substitute for Isaac Type of the One Great Substitute

Suffering involves more than the mere test of faith. It either makes character or unmakes it. It does not reveal us to God, but it may reveal God to us. Abraham went down from Moriah with a faith in God such as he had never felt before. Isaac had been saved, but a sacrifice was not wanting upon the mountain. The ram caught in the thicket was but a type of that other Substitute, slain for the salvation of men. The shadows of this incident are flung forward and find their reality at the cross. Isaac is a figurative ancestor of the Christ. The only son of his father, he laid himself upon the altar ready to die at the command of God. God spared the sacrifice, but the Lamb of God suffered in his stead.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins.

Analysis—By a brief, personal, agonizing experience Abraham is taught the difference between the religion of Jehovah and the religion of the nations around him. This lesson brings out also the characteristics of faith and the loving nature of the true God.

To understand the test to which Abraham was put we must know something of his environment and something of the temptations to which that environment subjected him.

In nearly all religions of the Orient, and in some also of the Occident, as in Mexico under Aztec rule, human sacrifices were considered the only acceptable evidence of complete surrender to the gods. Sir William Ramsay tells us in his recent volume that he never knew a native of Asia Minor to erect even a hut without killing something whose blood was poured over the foundations to insure the favor of the invisible powers. Excavators at Gezer, in southern Palestine, have found under the corner stone of a principal building, supposed to be the palace of the king, the skeleton of a child whose remains still bore evidence of its sacrificial death by the knife. Even in the days of Micah, 1,200 years later than Abraham's day, it was a question whether one's first-born was not the most acceptable sacrifice one could bring to the altar of the invisible powers (Micah 6:7).

Incident Brings Out Character of True Faith and Nature of Divine Tenderness

It is probable that more than once Abraham had seen the Canaanites offer human sacrifices, and God would now, in the experience of the Father of all the faithful, repudiate such offerings and show the divine abhorrence of them. In a way never to be forgotten this characteristic of so many false religions was to be forever banned by the religion of the Bible. Moses had to legislate 500 years later against this perversion of piety (Lev. 20:2).

Verse 1—Among the various English words which have changed their meaning the word "tempt" should be noted, because at the time our commonly accepted version was made it was used frequently for "examine," "try," "test." In the case of Abraham it means something of what we mean today by "the third degree," the bringing out a man's real character by painful process. The call of Jehovah is divinely simple, and the answer of Abraham, "Here am I," a model of soldierly brevity and readiness.

Verse 2—The command which was given Abraham, in view of the practices which were everywhere round him, would not seem strange to him, although it would seem impossible to us. But it would not seem so to us had not God used Abraham to root human sacrifice forever out of anything claiming to be a Bible religion. When we remember all the horrible penances which mediæval confessors imposed upon penitent and conscience stricken souls we may easily believe that except for this very story, so graphically told, human sacrifice might yet have found its place and its defenders among Christian teachers as the highest possible form of self-surrender.

Faith Tested and Known by Its Promptness and Simplicity

Verse 3—One may readily believe that Abraham "rose early" on this fateful morn. We are told by the inspired writer in the New Testament that Abraham believed God would somehow raise him up from the dead (Heb. 11:19). But that does not lower the value of the act of obedience.

Verse 4—The length of the journey prolonged the mental strain under which Abraham was placed. The site of the altar was doubtless, as tradition reports, the site of the temple which Solomon was later to build. It doubtless was already marked by previous use as one of the "high" and holy places of Palestine.

Verse 5—But Abraham would not make a show of his religion. He was accompanied by servants who could not understand him or his motives. He left them below. There are times when we get nearest God if farthest removed from men. Abraham's words to his servants imply that he did not expect to return alone.

Verse 6—As fire had to be laboriously produced or else carried from place to place, Abraham reserved to himself the safe conveyance of the necessary flame. Upon Isaac as the younger the heavier burden was placed. The father, too, may have been conscious that his waning nervous strength would not be sufficient for this task. The presence of the knife was to him a horror, but he would not forego it.

Verse 7—The very limit of endurance was reached when his own son asked what he was to do for a lamb!

Verse 8—In the evasive answer speaks the father and the saint. Many a parent now living can recall some hour in which he has been called to pass through a trial well nigh as severe; an hour when the life of a loved child lay trembling in the balance, and when God supported the parent through the hour of uncertain issue.

Pain for Pain's Sake Not Part of True Religion

Verse 10—Old soldiers of the great civil war will recall hours in which the issue was squarely before them, Will you face your fate or flinch from it? Happy the man who can now look back and say, I never refused to go where sent, or to stand where placed, or to perform any feat, however hazardous, when commanded.

Verse 11—God is very near to those who are faithful to duty as they understand it. God will not permit us to be tried beyond what he will give us grace to bear. Abraham had reached the limit of his endurance and had not faltered. Now by one word he is set free to follow the impulses of his affection. Isaac is restored to him. The sacrifice is completed. He has acted the man and the saint, and through him the world has learned that the cruel sacrifices which other religions demand have no part in the religion of the Bible.

The use we should make of this lesson today is to impress upon our minds that God does not value sacrifice for the sake of pain. Sacrifice has its purpose, its healing purpose, its consoling purpose to men conscious of guilt; but pain for pain's sake is no part of religion as taught in either the Old Testament or the New.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning March 9, 1913

Topic—The importunate friend. Luke 11:5-8.

This parable teaches us the importance of insistence in prayer. Indeed no man truly prays who is not in deadly earnest about it. One great secret of effectual prayer is that we should vehemently desire those things for which we pray, so that we will wait upon God with an unswerving importunity until we obtain them.

John had taught his disciples to pray. The rabbis ordinarily taught theirs. It was a recognized part of the duty of a religious teacher to teach his disciples to pray. We do not know what John the Baptist taught his disciples, but the prayer that Jesus gave has become inseparable from Christian worship everywhere, and has been the chief expression of Christian devotion.

But there is more to know about prayer than its true formula; there is also the right understanding of its spirit. For men cannot pray simply by repeating the words of prayer, even though these words are given by Jesus himself. They must also pray with the soul's faith and devotion. So Jesus follows up his impartation of the form of worship with this little parable, in which he teaches them that they must persevere in their petition.

The likeness to his other parable of the unjust judge is obvious. In both he urges perseverance in calling upon God. But all the parables of Jesus are distinctive. And between these two there is a difference. In this parable the cry is for sustenance, in the later one it is for the rendering of a delayed justice.

Why does God delay answers to prayers? Because he is like the selfish friend who does not want to be troubled to render a service in the night? This is certainly no part of the meaning of the parable. The argument is from the less to the greater. If importunity can move even a selfish neighbor to rise in the night and grant a favor, how much more can it move our heavenly Father who is always waiting to give good gifts unto his children. God sometimes delays the bestowal of his gift, because he desires that our faith should be exercised, our efforts increased, our powers developed, by our continuing steadfastly in the attitude of devotion.

This has been one characteristic method of God's spiritual dispensation in every age. Jacob wrestled with the angel until the day dawned. For him it was the greatest battle of his soul's history, and to the end of his days Jacob bore in his own body the memorial of that conflict.

The Canaanitish woman is another, and very different, instance of importunity in prayer. When she asked Jesus to heal her daughter who was possessed of a demon, at first he seemed to be quite indifferent, and afterwards almost rough with her. But she persisted, and won from him not only healing for her daughter but an encomium of her own great faith.

And Jesus himself is our great example of importunity in waiting upon God. How often in his life we read that he went out into the mountains to pray. And then he would spend a whole night in prayer. Away into some lonely ridge of the hills that surround the blue sea of Galilee he went, or out into a spur of the Hermon range, where in the majestic solitude of the night, beneath the silent stars, he poured forth his soul unto his Father, and received the grace to sustain him in the midst of the sins and sicknesses of the lower world.

God knows our need; he hears our cry. And if he seems sometimes to be indifferent to our petition he is simply searching us and tempering our faith, that we may trust him more implicitly. There is a mystery in his delay. The cry of the suffering saints goes up to his throne, "O Lord, how long?" It is part of the whole great mystery of his forbearance of any evil in his universe. He is not indifferent; he is love. We doubt not but that God suffers more than we do in the delay of the answer to our prayer. And if the night is dark, the dawning of his morning will be glorious. We have only to continue in prayer and be patient.

It is a suggestive touch in the story that the whole transaction is in the night. It is entirely true to Oriental custom, where, owing to the great heat of the midday, the travelers often make their journey late into the darkness. The friend arrived in the night, weary and hungry; and his host, in accordance with good Oriental custom, went out to try to borrow bread from his neighbor.

But his neighbor liked comfort. He was carefully wrapped up, with his family, in the wide bed over the oven. He did not want to disturb the bed clothes, or lose the heat, or be bothered by anybody about anything. But neither does a comfortable man like to have an importunate neighbor knocking at his door and keeping it up. So he rose and, once out of bed, gave him the loaves he had need of.

Thus insistent should we be in making our desires known to God. We should pray in season and out of season. Rather the parable teaches that there is no unseasonable time for praying. When our need is, then should we pray.

And we are to pray with the utmost earnestness, believing that we shall receive. This does not mean that we are to use the senseless repetitions of the heathen, who think that they shall be heard for their much asking. We might just as well set up a Chinese praying wheel and allow it to save us our trouble. But true prayer is intense. It is hard labor. It is the hardest labor that can tax the powers of man. It engrosses all the heart, and soul, and mind, and strength of the man who wrestles with God until the day dawns.

The man who went to his neighbor's house knocked. This word indicates the climax of vehement importunity on the part of the disciple who prays. "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. For everyone that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." We may begin by asking and find that this is not enough. Then we seek, until our growing insistency demands that we knock. In such a spirit of increasing entreaty, and waxing boldness, would Jesus have us approach unto our heavenly Father.

And if prayer means anything in our New Testament, it means that when we pray we ask for something which we are to secure through prayer. Distinct, specific petitions are to be addressed to God, and he will give us direct answers. We will never know how many things are brought to pass through prayer—never, at least, until our faith becomes sight, and we know as we are known.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

March 16, 1913

Topic—How may every Sabbath be "the Lord's day"? Jeremiah 17:21-27.

Is there anywhere on the page of human record a more idyllic picture than that of the old-fashioned American Sabbath—the rest day, the worship day, the home day? On that day the workaday garb was laid aside and "Sunday clothes" were donned. All the everyday machinery of life was stilled and the busy vocations of the week were doffed, and a new state of mind was put on. Hurry gave way to leisure, and work to rest. A hush that seemed physical settled upon nature. People's thoughts tended toward loftier themes, even as their feet turned toward the houses of worship. A spacious day was the old-fashioned Sunday, with room for friendship and family relationships. Somehow, the tender human ties seemed more sacred on that day; the soft breezes of the other world breathed upon and refreshed them. There was time for the unhurried reading of the Bible and books of devotion and the religious paper. Then the mind looked out over the kingdom's work as well as upward to the kingdom's home.

Sometimes the observance of the day seemed too religious for the children; but even the student of psychology will agree that to put into children a sense of other worldliness, of sacred and solemn things, of sanctities in the presence of which one must remove one's shoes, like Moses at the burning bush, was no small contribution to the formation of strong character. The children of the old-fashioned Sabbath-keeping homes grew up with convictions; and in them was the stuff that makes manhood and womanhood. All the world, with its commingled interests of state and commerce and private life, owes an unpayable debt to the American Christian Sabbath.

"O day of rest and gladness,
O day of joy and light,
O balm of care and sadness,
Most beautiful, most bright;
On thee the high and lowly,
Through ages joined in tune,
Sing holy, holy, holy,
To the great God Triune.

"On thee, at the creation,
The light first had its birth;
On thee, for our salvation,
Christ rose from depths of earth;
On thee our Lord, victorious,
The Spirit sent from heaven;
And thus on thee, most glorious,
A triple light was given."

Sunday will not be the day of the Lord unless he is permitted to be Lord of the day.

As rests are an essential part of music, so the quiet of the Sabbath is as necessary to a symmetrical life as the activity of the other six days.

The supreme law of the Sabbath is that laid down by the King himself—"The Sabbath was made for man." Like all this universe, it was designed by a beneficent Creator to minister to the highest requirements of humanity. As truly as a man needs food and sleep and shelter he also needs spiritual plenishing. For man is more than an animal; he is a spiritual being. They who would pervert the law that "the Sabbath was made for man" to mean that it was made only for the physical man, for his diversion and recreation, are thinking on such a low plane that they dishonor man as truly as they dishonor God. Man has higher needs than those of the body. The worst form of starvation is to have plenty of food for the senses, but none for the soul. Well does the old saying put it: "We have bodies; we are souls." The crowning day of the week was designed for the highest uses. It was made primarily for man's spiritual nature, to help him to be the best that he may become. The Sabbath is always misspent when it does not leave the spirit stronger, sweeter, serener and surer of its eternal destiny.

"A Sabbath well spent Brings a week of content."

A serious mistake often made is to substitute a lot of little man-made regulations for the Lord's large law concerning the Sabbath. That was what the Pharisees did. They hedged about this day of rest and gladness and liberty with so many petty proscriptions that the Saviour himself was put in the light of a Sabbath-breaker. Three functions are indicated in Scripture for the Lord's Day: First, it is a memorial celebration; it marks the Creator's rest and the Saviour's resurrection. Most properly, this aspect of the day is observed by worship in God's house. Secondly, the Sabbath is a rest day, enjoined by divine command. This means a day which, in employment and in recreation, shall be different from all other days. And, thirdly, the Sabbath is a day of rejoicing, which it will be if it thus recognizes the claims of God and the needs of man.

Like a signboard at a crossroads, the Sabbath points two ways—backward to God's dealings with man and God's provision for him; and forward to the land of endless Sabbaths.

MISSIONARY WORK

China's President Thanks Missionaries

Very soon after President Yuan Shih Kai had made his brief speech of cordial respect for Christianity before the delegates of the national Y. M. C. A. in Peking he had another opportunity to show his regard for missionaries when he received at the national palace seventy members of the association of medical missionaries in China. The association offered its congratulations to the president, and his reply was notable for the graciousness of his manner as much as for the substance of what he said. As reported in The China Press, his remarks were as follows:

"It gives me great pleasure to receive so many members of the China medical missionary conference who have gathered in the capital from the provinces. We are very grateful for your charitable services, especially for your work in the interior, where the importance of sanitary principles is comparatively unknown. For the country to be strong and prosperous, it is essential for its citizens to be healthy. It is due to you that sanitary principles are now spreading throughout the land, and it is also due to you that poor and destitute women and children have been succored and have received the elements of enlightened education. Many of you assisted during the plague, which alarmed the whole world, while during the revolution many of you faced danger and difficulties in order to relieve sufferers. I am glad of this opportunity to tender my personal thanks and I hope that you will continue in the future as in the past, thus adding to the glory of your reputation and strengthening the bonds of friendship between your countries and ours, which I earnestly hope will be strengthened every year."

Young Chinese Overcrowd College

The Chinese newspapers in New York recently published rumors that Dean W. K. Chung, head of the Chinese faculty in Canton Christian College, had resigned his position as commissioner of education in Kwantung province. William Henry Grant and other trustees of the college in New York City were much disquieted by this report, since the opportunities of service in Mr. Chung's hands as a provincial official were of peculiar public importance from an educational standpoint. As The Continent recently said, Dean Chung has been making a fight against Confucian worship in the public schools, which meant a vastly enlarged opportunity for Christian teachers throughout the nation. It seemed a misfortune that this and other good things that Mr. Chung had set afoot should come so early to naught. But, happily, advices direct from Canton demonstrate the resignation report is entirely untrue, and Commissioner Chung continues to combine successfully his college work with his extensive public duties.

The inadequacy of the present plant at Canton, in comparison with the tremendous opportunities which it faces, is emphasized by the report of January matriculation. At the opening of the new term following the holidays 170 students applied for admission to the institution; but on account of the scarcity of teachers and the lack of buildings, the faculty could receive only forty of the applicants. This made the total attendance in college and high school 169, with 230 more in the elementary schools.

That Canton Christian College is not purely a missionary proposition in the usual sense of that word, nor indeed much more a philanthropy than a typical American College, is indicated by the fact that the Chinese patrons of the school contributed in fees to the college treasury for the first half of the current year $15,000 in gold. Dr. Andrew H. Woods, who had just gone out from Philadelphia to be the vice-president of the institution, declares that this spirit of Chinese cooperation extends to the teachers in the faculty, who "have ceased working as hirelings and are partners interested in developing departments and studying by lamp light to work out new ideas."

Sending Mission Reports by Cable

The United Presbyterian Church is in the midst of its second annual every member canvass. Last year this goal was "a million dollars for missions," which was urged by means of a simultaneous every member canvass which has become a fixed policy of the church. The office of the million dollar committee, 200 North 15th street, Philadelphia, is sending out some vigorous literature in the interests of better finance. An interesting and unique feature of this year's campaign is the going abroad of George C. Shane, a prominent layman and merchant of Philadelphia, who leaves his desk as secretary of a great concern to give sixty days of valuable time to the personal study of missionary conditions and needs in Egypt. It is expected that the whole financial campaign will be punctuated with his virile and graphic utterances which will be transmitted to the home church by means of cablegrams. It would not take many such business men to tone up the whole system of church finances.

The United Presbyterians made an advance of $145,000 in benevolences last year, and hope to take a bigger step in the present year.

Interdenominational Comity in Africa

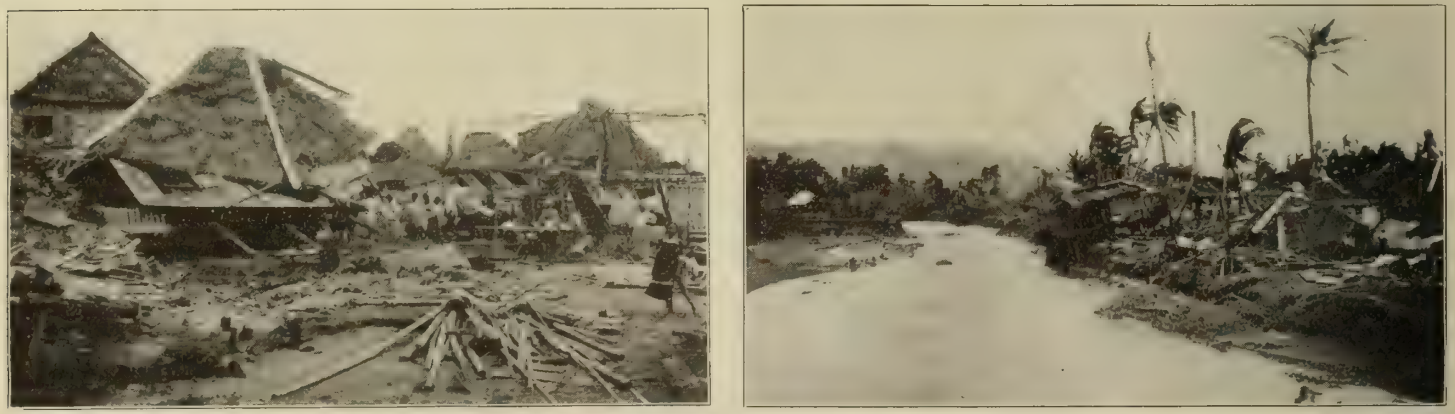
The opening of a mission in the Kongo valley by the Southern Methodist Mission Board, with headquarters at Nashville, has been attended by several agreeable incidents of interdenominational cooperation. There is no danger of conflict or overlapping in the Kongo field. The territory is big enough to afford room for all the workers that could possibly be sent there, even if every evangelical body in the United States should choose to dispatch a mission to that region. At present the strongest force of occupation in the Kongo country is the mission of the Southern Presbyterians, who also have their missionary headquarters in Nashville, and the announcement that the Methodists contemplate work in the same region was received with joy and congratulation in the rooms of the Presbyterian Board.

Bishop Lambuth went out to prospect the territory for the Methodists, accompanied by Professor Gilbert, a colored teacher from Augusta. Word was sent simultaneously to the Presbyterians on the field that every assistance should be rendered to the Methodist visitors, and the instruction perfectly accorded with the disposition of the missionaries and the native Christians. When Messrs. Lambuth and Gilbert arrived at Luebo and Ibanji, a party of native Presbyterian evangelists volunteered to proceed with them 800 miles farther into the interior and explore the country for a new location. The Presbyterian mission steamer, the Lapsley, has been put at the disposal of the Methodists to transfer their goods inland when their missionaries arrive, and it is already arranged that Presbyterian elders from Luebo will serve as helpers and interpreters until the American workers learn the language. It is promised that other features of cooperation will be developed as the work progresses, for even if the two fields are to be 800 miles apart, they are considered, as distances count in Africa, next door neighbors.

Board Notes and Announcements

—The prayer after the last supper was the lesson read Friday morning at Room 48, Chicago, by the leader, Miss Skinner of Fourth church. That all should pray much for Korea was emphasized by Miss Katherine Crane, who, since heard here two years ago, has not only seen much of China but has visited Korea, Japan and India. "None but an eye-witness," she said, "can begin to realize what missionaries and other Christians are suffering in Korea." Mentioning the first foreign mission undertaken by the Korean church, setting apart two men and a thousand dollars to begin work in the field allotted by Shantung Presbytery, Mrs. Coulter said, "I wondered what we should do in comparison." Mrs. Forsyth told of the enthusiasm she had found in the large prayer meeting at New York headquarters. Rev. A. K. Reischauer of Tokyo showed the need of a union Christian university for Japan, making it clear that the undertaking, although too great for any one denomination to attempt, is as possible as it is necessary when made a demonstration of the unity of Christianity—a perpetual witness to that much denied unity. The report of Mrs. Thomas E. D. Bradley, treasurer, showed increased receipts.

What a Typhoon Means to the Philippines



These Pictures Show Some of the Havoc Wrought by Typhoon on the Island of Cebu, P. I.

Typhoons are not uncommon in the Philippines, but last October the archipelego was swept by a typhoon of unusual severity, which uprooted cocoanut trees, destroyed the plantations of hemp, washed out the crops of the farmers, tore houses to pieces and left devastation and destruction in its wake. Besides the damage done by three tidal waves, small streams swollen by waters turned back from the mountains washed away buildings and threw up debris along the shores. Streets were choked with the roofs and ruins of houses. That there was not a fearful loss of life was due to the fact that the typhoon struck in the daytime.

From Rev. William B. Cooke, missionary and pastor of the American church at Manila, come these pictures of the devastation on the Island of Cebu. Some experiences with this and other Philippine typhoons were well told on the missionary page of The Continent in the last issue of last year by Rev. C. E. Rath of Tacloban.

Reaching America's Purest Americans

A Famous Old Christian School's Service to a Sturdy People Whose Native Capacities Are a Splendid Contribution to Our American Manhood and Womanhood

BY OLIVER R. WILLIAMSON

NATIONS, like men, grow strong by grappling with the forces that threaten destruction; they grow weaker by seeking the easier way. Our statesmen dallied with slavery, and the flower of northern and southern manhood paid the reckoning in blood. We are fond of discovering the hand of God in history that has been made; less willing are we to recognize divine leading when history is in the making. Especially in times of material prosperity are we disposed to mortgage our responsibilities and leave posterity to pay. But such a mortgage is at a terrible risk of foreclosure.

Our forefathers preferred the toil and perils of the wilderness, with the freedom that they conceived as a divine gift, to ease coupled with a yielding conscience. They wrought and fought and won—not for us alone but for all God's world; for in the unfolding of America's brief page in the scroll of the centuries, there appears the heaven-born plan that in one great family established here all the nations shall become kin. Through all our decades the nations afar have given us of their blood; the spirit of '76 lives today in the heart of many an American whose family history leads back through Castle Garden, or even more modern Ellis island, and it is ordained that our children must share with the stranger's children the burden of the America of tomorrow.

All of Nation's Strength to Support Ideals

But we are coming to realize that in fairness to him as well as to ourselves, our welcome to the immigrant must not mean surrender. The issue is not permanently to be evaded. The beautiful standard of a Christian America should not be, and need not be, trailed before a newcomer, who is privileged to share but not to command; rather must the banner be raised higher aloft so that, untarnished, it shall be supreme over him and over us all. It must represent what is best, and all that is best, in Americanism. And if there be any power in the spiritual inheritance of Americans whose ancestors struggled to make of this country the nation visioned by Winthrop and Washington, Jefferson and Lincoln, every potentiality of that power must be utilized to keep this standard aloft and untarnished. For us now the real preparedness of peace is needed not against guns and ships and fighting men but against the evils that lie in a supine yielding of precious ideals. Not in a bigoted political sense, nor in a spirit of sectarian distrust, but in the higher expression of Christian patriotism. "Every American must be on guard."

But we are not simply on the defensive, nor am I intending here to discuss the immigration problem. Unless men of great sagacity are at fault, the signs of the times are that our wonderful nation is preparing to establish itself upon a moral plane definitely higher than it has reached in any other epoch. The minds and consciences of us all are stirred as never before except by threat of war. It is indeed a time when every American must be called to the colors—and a time to take an account of what "every American" signifies.

Vast Reserve Force Awaiting Development

As you have journeyed southwestward over the Southern railway from Lynchburg to Chattanooga, or south and east through Knoxville to Asheville, you may have wondered vaguely just what you would discover if you were to follow one of those red or yellow clay roads back through the coves and over the ridges that mark the foothills of the green-clad mountains. But unless you are one of a comparative few, you never got farther than the thought. Back among those mountains it is, however, that you will find Americans whose original Scotch-Irish or English strain has been unmixed with the blood of other races during all the years since this wilderness was peopled. Here it is that there has been preserved for the republic a powerful reserve force, that has never ignored a call in defense of liberty and which is ready to be made efficient for the maintenance of a Christian America.

The story of East Tennessee and western North Carolina is interwoven with the lives and fortunes of many men whose names require no hall of fame to perpetuate their memories. To them is owed an unpayable debt by the Americans who now travel in comfort through the first easy paths broken by the daring pioneer. One of the earliest of the pioneer preachers was Dr. Hezekiah Balch, a native of Maryland and a graduate of Princeton. He labored for a number of years in North Carolina and at the close of the revolution went to Greeneville, then a hamlet on the trail leading through East Tennessee to the Kentucky country. A number of the counties in this section had declared themselves independent of the state government and established the "State of Franklin," with the capital at Jonesboro, not far from Greeneville. From the "Legislature of the Territory South of the Ohio River," as the assembly called itself, Dr. Balch obtained in 1794 a charter for a college, which in date of authorization was the first institution of higher education west of the Alleghenies.

The College "Back in the Hills"—Tusculum

The immigration of the early eighteenth century brought to America from the north of Ireland—among so many whose descendants have helped to make America—Samuel and Jane Doak. After a brief residence in eastern Pennsylvania they settled finally in that way station to the Middle West, Augusta county, Virginia. There, in 1749, was born to them a son whom they named Samuel and who quickly demonstrated those qualities of resoluteness which afterwards carried him through a remarkable career and made this bit of history worth while recounting. The younger Samuel studied Latin under Archibald Alexander—a name made famous by the instructor's grandson—and after the surmounting of great difficulties he was graduated from Princeton College at the age of 24. This was in the opening year of the revolution, and his diploma, carefully preserved, I have seen among the treasured possessions of one of his descendants.

The continued conflict of arms made it necessary for him to study theology privately, teaching school for his maintenance. Like that of many other Princeton men of those days, young Doak's vision was of a work in the new country to the west. First in Washington county, Virginia, then in the wild country at the fork of the Holston and Wautauga, he labored in the few years just following his licensure in 1777 by Hanover Presbytery. But these fields did not suit him, and in the spirit of the true pioneer he pushed forward to discover the one place that he doubtless felt had a special call upon him.

Coming upon a company of settlers engaged in making a clearing near the Nolachucky, one of the headwaters of the Tennessee, the young minister was given a cordial welcome by the isolated woodsmen. At their persuasion he first preached from saddleback under the trees, and here he settled himself and (this was in 1780) gathered together the beginning of the Salem church, which still exists. On a farm which he "entered" Dr. Doak constructed three log buildings for residence, church and school. It was near by, under an oak which is pointed out to the latter day visitor, that there assembled a few months later a company of men led by General John Sevier—"Nolachucky Jack." Armed with rifles and powder horns, they were on their way to meet one of those emergencies which make history. Dr. Doak, with his own rifle in hand, accompanied them through the forest to Sycamore Shoals, where other forces were joined, and gave to all a scriptural admonition and blessing. Then he returned to the women and children of the settlement, while the fighting men went on to win the decisive victory of King's mountain.

Dr. Doak Establishes Himself at Tusculum

At Salem Dr. Doak continued his educational work, obtaining in 1782 a charter from North Carolina for an academy, which was named in honor of Governor Martin. At this school, which he later named Washington College, Dr. Doak remained until 1818, when he gave up the work and removed to Tusculum, near Greeneville, where he established a classical school. He was strongly urged to return, but he steadfastly remained at Tusculum until his death in 1829.

Dr. Hezekiah Balch's school at Greeneville—or, rather, three miles south of that town; the educators at that time were fearfully afraid of urban influences—had met with a considerable degree of prosperity. Dr. Charles Coffin, a Harvard graduate, became associated with Dr. Balch in 1800 and made a strong impress on the institution. Especially was he responsible for the enriching of the library with the many interesting and valuable old tomes that are cherished at Tusculum today. In 1839 the school occupied a new building in the town of Greeneville; but there was a vacancy in the presidency from 1847 to 1854, and though interest revived during the presidency of Rev. W. B. Rankin (1854-1858), the damage wrought by the civil war left little but the name. Greeneville is an interesting little city, with its national cemetery and old frame house where the future president, Andrew Johnson, labored at the tailor's bench while he was gaining the rudiments of an education under his wife's direction in their modest home across a narrow street. And the courteous resident will show you, too, if you are interested, the very spot on which John Morgan, the famous Confederate raider, stood when he was shot. President Johnson's remains lie in Greeneville cemetery.

Distinguished Alumni

After the original Samuel Doak came to Tusculum in 1818 he conducted a private school until his death in 1829. His successor, Dr. S. W. Doak, in 1842 secured a charter for the academy, which was constituted a college in 1844. Greeneville and Tusculum have separately and jointly made generous contributions to the manhood and womanhood of America—contributions that deserve equally generous requital. I have before me a statistical table which tells something of the graduates of the school. A hasty examination shows the useful part played in the world's activities by the graduates. Fifty-two became lawyers, furnishing probably the larger number of the state officials or legislators and eight congressmen (including Speaker John White); three were United States senators, ten judges. Thirty became physicians, 120 educators, including thirteen college presidents and a number of founders. One was a railway president, thirteen were editors, forty-seven became business men, fifty-six engaged in farming and eighty-six accepted ordination as ministers of the gospel. Which exhibit will stand comparison in any proper respect with the showing made by many colleges of which the world hears a great deal.

In 1868 Greeneville and Tusculum were wisely consolidated, and in recent years there was an attempt to operate Washington College also in connection. The plan was unsatisfactory to both parties and Tusculum now stands alone. A great field invites its services. Tusculum lies almost in the center of the mountain section of East Tennessee, northwestern North Carolina, southeastern Kentucky and southwestern Virginia. As the crow flies, the last named state is scarcely thirty miles away, the Cumberland mountains of the Allegheníes rearing themselves at the same distance to the northwest, south and east are the great Smokies of the Blue Ridge, and the border of North Carolina lies not a dozen miles away, as the map shows it, albeit much farther as one traverses rough roads through the foothills. Though the highest barriers lie to the south and east, it is in these directions that the educational light points its brightest rays of invitation. From out this rough region came many of the lads of whose after lives Tusculum has good reason to feel proud, and in these regions now are to be found boys and girls with natural qualities not less susceptible of efficient development. Go to the school today and you will find a student body that gives you joy in its contrast with the blase, dilettante types to be found in institutions whose privileges are less hardly earned, if earned at all. And the long history of this old school has been justified, if in no other wise, by a certain endless chain which it has created. In the very beginnings the impulse of the finished student was to go back among his people to share his learning with others; and invariably he was ready to urge the promising pupil in his own school to pass on to the teacher's alma mater. Many of the students of today have come to Tusculum because of the help or the urgency of their teacher "back in the hills," and they in turn will go forth to use their influence in the same way. Then, too, many teachers, after the short five months of the country schools, come here for the remainder of the term. Thus Tusculum is exerting a constantly improving influence in the most elementary of elementary instruction in this poorly schooled region.

What "Poorly Schooled" Signifies

Let us give you some conception of what "poorly schooled" means. Greene county, in which Tusculum is located, includes in its population a large number of the best elements of Tennessee's population, and the county seat of Greeneville is a prosperous and attractive town, yet the report of the county school superintendent shows these figures regarding the white population (negroes are not numerous):

Children of school age	10,615
Of school age unable to read or write	2,120
Enrolled in schools	7,679
In first grade	2,553
In second grade	1,114
In last grade of grammar school	90
In last grade of high school	12

The only high school is the municipal institution at Greeneville, and if he should finish this course, the student must still take a year's preparatory work before he may qualify for the freshman class at Tusculum. The public school term in these counties usually does not exceed four months. But Greene county is a shining light in the educational firmament compared to adjacent mountain counties, such as Unicoi. It is from this region that Tusculum derives the material from which is developed the sterling American citizenship revealed by our partial statement of alumni history.

The great majority of these young men and women must go where they may easily return to their homes in the spring or summer to "help out"; but even if they could get far away from home, they could not, as a usual thing, afford the increased living expenses. So Tusculum has always found it essential to reduce every item of charge to the irreducible minimum. The total expense to the student today is made as low as $100 a year. How has this been made possible? Partly, of course, by the generosity of the friends of the school; and partly also, let it not be forgotten, by the sacrifices of the men and women of education and ability who have labored here for a mere pittance because they saw the need. Has it all been worth while? I think so. The 150 boys and seventy girls who are here can tell you whether or not it is worth while. That young man—this is one of many similar instances—who walked seventy-five miles and reached the college with 40 cents in his pockets, his extra clothing in a pack slung over his shoulder, can tell you. This young woman whose sole provision for an education came from the sale of a calf her father gave her can tell you. These thirty students who are working their way can tell you. Everyone who has made a sacrifice to teach or to be taught can tell you. Anyone who has gone to Tusculum and come in contact with its students and faculty can tell you.

Where Dr. Doak Began His Work at Tusculum

Deficient Equipment Fully Utilized

The college community is practically all there is of the Tusculum indicated on your post office map. In a pretty hollow, near an ever rippling brook, stands the frame structure in which Samuel Doak began his second school nearly a hundred years ago. In the next stage of development (1842) a brick building rose upon the adjacent hillside. In and about this building, still solid and sightly, there were some stirring times when the line of civil war ran through many families and divided brother from brother and sons from parents; and it is related that Dr. John Rankin of abolition fame here defied a body of belligerent young students to fly the stars and bars or to haul down the stars and stripes—I am not certain which, though I am sure Dr. Rankin was equal to the defiance. In this building today a group of brave young women do their own housekeeping in order to economize on the already minimized cost of living in the dormitory.

Craig hall houses the young men; McCormick hall, a well planned structure, provides a long ago inadequate chapel, recitation rooms and an office. Virginia McCormick hall, occupied partly as a dormitory for woman students and instructors, also provides quarters for a decidedly popular and a capably directed domestic science work, better equipped than most of the other departments of the school. Here, too, are the dining room and social hall. On the opposite side of the campus Carnegie hall is given over to a handsome gymnasium, the library, laboratory and rooms for the Y. W. C. A. and other organizations. Across the highway from the original campus, on a tract acquired in recent times, stands the president's house, with cottages near by occupied by members of the faculty. Another extension is utilized as an athletic field, though it lacks the improvements that in time will make it really serviceable. The college power plant furnishes water, heat and electric light.

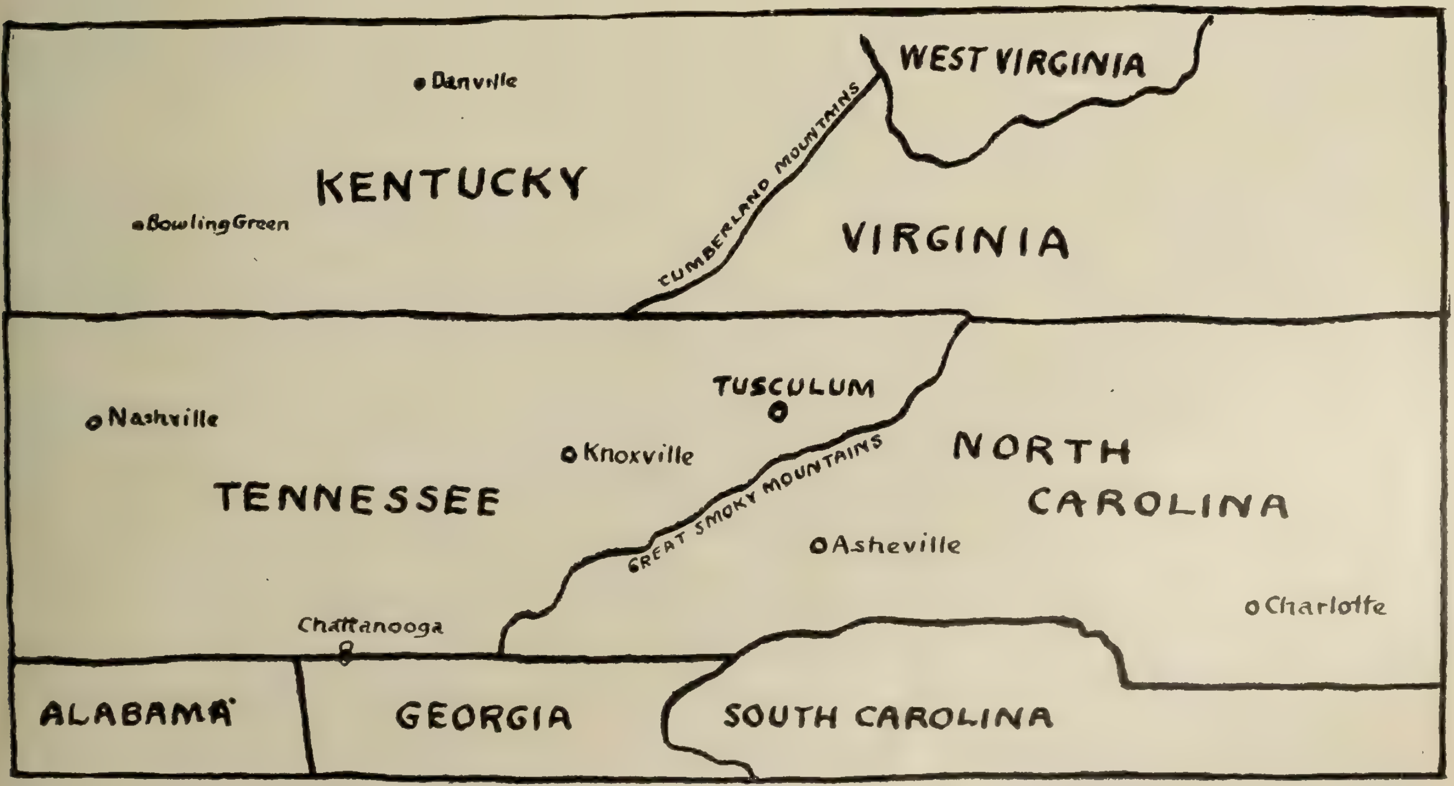
Three visits at intervals of two years have enabled the writer to form a fair estimate of the progress made by the institution. The first view of the work was an unforgettable awakening to its fundamental necessity and the remarkable results achieved with facilities strained to their utmost limit. Four years ago the era of kerosene lighting, imperfect sanitary facilities and inefficient heating had not been ended; plans for improvement there were, to be sure, but funds were almost entirely lacking. Since that time satisfactory sewerage has been installed, electric lighting has been introduced and a water system has been secured which more than paid for itself in one brief half hour when it saved one of the buildings from an incipient fire which could not have been stayed by primitive means. Throughout the school the equipment, though it has not been increased to anything like the needed degree, has been brought to greater efficiency, and proper living conditions for student and faculty have been assured. Such a comparison as the writer's visits have afforded would give to any supporter of the school ample certainty that to the last dollar his gifts will be wisely administered.

From the purely educational point of view the gains have been equally notable. Though the school is and long will be under the necessity of assuming preparatory work in many cases from the lowest grammar school grades up, the college requirements are for the full standard of units demanded by the Carnegie foundation; and there is reason to believe that the work done is as thorough as that provided anywhere. The faculty is a surprisingly strong one, from the veteran Professors Haynes and Rankin to the latest recruits. They are associated with a body of students most zealous for knowledge, willing to work hard and long to conquer, centered absolutely upon their college duties and possessed of a native acuteness which makes them apt students. Seldom will one find a school where students and instructors possess such an unfeigned appreciation of each other.

Contributory Field Important to the Church

In this vast field, where live so many thousands of young people who must look to Tusculum as their only opportunity to secure a higher education, are centered many of the mission schools of the Presbyterian Church. The work of these schools, which have so wonderfully influenced these remote communities, quite naturally develops the proper aspirations of these young people to make the utmost of their capabilities. Thus it comes about that many of Tusculum's students are recruited from the mission districts, and that numbers of them, when through here, return to their people to help in the great uplift work in which the church is rendering the nation a patriotic service. Some remarkable instances might be related of the transforming achievements of the Tusculum graduates.

Seldom, if ever, has there gone forth a graduate who is not a professed Christian. The religious element is as much a part of his life to the student as his daily bread and meat; and in such a close community any touch of insincerity would be quickly detected. The school sends an exceptionally large proportion of its young men into the path that leads through the theological seminaries to the ministry. And it is scarcely less significant that it



Tusculum is located at the strategic point for reaching the people of the southern mountains. Its students come from all the states shown sends out, as teachers and lawyers and physicians and farmers and merchants, Christians whose loyalty to religion is likely to make them leaders wherever they may go.

Even with all the world to choose from, I do not believe that any Christian philanthropist who gives fair consideration to this field and its needs would fail to decide that nowhere could he find a more striking opportunity to make his dollars count for good than here. Thus far there has been an endowment so small that the task of providing current expenses has been a most trying burden upon the president; and, of course, there has been little possibility of expansion to provide for growing numbers. A science hall, with a sufficient equipment, is certainly an early necessity. A fine, small farm adjoining the campus ought to provide a demonstration place for young men who need sorely to equip themselves for returning to their home district and exemplifying methods which will help their people to develop the possibilities of the soil. A cottage in which, for a month at a time, Miss Stetson and a group of students may live, so that the girls may better adapt their knowledge to their households at home, is also needed. Important above all, at this time, however, is the necessity that the modest endowment fund of $250,000 shall be quickly completed. President C. O. Gray, whose splendid leadership has meant so much to the college, has had much encouragement; but a hundred thousand dollars yet unpledged ought to be added to his assurance by the first of May. Allowing for all other demands upon their surpluses, this is a small sum to be tendered by the more generous of the wealthy men and women of the church. If any one of them would spend a few days in journeying across country from Marshall in North Carolina to Tusculum in Tennessee, with a day or two in this college community, he would require no urging.

America needs this splendid old American stock. It needs the men and women who can count for so much in maintaining American ideals, if they can "only have a chance"; it cannot afford to permit their lives to be wasted in ignorance and inefficiency. It needs them to help meet the crises that are upon us. The church needs them for the leadership which will uplift their people spiritually. God calls to them through the church, and the church must enable them to respond. And if this was ordained to be and is to be a Christian America, every instinct of patriotism supports the appeal in their behalf. Dare we think the appeal will be in vain?

you," answered Livingstone with heartiness.

After a four months' stay Stanley started home, begging Livingstone to leave with him, but the man whose hero was Christ was unwilling to leave anything of His work unfinished, and so Stanley left him alone. Two years later, after a siege of fever in the dense forest, kneeling by his bed in prayer, Livingstone went on to meet his Hero!

His colored boys buried his heart in Ilala and carried his body 900 miles to the coast, whence it was shipped to England. It was buried in Westminster abbey, and there it lies today.

If you should go to London some day you would be glad, I am sure, to visit the resting place of the man who made Christ his Hero.

Why We Walk in Circles

Persons lost in a forest or on a plain almost invariably walk in a circle, and this is due to inequality in the length of legs. Careful measurements over a long period have shown that only 10 per cent of us have the lower limbs equal in length, 35 per cent have the right limb longer than the left, while in 55 per cent the left leg is longer. The result of one limb's being longer than the other is naturally that a person will unconsciously take a longer step with the longer limb, and consequently will bear to the right or to the left, according as the left or right is the longer, unless the tendency to deviation is corrected by the eye. The left leg being more frequently the longer, as evidenced by the measurement, the inclination should be more frequently to the right than to the left.

The Open Hearth

Lincoln Memorial Church and College

Lincoln is looming up more and more as the greatest man America has produced, and he is more and more loved and admired by the whole world. Lincoln was a great Bible student and knew practically the whole Bible by heart and incidents are related where he repeated chapters from memory at a sickbed. His knowledge of the Bible and constant reading of it were the greatest cause of his unsurpassed English composition and style, phrased to a great extent in Bible language and spirit. He had no schooling and his ancestry cannot account for his greatness. He was selected of God to do a great work at a time of crisis, much as the prophets of old were. Once an old friend of skeptical inclinations found him reading the Bible and said, a trifle sarcastically, "I see you are profitably engaged." "Yes," said Lincoln, "so I am; I have got over my earlier doubts. I have found that the best thing to do is to take all I can of the Bible on reason, and what I can't I take on faith, and anyone who does this will live and die a better and happier man."

It was the great wish and darling project of the late Justice Harlan of the supreme court to see erected in Washington a great Presbyterian church building to represent Presbyterianism in our national capital. Why should not this be erected as "the Lincoln Memorial Presbyterian church" and have in connection with it a "Lincoln Memorial Bible College," something like the Moody Institute? New York Avenue church, which was the place of worship of thirteen of our twenty-seven Presidents as well as many other statesmen, which is known as "the church of the Presidents," would be the fitting nucleus of such a memorial church, either by itself or by union with either First church or the Church of the Covenant. We should have such a great center in Washington. The Catholics are centering in Washington and we should do so, too. Lincoln's pew in New York Avenue church, where he constantly worshiped, is still preserved there as it was, therefore it is appropriate there should be a Lincoln Memorial Presbyterian church in Washington. Many all over the country would be glad to give to such a memorial church and Bible college. Let us carry out the project of that great judge and commoner, Justice Harlan.

Lodges and Churches

I wish to say a few words in reply to Alexander McCausland's criticism of Rosalie B. McAdam's communication on Masonry. Of course some such criticism was to be expected. But, in my judgment, Rosalie McAdam's statements are warranted by the facts. Mr. McCausland may "question" her statement; but either his knowledge of Masons is limited or he has been fortunate in his Masonic acquaintances, for I have frequently heard Masons express just such sentiments. Of course they were "lacking in intelligence"; but they made the statements, and evidently believed what they said. And in spite of Mr. McCausland's assertion to the contrary, I have known of instances where young men have been led to drink and to gamble in Masonic lodges. As a Mason, that is my objection to Masonry. In some lodges which I have visited a number of the members seemed to attend only to engage in gambling. They were seldom seen in the lodge room proper, except when some matter of special interest was to be decided, but spent their time in the anteroom, or some other room, playing cards—gambling.

Another of Mr. McCausland's statements is to the effect that the leaders in church work are Masons. This is true in some cases, but in many cases it is not true. In a ministry extending over twenty-five years I have known just three cases where his statement would hold good; but I have known a score of cases where it would not hold good. I think Mr. McCausland needs enlightening rather than Rosalie B. McAdam.

Rights of Congregations

Is there not something wrong in the government of the Presbyterian Church with regard to the severing of the relation between pastor and people? Theoretically when a church calls a pastor he is called for life. But suppose after a few years the pastor does not prove acceptable to a majority of the church. Suppose further that a number of the largest contributors withdraw their support, and that still others refuse to attend the services. Suppose also that the pastor is unpopular with the young people, and that they are all leaving the church. Doubtless something is wrong with the people, but under such circumstances must not something be wrong also with the pastor? Perhaps the pastor is getting a good salary, which he does not wish to give up, and refuses to resign. No charges of immorality can be brought against him.

Must the church continue to dwindle and retrograde, and be helpless to remedy things simply because the pastor does not see fit to resign, even though it is evident that he ought to? The pastor can resign at any time he becomes dissatisfied or gets a call at a higher salary, but the people must endure him whether they wish to or not. To a layman it looks as if the Presbyterian law were made by a lot of ministers for their own benefit and advantage, and as if the rights of the congregation were largely ignored. Ought it not to be possible for a church to dispense with the services of a pastor who is no longer acceptable without stirring up a fuss and engendering unchristian feeling?

Benevolent Corporation Funds

Like national bank reports and examinations, should there not be benevolent corporation reports and examinations?

Should not benevolent corporations be required by law to loan a certain part of their endowment funds to actual agriculturists and horticulturists?

NATHANIEL BACON.

Some Pastor-Hunting Experiences

In a recent article in The Continent I notice something about the present method of getting ministers, and among the methods is the one that we might style the "slippin' in" method. I have seen that method tried and with very favorable results, and without any harm being done to the supposed weaker church, until I am persuaded partly to believe it better than the old method of the preacher coming in and trotting his best gait for a fifteen minute stretch and then going away, having virtually said to the congregation, "How do you like my style?"

Again, such a system or method has its drawbacks and its ridiculous sides. For example, a certain flourishing church, it matters not where, got its eye on a pastor in a neighboring town and sent its delegation to hear him. The committee came to town, stayed in the hotel over Saturday night and asked next morning to be directed to the Presbyterian church. They got directions, and went in and enjoyed the services immensely. Without saying anything to the pastor, they went home and recommended to the church that they at once call him. But the congregation wanted to hear him first and so had the clerk of the session send for him. The man came, and when he went to the pulpit Sunday morning the committee opened their eyes and said, "That is not the man we heard at all." The truth of it was that they had gone to the wrong church.

Pardon a personal experience. Your humble servant had been ill, and upon recovery decided he ought to take a lighter charge than the city church that he was then serving. Casting about, he approached by letter a certain church session, but got no direct reply. But he learned afterwards that the church sent its deputation of one elder to slip in on him and see him at work. It happened to be a Sabbath when the pastor was very busy. The good man came to the Sunday school and between the school hour and the later service there was a meeting of the session, so the pastor got no chance to speak to anyone else. Mr. Delegate left before the service closed, so the pastor got no chance to see him then. So he went back to his congregation and said, "I like the man's sermon and his appearance in the pulpit, but it does not appear to me that he is as sociable as we want; he does not greet strangers." When I found it out some weeks after I told my session and was greeted with a roar of laughter, to think that anyone would consider that I was not sociable enough, when that happens to be about the only strong point I possess.

Ways of Working

Stimulating Mission Activity

Nassau Presbytery recently completed a series of mission conferences with commendable success under a plan which could be tried in other presbyteries. The presbytery was divided into four groups, with a leader for each. These four with the chairman of the foreign mission committee, Rev. J. N. Grace, who initiated the work, constituted a committee of general arrangements. The object in view was the stimulation of all mission activities, both at home and abroad. On the last Sunday of January an omnibus exchange of pastors was carried out with the help of seven visiting speakers, so that practically every church of the presbytery had a mission address by other than its own pastor.

On each of the succeeding four days there were district conferences successively at Astoria, Mineola, Freeport and Huntington, at which a set of speakers under the leadership of David McConaughy was present to present the subject. In the afternoon plans of work in the local church was the subject, during which the character and function of the church missionary committee and the aims and methods of the every member canvass for mission support was clearly set forth by object lessons. At the supper table conference which followed in each place a presentation of both home and foreign work was made by visiting missionaries, among whom were Rev. R. M. Labaree of Persia, Rev. Henry Foreman of India, William H. Paden, D. D., of Utah; J. B. Rodgers, D. D., of Manila, and S. Hall Young, D. D., of Alaska.

The attendance was obtained by the appointment of delegates from each church, in some cases these appointments being formally made by the sessions. Each church was expected to send at least two delegates from each department of its work and several took advantage of the opportunity and sent more than the minimum requested. A total of 250 delegates from twenty-five out of twenty-nine churches were in attendance.

Parcel Post Party Now

So far as has been reported First church, Frankfort, Ind., Rev. H. L. Crain pastor, is the first to adapt the parcel post as an adjunct to church work. This church has recently held a parcel post party for the men. The details of the package mail system were explained by the postmaster, and the entire office force of clerks, carriers, rural carriers and railway mail clerks in the city were invited. These government employees entered heartily into the plans and added interest to the meeting. Refreshments all came in by parcel post, several local firms sending surprise packages to add to the novelty of the meeting.

To Teach Good Citizenship

Professor Allan Hoben of the University of Chicago in speaking before the Chicago ministers recently suggested that Sunday schools could do considerable toward inculcating ideas of citizenship by distributing to pupils appropriate pictures to be taken home. It was suggested that during February prints of the pictures of Lincoln and Washington would be appropriate and more than likely find a permanent place in homes.

The Church and Publicity

—The pastor of First church, Wapakoneta, Ohio, is placing emphasis in paid advertising space and in news of his church contributed to a local daily paper on the phrase "The First Presbyterian church is a pleasant and profitable one to attend." He recently devoted several inches in The Daily News to a suggestion to members of his church that Christians ought to take church papers for the same reason that a physician takes medical journals and the manufacturer trade journals. In connection with this he announced the presence of a field representative of The Continent in the church.

—Rev. William G. Johnston, pastor of the church at Nortonville, Kan., recently used a half-page advertisement in the local paper, announcing a series of meetings during the month. The advertisement was headed, "February Gospel Bargains" and typographically it resembled the announcement of a department store.

—Fourth church, Philadelphia, Pa., out of a total contemplated expense for the year of $7,600, has set aside $150 for advertising in addition to $300 for calendars and printing.

Vandalism—How to Prevent It

For many years the venerable historian of the beginnings of the Presbyterian Church on the famous eastern shore of Maryland, L. P. Bowen, D. D., author of "The Days of Makemie," has, together with others, been hoping to get more light upon the times and labors of Francis Makemie, the father of organized Presbyterianism in America, and the church which he founded in eastern Maryland and Virginia.

John S. McMaster, a lawyer with offices in Jersey City, N. J., also has long been interested in these matters. For years his ancestors lived in the neighborhood of the old Pitts Creek church, not far from the widely known Snow Hill and Rehoboth churches of Francis Makemie fame. His great grandfather, Rev. Samuel McMaster (1744-1811) was for thirty-five years (1776-1811) the pastor of these churches, and was one of the executors of the will of the last surviving daughter of Makemie, Madam Anne Holden, who died at an advanced age in 1787, leaving, among other bequests, "the sum of £40, a mahogany desk, a bed and furniture, and a negro woman called Keziah and her children," to her pastor, Mr. McMaster. This desk is now among the treasures of Union Theological Seminary of Richmond, Va.

Mr. McMaster has always hoped that some day papers or books might be found which would throw further light upon the early history of the Makemie churches. Tenants are now occupying the old McMaster farm (which is near Makemie's old home and the Rehoboth church), on which is still standing the brick annex which was once used by Parson McMaster as a schoolroom and study. On a visit to the farm during the last Christmas holidays, the tenants informed Mr. McMaster that about three years ago in rummaging through the attic of what had once been the old schoolroom they had found in an obscure corner half a cart load of ancient looking books and papers, with the name of McMaster on them, and many packages carefully tied. Evidently these had been stored for safekeeping and were forgotten when the farm was sold many years later. Seeing no value in what appeared to them a useless pile of rubbish, the tenants threw the entire lot out of the window and easily rid themselves of it by the application of a match!

How the heart grows faint at the thought of such ruthless vandalism! What stores of priceless information relative to Makemie, Maddux, Wilson, Davis, Traill, Hampton, Henry, McMaster and many others may have been thus thoughtlessly destroyed! After being hidden away for more than a hundred years, and within easy reach of those who would have given much to have known of their whereabouts, these precious packages were forever lost. Almost without a doubt there was destroyed at this time the widely-sought manuscript of the first history of Rehoboth church, which Parson McMaster is known to have written. Much of the unknown history of the beginnings of the church on the eastern shore of Maryland may have been recorded in one or more of the packages.

This calamitous loss again gives special emphasis to the importance of placing valuable data relative to church histories in the care of our Presbyterian Historical Society, Witherspoon building, Philadelphia, or in other safe and accessible places. Old books, old papers and old letters of infinite worth may be scattered here and there in homes throughout the land. It is earnestly hoped that where they are known to exist, or when discovered, they will receive a most careful examination by someone competent to judge of their value before they are doomed to destruction.

The Student Volunteer Movement of western Missouri held its first annual conference on the Park College campus, Parkville, Mo., Feb. 14-16. Nineteen schools were represented by 106 delegates. Park's volunteers number thirty-eight. Two senior men have offered themselves for China next year.

WANTED—A FINANCIAL EXPERT

The Plausible Theory

"Ministerial Relief and Sustentation is a cause which does not appeal to me as directly as many others, religious and educational. I believe that the ministers should be compensated for their efforts while they are making them, just as other people are. They should subject themselves to the same discipline of saving and investing against adversity, including old age. Moreover, their relatives should assume the duty of helping, as they do people in other callings."

This is a frank statement of the views held by many prosperous people who, devoting their lives to business, like the writer of the above letter which was recently received by the Board, have made sufficient provision for their old age, and who do not see why ministers should not do the same.

The Cold Facts

For a minister upon an average salary of $730 to provide for the necessities of life, clothing, books, the care and education of children, sickness and accident, and other contingencies of a minister's life, and then to make any provision whatever for the days of his old age or disability, would require financial statesmanship of the highest sort, and upon a limited capital.

The Conclusion

Does the Church expect the impossible of its Ministry?

Will it help the minister to help himself?

Will it remember the "grace of the Lord Jesus Christ who, though He was rich, became poor"?

These questions can be answered through

News Notes from Various Fields

Pennsylvania

At a recent congregational meeting Bellefonte church added $500 to the annual salary of the pastor, Dr. George Edward Hawes.

At the celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of Hazleton church Rev. Robert Bonner Jack, pastor, read from the original manuscript the sermon preached Feb. 1, 1838, by Rev. Richard Webster, the pioneer pastor of the anthracite coal fields.

First German church, Scranton, has started a strong evening service in English under the leadership of Rev. L. R. Foster. The people are responding well to both services—German in the morning by Dr. Nordt and English in the evening by Mr. Foster.

Billy Sunday began a two weeks' campaign in Wilkes-Barre Sunday, Feb. 23, in a tabernacle especially constructed for the purpose. The building is estimated to hold 10,000 people and it was reported that 30,000 people tried to crowd into the building for the opening service.

Washburn Street church, Scranton, celebrated the fifth anniversary of the present pastor, Dr. Ebenezer Flack, the week of Feb. 9. The church presented Dr. Flack with $300 with which to visit his former home in Belfast, Ireland, the coming spring. Dr. G. W. Bull of First church made the presentation speech.

Central church, South Brownsville, Rev. Charles R. Harmon pastor, has welcomed a large number of members as the result of evangelistic services conducted by the pastor through the month of January, following the week of prayer. S. C. Dickey, D. D., Winona Lake, Ind., spent one Sunday with the pastor, preaching morning and evening and Monday evening to large congregations.

The celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Presbyterian Home Missionary Society of Coatesville was a very successful and enjoyable affair. Addresses were made by Rev. William Buyers, a missionary among the mountaineers of Kentucky, and Mrs. George W. Davy, the society's first president. Eleven of the thirty-four original members were present. Letters of greeting were read from Miss S. E. Morrison, daughter of the first pastor; Mrs. James Roberts, widow of the second pastor; Rev. Henry A. MacKubbin, the third pastor, and Mrs. Leeper, wife of the fourth pastor. The present pastor is Rev. George E. Gillespie.

First church, Lancaster, Dr. Lewis S. Mudge pastor, Rev. James S. Armentrout assistant pastor, recently rededicated its remodeled and greatly improved sanctuary. Those assisting the pastor in the various services incident to the occasion were Dr. Charles R. Erdman of Princeton, N. J.; Dr. Henry C. Minton of Trenton, N. J., and Dr. A. W. Halsey of New York. A reception was given the clergy of the city and the congregation. The first church was organized in 1763, although there had been Presbyterian services held in the place as early as 1742. The church was built in 1763. President James Buchanan was a member of this church.

New York

Hobart church has secured $10,000 for a new church to be built in the spring on a new site; an effort is being made to raise $1,200 for a pipe organ. This church is exceptional for the comparatively large number of children attending its morning services, and for the way it holds the boys and young men in its Bible school.

District of Columbia

Five thousand copies of the Bible have recently been distributed in the guest rooms of seventy-five Washington hotels. The work has been done under the auspices of the Gideons, who, up to the present time, have distributed 180,000 Bibles in hotels of the country.

New Jersey

Rev. Robert Spencer Young is assistant to Dr. George Walton King, Newark. Mr. Young is a son of Rev. Alexander Young. He was a pastor in Binghamton, N. Y., before going to the Holy Land with his mother two years ago.

Rev. Robert T. Graham, until recently of First church tabernacle, Newark, has been installed as pastor of Knox church, Kearney.

Frederick W. Yannahs, who died Feb. 16, was an elder in Roseville Avenue church, Newark, of which Dr. William Y. Chapman is pastor.

Major Adelbert Twitchell died Feb. 24 at Newark. He was a veteran of the civil war and for several years had been an officer of the Presbyterian union in New York and a member of Memorial church.

After waiting almost two years to fill the place of Dr. James I. Vance, now of Nashville, Tenn., North Reformed church, Newark, has called Rev. Charles Hugh Stewart, pastor of St. Paul's church, Winnipeg, Canada.

The Grover Cleveland Birthplace Memorial Association has raised $18,000 to purchase from First church, Caldwell, the old manse where President Cleveland was born. It is expected that the building will be kept as a memorial.

Ohio

Rev. Harold G. Gaunt, formerly of Wheaton, Minn., was installed pastor of Second church, East Liverpool, Feb. 27. Since coming to this field his work has been interrupted by typhoid fever and the installation had been postponed. He has sufficiently recovered to be in the pulpit. At the installation Reverends E. A. Hodil of Toronto, W. G. Reagle of Wellsville and J. U. Neihoff of Wellsville took part.

The congregation of Clifton church, Cincinnati, assembled in the church parlors one evening last week in recognition of the fifth anniversary of the installation of the pastor, Rev. Donald M. Grant. After an interesting program of readings and music I. D. Fry, a charter member of the church and clerk of session, told how much the people thought of their pastor and presented him and his wife a substantial gift in gold coin.

Michigan

The thirtieth anniversary of Third church, Grand Rapids, was recently celebrated by special services. Rev. C. H. Heskett is the pastor.

Willard M. Spencer, D. D., for eight years pastor of Ionia church, has resigned to take effect May 1. Dr. Spencer is one of the ablest ministers in Michigan, having filled the important pulpits of Lansing First, Adrian and Alma. As an educator he has very few equals in Michigan.

Bay City First church woman's association has closed a course of entertainments which has proved very successful. The annual praise meeting held in the interest of the freedmen by the woman's missionary society Feb. 20 was one of the best ever held. The pastor, Rev. Thomas S. Anderson, following his custom of recent years, will hold a week of Lenten services preceding Easter Sunday, assisted by neighboring Presbyterian pastors.

Wisconsin

Rev. Engvald Iverson, Sunday school missionary in Chippewa Presbytery, has three Bible study classes under his charge.

Hudson church, Rev. George M. Tourtellot pastor, has given a room furnished with chairs and table and attractively decorated for the social use of its young men. A club of twenty men from 16 to 25 years of age is already formed.

A series of rural church and country life conferences is arranged for the second week of March. Rev. M. B. McNutt, formerly of Du Page, Ill., will be the leader with local pastors and Christian workers. The conferences will be held at Neenah March 10, Packwaukee March 11, Marshfield March 12, Stanley March 13, Ashland March 14 and Superior Saturday evening and Sunday, March 15 and 16.

On the day of prayer for colleges at Christ church, Madison, George E. Hunt, D. D., pastor, and Joseph W. Cochran, D. D., secretary of the Board of Education, spoke on Christian leadership in the evening. Between forty and fifty young people arose in response to an appeal to consecrate their lives to the Lord's service. In this church Rev. M. G. Allison, university pastor, conducts a Bible class of 100 and over.

Iowa

Steps have been taken toward the organization of a brotherhood at Milo church.

Nevada church, Rev. John G. Leitch pastor, has just dedicated a new pipe organ costing $2,000.

Miss H. A. McClure of Salem, by her will, has given $1,000 each to the Board of Home Missions, Ministerial Relief and Parsons College.

Friends of Rev. J. W. Countermine of Cottage Grove Avenue church, Des Moines, are greatly shocked to learn of the serious illness of Mrs. Countermine. After five operations for cancer a New York City specialist has pronounced the case hopelessly advanced. The church has released Mr. Countermine from all responsibility and he is devoting his time, with the help of a nurse, to the care of his wife.

North Dakota

A basement is being excavated under the church at Milnor to be used by the Boy Scouts.

Rev. Henry McClenahan was installed pastor at Rapid City Feb. 17. Rev. John McLearie, Dr. W. H. Kearns, Rev. J. Surbeck and Rev. C. D. Erskine took part.

Large crowds attended the world's study campaign which continued for fifteen days from Feb. 9 in Fargo. Doctors Bradt, Reherd, King and Luccock, together with a number of returned missionaries from different countries, took part in the campaign. People registered from all parts of North Dakota and a number came from Minnesota.

Missouri

Hollister, a new town in southwestern Missouri, has a church organization of thirty-one members. The pastor, Rev. Duncan Brown, believes that if the organization had a building the membership could be doubled. The site of Jefferson Avenue church, Evansville, Rev. A. D. Light pastor, expects to let the contract for a $40,000 building March 12.

Indiana

Dr. John P. Hale, Second church, Lafayette, was recently elected chairman of the Middle West group of synods united for home mission work.

The ministerial association of Muncie recently adopted a resolution opposing a pending bill before legislature providing for Sunday theaters.

Immanuel church, Evansville, Rev. F. C. Taylor pastor, is painting and otherwise improving the church building. The church recently bought a manse.

An interesting institute was held in Poland church Feb. 8 as a feature of the country life program being carried out by Rev. I. N. Houser, the minister. Practical addresses on farm problems were made.

Washington

Rev. T. S. Simpson, who makes his headquarters at Aberdeen, devotes his time to loggers. He not only preaches the gospel by night, traveling from camp to camp by day, but has secured many physical benefits for the men in the woods. Steel bunks and clean mattresses have taken the place of the board bunks and damp hay and straw. Bathhouses with both hot and cold water are now being introduced into many camps.

Under the pastorate of Rev. J. W. Beard First church, Hoquiam, is enjoying a most satisfactory growth. Mr. Beard is greatly interested in the loggers in camps about the city. He is known as the "loggers' friend." Each month he spends a week in the camps, holding services each evening. Many of these men are in the city on Sabbath and are found in the congregation of the "logging man's preacher."

Kansas

Rev. Walter M. Irwin, who recently resigned from Wichita West Side church, will begin work as superintendent of home missions April 1.

Rev. A. F. Heltman, pastor of Brotherhood church, Kansas City, is conducting a series of lectures in the high school auditorium, giving word pictures of the city from a sociological standpoint. March 13 he will lecture on the city amusement problem.

Illinois

Third church, Rockford, has received from Edward H. Marsh the gift of two lots and a school building. The school will be remodeled for a church, and is so located that it will have a large constituency. Rev. Charles H. Evans is pastor of the congregation, which has met in a hall for two years.

Arkansas

A union has been effected between First church, North, and First church, South, Little Rock, by officers of the two churches. The church will hereafter be known as Southern church.

Oklahoma

The Men and Religion Movement has borne fruit in Alva, where the men of the church are organized for definite Christian work.

A new church building is soon to be erected at Henrietta. Rev. C. S. Baughman, who took charge of the work here last September, has increased the Sunday school attendance 75 per cent and a number of members have been added to the church.

Idaho

Salem church has bought a residence for a parish house. Rev. W. L. Swan, pastor, recently celebrated his tenth anniversary there.

Boise First church observed College Day in a very interesting manner. The lecture room was decorated with pennants of about fifty colleges and schools. Brief addresses were made by the alumni of a large number of institutions. Special prayer was made for the young people of the congregation who are away at school and for the institutions they are attending. President Boone and Professor Hayman of the College of Idaho delivered interesting addresses.

Oregon

Dayville, fifty miles from the railroad, was recently visited by Rev. D. K. Laurie, pastor-evangelist, and a church organized. It is served jointly with Mount Vernon by Rev. J. D. McLennan, although twenty-five miles away.

Canada

The entire revenue of The American church, Montreal, during 1912 was $48,530, of which $32,000 was for missions and benevolences. During the coming summer extensive renovations of the church building are contemplated. This church, which is in the ninetieth year of its history, has filled an important place in the religious life of the Canadian metropolis and has been in a considerable measure a center of American life in that city. Dr. Robert Johnston is pastor. Visitors from the United States always find a welcome.

Ministerial Obituary

Rev. Hiram A. Stinson

Born in Warren county, Pennsylvania, June 24, 1850, Rev. H. A. Stinson died in Sylvan Grove, Pa., Feb. 9. He spent most of his very useful ministerial life in Illinois, serving at French Grove, Jacksonvile and Colfax. He went to Lincoln, Kan., in 1909. He is survived by a widow, brother and five children.

Dr. Vance Sued for Libel

Dr. Joseph A. Vance of Detroit, formerly of Chicago, is having a painful experience in action for criminal libel brought by one of the most notorious divekeepers in the city, a man recently elected alderman. The prosecution grows out of the fact that in speaking of the city council and its character Dr. Vance in some way mixed two names and fastened the convicted boodler ticket on the divekeeper. He corrected the mistake at the evening service, but a certain lawyer convinced the saloonkeeper that he had a case against Dr. Vance, and he thereupon refused to accept any apology, but must have damages for injury to his character.

OUR FREE BOOK PROVES IT

THE UNDERFEED has solved the great problem of efficiency, as well as economy, in heating. Thousands of users so testify. Ample, clean, even heat is produced with least attention in feeding and regulating—true of both Warm Air Furnaces and Steam or Hot Water Boilers.

THE PECK Williamson Underfeed FURNACES BOILERS

The Underfeed Book, sent free upon request, describes clearly and interestingly the Underfeed way of burning coal and the four big savings resulting therefrom. It explains —how cheaper grades of hard or soft coal—slack, pea or buckwheat sizes—are fed from below and, like a candle, burn perfectly from the top down, leaving but few fine ashes;

—how smoke and gases, instead of going to waste up the chimney, pass up into the fire and are consumed, producing useful heat;

—how the heating surfaces of the Underfeed are automatically kept free from soot, the fire-glow playing upon clean metal—responsive to heat; whereas in other heaters, the "fire-shine" is upon heating surfaces deadened with an ever-present coat of soot;

—how live coals are continually kept in close contact with the heating surface of the Underfeed instead of being blanketed with fresh coal; and how this heating surface represents the greater part of the Underfeed's fire pot and dome, whereas in top feeds live coals are in direct contact with but a narrow belt around the heater's fire pot.

All of these advantages, exclusively possessed by the Underfeed, are explained clearly and truthfully in the Underfeed Book. The fac-simile testimonials of many responsible users will remove all doubt as to the practicability of the Underfeed as an always dependable producer of heat, as well as to its wonderful money-saving features. For example:

FURNACE AND BOILER RECORDS

M. K. Hefling, Mercer, Pa., writes:—"With my Underfeed FURNACE, my annual coal bill the past six years averaged $17.48 for heating eight rooms and bath. No furnace built will beat that record."

D. C. Goodyear, Morenci, Mich., writes:—"My Underfeed BOILER has done all you claimed for it. My coal bill in 1911, for house of eight rooms, was $22; in 1912, $25."

Chicago Presbytery Talks of Follow Up Methods – Dr. Kerr Celebrates Anniversary — Dr Foulkes Tells of Work.

CHICAGO—Discussion of the relation of communicants to a church in the community to which they have recently moved occupied presbytery Monday morning. A report on the method to be pursued in accepting members by letter suggested that members should ask for letters of dismissal before leaving a church. The point was raised that it would be impossible usually to give the name of the church to which it was wished that the letter should be addressed. In the discussion it was said that some pastors urge members not to take letters, insisting that their efforts are still needed in their old church. These people often then fail to unite with a church at their new home and drop away. It was also urged that more care should be taken in following those who leave a church and that pastors in the town to which members go should be notified. The discussion will be resumed at the next meeting.

Dr. S. Hall Young of Alaska will address the ministers' meeting next Monday.

Willow Avenue church has called Rev. Mr. Bruhn and he has accepted.

Moderator Matthews will preach three times in this city next Sunday. He is on his way West after a meeting of the Executive Commission in New York. In the morning he will occupy the pulpit of Hyde Park church, in the afternoon Oak Park church and evening Fourth church.

The fifth anniversary of the pastorate of Dr. Hugh T. Kerr at Fullerton Avenue church was observed last Sunday. Addresses were made at the evening service by Dr. A. C. Zenos and Rev. A. A. Hays of McCormick Seminary.

Rev. O. M. Caward will begin evangelistic services at Valparaiso University, Valparaiso, Ind., next Sunday.

Ladies of Normal Park church entertained 270 at the annual "calendar" dinner last Thursday. Speakers were David R. Forgan, Dr. F. M. Fox and William L. Sharp.

Men of Austin church met last Monday to organize a brotherhood.

Dr. W. H. Foulkes at presbytery Monday in the course of an energetic address on the work of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation said that the average salary of a Presbyterian minister is $730. Presbytery at next meeting will decide on a month in which the claims of this board may be presented to the churches.

CLEAR HEADED

Head Bookkeeper Must Be Reliable

The chief bookkeeper in a large business house in one of our great western cities speaks of the harm coffee did for him. (Tea is just as injurious because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.)

"My wife and I drank our first cup of Postum a little over two years ago and we have used it ever since, to the entire exclusion of tea and coffee. It happened in this way:

"About three and a half years ago I had an attack of pneumonia, which left a memento in the shape of dyspepsia, or rather, to speak more correctly, neuralgia of the stomach. My 'cup of cheer' had always been coffee or tea, but I became convinced, after a time, that they aggravated my stomach trouble. I happened to mention the matter to my grocer one day and he suggested that I give Postum a trial.

"Next day it came, but the cook made the mistake of not boiling it sufficiently, and we did not like it much. This was, however, soon remedied, and now we like it so much that we will never change back. Postum, being a food beverage instead of a drug, has been the means of banishing my stomach trouble, I verily believe, for I am a well man today and have used no medicine.

"My work as chief bookkeeper in our company branch house here is of a very confining nature. During my coffee-drinking days I was subject to nervousness and 'the blues.' These have left me since I began using Postum and I can conscientiously recommend it to those whose work confines them to long hours of severe mental exertion." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason," and it is explained in the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true and full of human interest.

Rev. E. W. Symonds, pastor of Immanuel church, and Mrs. Symonds were honored Saturday evening, Feb. 22, with a surprise reception. The tenth anniversary of the pastorate occurred and at this reception, well attended in spite of stormy weather, a leather bound address was presented the pastor and his wife reviewing the ten years of work. The congregation also gave them a set of silverware.

As a result of the benefactions of Mrs. Annie W. Durand and Mr. and Mrs. Harold F. McCormick a new hospital for infectious cases was recently opened near the Presbyterian hospital. The hospital was built through a bequest of Mrs. Durand and becomes a part of the Memorial Institute for Infectious Diseases endowed by Mr. and Mrs. McCormick. The Memorial Institute was founded ten years ago after the death of Jack Rockefeller McCormick.

Young women members of the educational club of Fourth church recently enjoyed a lecture by a practical butcher illustrating the various cuts of meat.

District conferences are being held throughout the Central West and Northwest looking toward the enlistment of funds and young men for the Y. M. C. A. Institute and Training School. A gift of $50,000 has been offered for a new building near Washington park on condition that $200,000 more be raised. About a year ago $50,000 was given the school for equipment.

There already have been received the names of over 8,500 people who will be stewards in "The World in Chicago." Many names have not been sent to the main office, although they all must be reported by March 15. The stewards come from 450 different churches. The stewards' department is anxious to get into touch with all who have ever studied the text book, "Mormonism, the Islam of America."

The Sunday school at Hyde Park church has reached a regular attendance of over 500. The young people's society is also in a flourishing condition under the direction of the pastor, Rev. Alexander Alison, Jr.

The annual meeting of the Women's Presbyterial Society for Foreign Missions will be held at First church March 13, beginning at 10:30 a. m.

There was a large attendance at the joint banquet of the denominational social unions at the Hotel La Salle Feb. 28. President W. O. Thompson of Ohio State University spoke on "Religious Problems in State Universities."

It is said that the largest amount pledged to the special China fund by a local church is $11,000, already promised from Second church members.

Good Things in This Issue

That the best things in any one issue of The Continent are not all of the same kind is well illustrated in this number. No magazine of any sort will present at this centennial time a more comprehensive view of David Livingstone than is given this week in this publication. The facsimilie copy of the letter of the great explorer throws an interesting light on his personality. The articles by Robert E. Speer and by one of Scotland's most eminent theologians, as well as the story of Livingstone for children, will all repay reading.

Mrs. Newell Dwight Hillis's article will stir the thoughts of the daughters, as well as the fathers and mothers of daughters. As a writer for young women Mrs. Hillis is well known.

Mr. Ellis has some timely remarks on the social evil which deserve careful thought.

A land of sunshine is found by Miss Rippey in the top of a Chicago office building in her description of the Central Eleanor Club. Other cities might well start clubs of the same sort.

In the Next Issue

Although there is snow about the homes of many readers of The Continent, thousands of subscribers are now thinking of their vacations this summer. Some are planning to visit Yellowstone park. These and all others will appreciate the fine illustrations in "All Around America." There will also be an inspiring account of the aggressive work of some wide-awake laymen in Kansas.

The Reward of the Teacher

(From a sometime member of the class of 1896, Lake Forest College, now a clergyman in Minnesota.)

"Thank you for the beautiful token of Lake Forest's interest in her sons. Really I look back on my stay in Lake Forest with an affection I do not feel for any other institution of my experience, and you know I have been at three others, one college, a university and a divinity school. It was at Lake Forest I learned to study and where I got the inspiration for any work I may do. The classes in Latin and Greek at Lake Forest really fixed any habits of application I now have."

Lake Forest ever seeks to maintain a high standard of teaching, in the hope that her students may continue to pay such tribute.

Hymns of the Church
W. V. W. Davis and Raymond Calkins

Its distinctive features are the hymns which center about the life of Christ and which voice the essential elements of the Christian faith, arranged according to the Christian year and set to tunes already familiar by association; the rich collection of Prayers, Chants, etc.; and the particularly impressive Responsive Readings. A dignified book which will appeal to churches contemplating a change of hymnals.

Church "Ad" Calls to Service

Philadelphia Is Latest City to Tell Newspaper Readers Advantages of Religious Observance – Will Reprint Dr. Jowett's Message.

PHILADELPHIA—The Public Ledger for years has been the city paper whose Saturday issue presented extended notice of Sunday's religious services, two or more pages being devoted to them. Recently, as a development of the Men and Religion Movement, it was proposed by a publicity committee of prominent church men to insert each Saturday in city papers a full-page paid display advertisement of the church in its institutional capacity, in which should be set forth prominently in the upper half of the page arguments and appeals for churchgoing and on the lower half a directory of church services. The North American was chosen for the inauguration of the plan, with the hope that it might eventually be extended to other papers. The page's first appearance, Feb. 23, produced an excellent impression. Among the prominent declarations were the following: "Every nonattendant upon religious services virtually votes for the elimination of the institution from society." "Absenteeism from the ballot box and absenteeism from church are kindred failures in duty to society." As a consequence of the publicity plan, The Public Ledger donated a portion of its church notice pages to the committee for presentation in display type of such matter as they choose to insert. The results thereof are said to be encouraging.

GERMANTOWN CALLS PRINCETON MAN

Market Square church, the oldest and among the largest in Germantown, having among its elders such representative men as William H. Scott and General Louis Wagner, has given a call to Rev. Harold McAfee Robinson of Princeton, N. J., to become its pastor. Mr. Robinson was secretary of the Princeton centennial anniversary.

Francis B. Reeves, senior elder of Wakefield church, Germantown, is one of the men who do not allow age to lay them upon the shelf. He is president of the Girard National bank and May 9 will celebrate the fifty-ninth anniversary of the day he walked into the bank and took his seat behind a desk as a clerk. He is head of the committee of one hundred appointed to advance the interests of reform and good government in the city. He is a reader of The Continent and, what may be of interest to other readers, proposes, with The Continent's consent, to issue in booklet form at his expense the message of Dr. Jowett which appeared in the issue of Feb. 6.

Professor Edward A. Steiner of Iowa has been addressing recently the Presbyterian churches of Philadelphia on "The Church and the Immigrant."

The monthly meeting of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Presbyteries of Philadelphia and Chester will be held in the Witherspoon building March 12 at 11 a. m. Leaders will be Mrs. A. L. Lathem and Mrs. G. L. Van Alen. Dr. W. A. Creditt, a graduate of Lincoln University, will speak on "The Freedmen."

Rev. William J. Jones, a guest for some years of the John C. Mercer Ministers' Home at Ambler and member of the Presbytery of Philadelphia North, met with a fatal accident last week when a freight train struck him. He was 64 years of age, of Welsh descent, a graduate of Hamilton College and Lane Seminary and for a time was pastor in Chester, Ohio, and Corydon, Ind.

The noonday Lenten services in the theaters of the business section of the city the past few weeks have been very largely attended.

MIDNIGHT SERVICES IN A THEATER

Midnight services are being held every Sunday by the Presbyterian evangelistic committee in Forepaugh's theater, which is in the heart of the tenderloin section. Ministers of the city speak.

Special services were held the last week of February by Emmanuel church, the pastor, Dr. Bowman, preaching.

W. G. Landes of Philadelphia, general secretary of the Pennsylvania Sabbath School Association, and wife, accompanied by H. J. Heinz of Pittsburg, president of the association, have gone on a five months' trip through the Orient. After assisting in organizing school work in Japan and delivering addresses at the national Sunday school convention at Osaka, they will try to reach Zurich for the world's convention in July.

The annual banquet of the Presbyterian Social Union to which ladies were invited was a brilliant affair. The speakers were Bishop Berry of the Methodist Church and Dr. Mark A. Matthews. Dr. Matthews took strong ground against a Christian marrying one not a Christian and also against a marriage ceremony being performed by a civil magistrate. He declared that there were too many anonymous citizens in the world. W. P. WHITE.

Address Students at Dubuque

A week of prayer meetings at Dubuque German College and Seminary was conducted by Rev. Reid S. Dickson of New Providence, N. J. Feb. 6 addresses were delivered by Mr. Dickson and Dr. J. R. Guthrie, a surgeon and professor in the University of Iowa. Mr. Dickson spoke to students from the following peoples: Armenian, Australian, Bohemian, Bulgarian, Chaldean, Croatian, Danish, English, Galician, German, Hebrew, Holland, Hungarian, Mexican, Monacan, Moravian, Russian, Servian, Slovak, Slovenian, Spanish and Swiss.

Women of the Civil War presented the institution with an American flag and staff on Lincoln's birthday. Representative women of the city were present and an address was given by Mrs. G. W. Healey, president, responded to by the president of the school. The junior class gave a program of music and orations appropriate to the day. The exercises included a character sketch of Abraham Lincoln, his Gettysburg address and an oration.

Billy Sunday to Go to Pittsburg

Campaign of Two Months Next Year – A Bill to Compel Reading Bible in Public Schools Passes House.

PITTSBURG—The coming of Billy Sunday to Pittsburg has been definitely decided. A subcommittee of the Pittsburg evangelistic committee met Mr. Sunday en route to Williamsport Saturday morning, Feb. 22, at 6 o'clock and held a conference with him while his train waited in Union station. The date of his coming is the last Sunday of 1913, and the campaign is to continue for two months. It is generally understood that the scheme of closing churches will not be followed in this city, and every congregation will decide for itself whether services will be interrupted or not. The location of the tabernacle has not been determined as yet, but every effort will be made to get it in some place convenient to railroad stations and street car lines.

The University of Pittsburg held a big celebration in honor of the 126th anniversary of the granting of the first charter by the state to the old Pittsburg Academy, from which the university has been evolved, Friday, Feb. 28. Two mass meetings were held in Soldiers' Memorial hall and addresses were made by Provost E. F. Smith of the University of Pennsylvania, President E. E. Sparks of State College and President W. H. Crawford of Allegheny College.

Rev. C. G. Jordan, pastor-elect of Second church, Wilkinsburg, took charge of his new work March 2. Rev. George Philipps, pastor of McKinley Park church, has announced his resignation to accept a call to the church at Wilmerding. A special dinner was given in honor of Riley Little, D. D., by a number of his friends at the Fort Pitt hotel March 3. Dr. Little will move to Philadelphia at once.

Pastors and Christian workers in the vicinity of Pittsburg have been kept busy circulating petitions and urging the sending of letters and telegrams to the representatives at Harrisburg, besieging them to vote for the county local option bill and the bill to compel the reading of the Bible in public schools. The local option bill lost by a vote of 84 to 121 and the bill to place Bibles in the schools passed by a large majority.

Dr. George Grannis, national secretary of the Lord's Day Alliance, has been making addresses in Pittsburg and vicinity urging united effort to secure better Sabbath observance.

Rev. W. A. Jones, President of the Pennsylvania Christian Endeavor Union, presided at an important meeting of the executive committee of the union at Philadelphia March 2 and 3. P. W. SNYDER.

Plans for Two New Structures

Covenant Church to Erect Chapel—Hollister Assembly Plans Growing—Dr. Foulkes to Visit Kansas City March 7.

KANSAS CITY—Covenant church, of which Rev. E. E. Stringfield is pastor, is beginning to make arrangements to erect a new building. About $10,000 will be put into a commodious chapel at present. This church is located near Swope park and the city is building out around it very rapidly, assuring a large future for it.

Rev. George Mitchell, recently called to Marlborough and Dodson churches, has begun his work. A lot has been given for a new church and the money provided with which to pay for the stone for a chapel.

The synodical committee which has the work of promoting the Hollister assembly met in this city Feb. 26. The object of the meeting was to take care of some financial conditions which have arisen, and also to decide upon features of the program for next summer's meeting. The assembly is developing beyond all expectations, and a stronger and more elaborate program is being planned. It is the purpose to make it a great rallying place for the Presbyterianism of the Southwest.

On Feb. 21 the western group of the federal council of self-supporting synods met in Omaha. Doctors John B. Hill and Charles C. McGinley attended the meeting as representatives from Missouri. The meeting was one of great importance, especially to the western synods. All the questions of a more effective synodical organization and supervision were discussed. Large plans for cooperation and effective work were made.

William Hiram Foulkes, D. D., secretary of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, will be in this city March 7. He will visit his father, William Foulkes, D. D., pastor of Grandview church, and at the same time make plans for the extension of the work he is undertaking in connection with this board. A dinner will be given him at the Y. M. C. A.

Rev. Robert M. MacFadyen leaves Drexel and Sharon churches with the indebtedness on a new manse paid off and all obligations of the church met. CHARLES C. MCGINLEY.

Religious Census in St. Louis

Churches to Know Sunday School Possibilities—Special Services for North-Covenant Congregation—Discuss Medical Missions.

ST. LOUIS—A religious and Sunday school canvass was made in St. Louis during the week beginning Feb. 23. A similar census was taken in 1905.

Rev. Edward Wright, formerly a Salvation Army man, who was ordained by St. Louis Presbytery, has been holding a series of evangelistic meetings in Owensville, and in addition to the services in the church has conducted noonday meetings in a vacant room over a saloon. His wife has occupied his pulpit at Baden church part of the time he has been absent.

Medical missions were discussed at a meeting in Tyler Place church Sunday evening, Feb. 23. Dr. Mary McLean, a local physician, who has visited many missions in the Orient, was one of the speakers.

The annual praise service of the missionary society of Winnebago church was held Sunday evening, Feb. 23. The pastor, Rev. Jerrie Johnston, delivered an address. A former pastor, Rev. August Hilkemann, now Sunday school missionary, was present.

Sunday, Feb. 23, was observed at North-Covenant church as an "every member present" rally day. Special services were conducted at the old church building on Grand avenue in the morning and in the evening at North church chapel on St. Louis and Warne avenues. Rev. W. D. Vater is pastor.

Dr. S. J. Niccolls of Second church is planning to go to Aberdeen, Scotland, in June to attend the meeting of the Presbyterian World's Alliance. He has been appointed a delegate by General Assembly.

Rev. George W. King was in his pulpit the last Sunday in February after an eastern visit in the interest of foreign and institutional church work.

The women's societies of First church are conducting a course of Tuesday Lenten lectures. Miss Ora A. Kelley, assistant at the School of Social Economy, spoke on "Social Service" Tuesday, Feb. 25.

The Sunday school institute held the third week in February in First church, under the auspices of the Board of Sabbath School Work and aided by the Sunday school committee of Presbytery, of which Rev. Jerrie Johnston is chairman, was well attended and left a good effect. The evangelistic conference under the direction of the Assembly committee, aided by the presbyterial committee, was also an interesting event. E. W. MCCLUSKY.

Sunday School Worker Graduates

Omaha Layman Becomes International Officer—Mission Conference Attracts Synodical Leaders—Want Sunday in 1914.

OMAHA—The International Sunday School Association headquarters at Chicago has laid claim to one of Omaha's Presbyterian laymen, Frank E. Mayer. March 1 he began his duties as business manager and financial secretary of the association. Dundee, his home church, gave him and his wife a reception. The evening following a large number of the workers of the Douglas County Sunday School Association gathered at a banquet in his honor. Mr. Mayer has been esteemed highly as a Sunday school counselor and executive.

Covenant church, Rev. Charles H. Fleming pastor, is now occupying its new Sunday school building, which represents a greater floor area than that of the church as heretofore used. This latest improvement gives Sunday school facilities as good as those enjoyed by any Presbyterian church of the city. A program and social hour, under the auspices of the men's club, marked the opening of the new rooms.

The chairman and secretary of the home mission committee of each of the synods of Missouri, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota and Nebraska held an all day's conference in this city recently. J. E. McAfee, secretary of the Home Mission Board, presided.

A father and son banquet, attended by 150 persons, was held recently by Lowe Avenue church.

The congregation of First German church gave its new pastor, Rev. J. F. Mueller, a reception Feb. 22.

Parkvale church has organized a healthy young men's athletic club.

Friends of Bellevue College rejoice in the honor that has come to the institution in having its representative win first place in the state oratorical contest. Mr. Hanna's oration was "The Inspiration of History."

Westminster church suffered the loss in three months of a second stanch friend and adviser in the passing away of William Randall. It was in the home of Mr. Randall that the church was born twenty-six years ago, since which time he has served it as an active elder.

Margaret E. Sangster to Be Remembered—Elders Succeed Whitelaw Reid—Federal Council Felicitates President.

NEW YORK—A memorial service for Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster was held in Marble Collegiate Reformed church Sunday afternoon, Feb. 23. Friends of Mrs. Sangster want a permanent memorial to her in the form of a hospital or orphan asylum.

Dr. Edgar W. Work of Fourth church is conducting a Lenten Bible class in the church parlors every Tuesday morning. Seventy-four were present Feb. 25.

The American Seamen's Friend Society has $30,000 promised, conditionally on getting $100,000, which is for a fund to make the institution self-supporting.

Rev. James B. Cochran, who is supported by Central church, will return early this month to Hwaiyuen, China. He has been assisting at the home church for some months. His wife died in the fall.

Dr. St. Clair McKelway, a prominent elder in Brooklyn, has been elected chancellor of New York University to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Whitelaw Reid. Charles B. Alexander, an elder in Fifth Avenue church, has been elected a regent to succeed Mr. Reid.

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, with headquarters in New York, sent to President Wilson a formal expression of "good cheer and prayerful sympathy" on the eve of his assuming the reins of government.

Miss Katharine Duffield, youngest daughter of Dr. Howard Duffield of "old" First church, has volunteered as a foreign missionary and desires to go to China. She is a senior at Wellesley College.

Dr. A. Edwin Keigwin resumed his pulpit Sunday, March 2, after having been out of it since last October on account of severe illness.

GENERAL MOVEMENT FOR CHINA WORK

Practically all the churches gave a service of Sunday, March 2, to the China campaign, which is a movement to assist in getting funds and recruits. At Brick church Rev. Frank W. Bible, Miss Charlotte Hawes and Dr. Arthur J. Brown spoke in the afternoon. Dr. J. C. Garret spoke in Harlem church. At the luncheon for women in Hotel Astor Saturday afternoon there were over 400 present to hear of the work being done in the Oriental republic.

Robert M. Patterson, a senior in Princeton Seminary, who was invited to become assistant to Dr. David G. Wylie at Scotch church, has answered that he cannot see his way clear to accept.

The brotherhood of West-Park church had its annual dinner at the Hotel Marseilles the evening of Feb. 27. Among the speakers were Dr. Arthur J. Brown and Dr. Rufus Johnston, a Baptist.

Northminster church, Rev. Arthur H. Limouze pastor, observed its eighth anniversary beginning Sunday, March 2. The morning preacher was Professor William Adams Brown of Union Seminary. The women of the church served tea to all. At night those who spoke were Rev. William P. Shriver, Mr. Murray and the pastor.

Rev. Albert Dale Gantz of Williamsbridge church, who recently underwent a severe operation, has recovered and is back at work.

Rev. William P. Shriver and Mrs. Edith Terry Bremmer spoke on "Immigration" Feb. 18 before the Woman's Board of Home Missions at the Presbyterian building.

Mrs. Elmer Black, first vice-president of the Church Peace League, spoke Sunday afternoon, Feb. 23, in Harlem church, Dr. John Lyon Caughey pastor.

Among those from this vicinity who attended the annual meeting of the western section of the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance at Toronto were General Ralph E. Prine of Yonkers, Dr. David G. Wylie of Scotch church, Dr. Henry C. Minton of Trenton and Dr. William H. Roberts of Philadelphia.

Clergy and Laity

Rev. W. J. Johnson, who is engaged in the canvass of eastern synods for Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, received the degree of D. D. from Ursinus College, Collegeville, Pa., on Founders' Day of that institution, Feb. 20.

Rev. C. H. Love, pastor of Clifton church, Phœnix, Ariz., was badly burned at Christmas time in rescuing one of his Sunday school pupils who was playing Santa Claus. Mr. Love has just been able to resume his pulpit.

Dr. Charles F. Goss, until lately pastor of the Avondale church, Cincinnati, is spending two months in New York, engaged in writing a history of the Board of Foreign Missions. Mrs. Goss is with him and they are guests of former parishioners in Brooklyn.

Rev. W. C. Scott of Cayucos, Cal., was seriously injured in an automobile accident recently. He was driving the machine, when it ran over a high bank, throwing all occupants out. He was injured internally, and for a few days his life was despaired of.

May Loan Money on Churches

Executive Commission Adopts Report Favoring Change of Policy by Board—Indorses Idea for General Purchasing Agent.

If the Board of Church Erection at its meeting March 10 adopts the report of a subcommittee it will agree to loan part of its endowment funds on church property. This will replace the present rule of loaning permanent funds only on commercial real estate. The new agreement also contemplates setting aside $500,000 of the Kennedy fund for loans on churches, in such sums as the board itself shall deem a safe investment.

This report was formulated by committees of the Executive Commission and the board, and adopted by the commission at its meeting in New York Feb. 26 and 27. If, as expected, the board also shall adopt this report, a long and troublous question will approach solution. Dr. David G. Wylie and Elders Thompson, Deacon and Orr, the commission's committee, were congratulated on the result of negotiations.

This change in policy, it has been pointed out, will necessarily make some difference in the attitude of the board toward foreclosures on churches. Heretofore when loans were made from the board's income only, the board has frequently felt justified in letting a loan lapse rather than to incur the odium of foreclosing a church; but when the board's permanent fund is put out on churches it will have to go to extreme measures, when necessary, to protect itself.

All this adjustment was facilitated by an opinion which the two committees united to ask from Judge Alton B. Parker, former Democratic candidate for the presidency. He held that in his opinion there was no legal objection to investing the Kennedy fund in church property.

In view of the great number of requests which have come to the commission for indorsement of applications which various churches have made to the Board of Church Erection the commission voted that it was not within its province to make such recommendations, but that the responsibility for decisions on applications must rest with the board alone.

The appointment of a single purchasing agent to buy supplies for all the boards was approved. The commission dodged the responsibility of selecting the officer and recommended to the next General Assembly the appointment of a committee consisting of one member of the Executive Commission, one board secretary and one representative from the church at large, who shall be instructed to select the agent and supervise his work.

In regard to the proposal of a single treasurer for all the board, the commission said that the drift of opinion in the church was undoubtedly toward one treasurer for all benevolences, but that the time had not yet arrived for this radical departure.

Recent discussions about the cost of administration in certain of the boards led the Executive Commission to request all boards to prepare a detailed statement showing all salaries and expenses.

The joint executive committee, which acts for the Executive Commission and the boards, was authorized to fill the position of secretary left vacant by the death of Dr. Hubbard and to decide how long the office shall remain at Auburn, N. Y. Doctors Roberts and Little were appointed to prepare a minute on his life and work. It was announced that Mrs. Hubbard had turned over to the joint committee the printing press which Dr. Hubbard and she es-

Closing Sessions of Memphis Laymen's Convention

BY W. C. SMITH

Of the Southern Presbyterian Editorial Staff

THE WEDNESDAY evening session furnished the record attendance of the convention. The auditorium was taxed to its utmost, and when William T. Ellis, editor afield of The Continent—well known and well liked by Southern Presbyterians—arose to deliver the closing address of the evening, he faced more than 2,000 expectant listeners, a representative gathering of the Southern Presbyterian Church. Mr. Ellis, as expected, made good. His theme was "The Christian Phase of America's World Leadership."

Fortified with an almost unlimited array of facts gathered in worldwide personal observations, and with convincing logic as an interpreter of the signs of the times, Mr. Ellis raised America to the pinnacle of world leadership. China, now a republic of 400,000,000 people, had not reconstructed her government after England's constitutional monarchy, but after the democracy of the United States, adopting as her own the principles of government of this country. Everywhere in the Orient and in Africa he had found the oppressed peoples, and potentates as well, eagerly, anxiously looking to the United States of America as the lode star of hope. Men of wealth and prominence, themselves bound to their own countries by patriotism or other unseverable ties, were nevertheless sending their sons to the United States to be educated, that they might absorb and bring back the treasure of American ideals. American ideals have toppled the thrones of Europe and Asia, they have unmade monarchies, they must remake democracies on the broad principles of Jesus. Then with ringing emphasis the speaker pointed out the South's position of leadership at this time of transition as unique, in that God in his providence has preserved its Anglo-Saxon strain in comparative purity, untainted and uncrowded by the swarms of European and Oriental immigration. The great streams of immigration have emptied themselves in ever increasing volume upon the North Atlantic shores, and have then settled or drifted westward in the same latitude. The South has remained, up to this time, comparatively free from the blending of pagan, Oriental and southern European influence in its civic and religious life; therefore the church of the South should furnish leaders for the great task of remaking the world on evangelical principles. Mr. Ellis spoke of the convention as being the gathering of a prepared people at a prepared time to receive the prepared message which God is giving in the march of world events. The address made a profound impression.

The program for Thursday's session was designed to teach the lesson of stewardship of life and possessions and to sound the call for evangelistic effort. Opening with a ringing call to the gospel ministry by Henry H. Sweets, D. D., of Louisville, Ky., followed by an unusual address on social service by W. Woods White of Atlanta, the morning session closed with a presentation of "The Vital Elements in a Christan Life Purpose," by J. Campbell White in his characteristic forceful style. The afternoon session heard an outline of the Assembly's proposed evangelistic campaign by J. P. McCallie, secretary of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in the Southern Church, and by Dr. J. Layton Mauze of St. Louis and Dr. W. M. Anderson of Dallas, Texas. W. E. Doughty, handling the theme of "A Man and His Money," made a telling appeal for the consecration of wealth.

George Innes of Minneapolis made the closing address of the convention. His subject, "What would you be worth if you lost all your money?" was unique. The address was also unique as it was powerful, and a fitting climax to a notable meeting.

INVESTING FOR PROFIT

demands a better return than three cents per year for an able-bodied American dollar—it means double that amount. Three per cent is starvation wages—not profit but loss. It stands for the other three per cent you do not get—the three per cent the bank gets for re-investing your funds. And they invest them in sound first mortgages—something you might better do for yourself. Others are doing it—investors big and small. Putting their money in reliable first mortgages—secured by two to four times the amount involved. These Oklahoma Mortgages are the very same the banks buy with your money. Financial Situation

With Foreign and Domestic Trade Large Business Interests Watch New President — Supply of Cattle Short — Small Bonds Popular.

Although the possible disturbing influence of President Wilson and the special session of Congress has been discounted to some extent, business men and investors generally are watching with keen interest any tendency of the new administration which will affect present business practice. Conditions in the business world are generally good. The foreign trade of the country for January and for 1912 exceeded all previous records, and full employment has been promised by all large industries. Buying for the distant future is, however, tinged with conservatism. The outlook for crops this year. as well as the possible action of the administration, will be a large factor in future business.

The seven bills urged by Mr. Wilson as governor of New Jersey were passed a short time before he left office. These new laws seek to change in many vital respects the attitude of the state toward corporations. One of the most important of the new measures establishes personal liability of officers and directors of those companies which violate the laws against pools and combinations. Jail sentences are to be imposed on conviction. This has had the result already of the announced removal of the headquarters of a Philadelphia electric railway company from New Jersey to Delaware.

Waste on Farms Serious

Absence of trouble with employees and an open winter greatly aided the income of railways for December. According to the statement of all the roads compiled by Bradstreet's the lines in the Northwest led the country in increase of net earnings for the month with 27 per cent. The increase in net of all the roads in comparing the two Decembers was 11 1-10 per cent. This increase probably will tend to be maintained if the ideas of the agricultural commissioners of the various roads can be instilled into the farmers along the lines. It has been shown by a Rock Island official, for example, that the value of corn stalks made into ensilage is 60 per cent of the value of the grain itself. Although many farmers make use of their stalks for food, a very large sum is wasted annually because the stalks are burned or are permitted to dry in the fields. Another source of waste to which the attention of farmers is being called is that of killing calves for veal. The decrease in cattle over the country is very real, and prolonged investigation seems to carry out the claims of packing houses that the price of meat has been advanced on account of the large shortage in supply. In January there were exported from this country only 276 beef animals as against 10,624 the same month last year. During the last seven months the United States sent abroad 4,616 animals, as against 71,466 the corresponding month a year ago. During the whole of 1912 the export of animals numbered 90,000, while in 1904 the number was 593,409.

The recent sale by a New York bond house of 150 bonds of $100 denomination in a few days is looked upon as a considerable feat by financial journals. These bonds were secured by the property of a public utility company in an Indiana county seat and were taken almost wholly by small investors. Another item of interest to small investors is that contained in a recently published computation of the increase of $1,000 at compound interest. Such a sum loaned at 4 per cent will in five years equal $1,216 and will be more than doubled in eighteen years. At 6 per cent the same sum will equal $1,338 in five years and will double itself in twelve years. The astonishing power of money to multiply itself when once a small amount is invested is being recognized more and more largely by people of very moderate means. Many of these are turning to farm mortgages as a means of bringing them a good income with absolute security of principal.

Brief Bits of Business News

—It is a wise man who always remembers that the risk involved, as well as the promised return, must be considered in making an investment.

—The daily receipts of the post office department have reached a total of $2,427,000. The average person now spends $2.60 a year for postage.

Bradford Horton, Man

"Well, then, of course, you lose your portion."

The hour Bradford had thought could never come, after his father's death, was on him. He met it like a man.

"Ansley, I have no portion in that estate. It humiliates me awfully to tell you, but Henry Horton was only my father by adoption. I buried my father in Mount Logan cemetery last year. As he did not wish his identity known, however, I have had to keep it secret."

The young man flushed with the effort of the confession.

"All that's no news to me, Bradford," said the lawyer. "Oh, yes," not pausing for Bradford's exclamation of surprise, "I learned all that last year at the time of your difficulty. It was only a matter of a few inquiries of legal correspondents. But it's not necessary for you to go around publishing what you've just told me. To all intents and purposes, of course, you're the son of Henry Horton."

"Ansley," cried Bradford, half stammering in his amazement, "Ansley, do you mean to say you've known this for more than a year?"

"That's it, my boy."

"And never told your father? Never told Joe? Ansley, you're a great man and a true friend."

The lawyer wriggled uncomfortably; he disliked thanks. "Cut the compliments, Horton. I'm a lawyer, not a woman; it's my business to receive information, not to give it. Preachers need the same talent, by the way. Now," briskly, "what's your plan?"

"Oh, I'll go to Glencoe as soon as I can arrange it."

"What is it they want of you?"

"I suppose they want me to straighten out the books. Conrad knows I'm an expert."

"And you'll give up that fishing trip with Joe and me?"

"Looks like it. The job may take all summer, from the sound of that telegram."

"You're good stuff, Bradford. Go ahead. It's the thing to do. But let me say one word. When you get there, don't talk. And before you go, don't talk. And when you come back, don't talk. A silent tongue will never land a man in a fool's paradise."

"All right. I'll remember. And apropos of that, Ansley, you won't feel it necessary now to say anything more than you have in the past about my—my father's identity? You see, I promised him it shouldn't be known here. You can understand why he was ashamed, in view of all the past."

"Surely; I'll hold my tongue. But it would be a good deal better for you if I didn't."

"That's neither here nor there. A promise is a promise, more than ever when it's to a dead man. Anyway, I'm getting along all right. Did you know the directors of the seminary have doubled my pay?"

"So I heard. You deserve it. You're surely coming back, my boy?"

Bradford assured him of it and said good-by. Two days later, alighting from the train at Glencoe, he was met by his brother-in-law.

"Good boy," said Vanderbosch with a hearty greeting. "We've got a pretty tangle here."

"How did you come to send for me? Mother wouldn't——"

"Oh, mother's away—in California, visiting. Where's your luggage?"

"I've only a bag. I'll take it up to the inn and then come on over to the house."

"The inn? Now, that won't do, Bradford. Mother isn't there, you know, and Anna has your room all ready. Why, you'd hurt her worse than the failure."

That night and the following morning they told him about the state of things. The wreck of the bank was as complete and ruinous as it was sudden. It had been precipitated, Conrad said, by his discovery in a roundabout way that the president and cashier had been making ventures in Wall street. With suspicions aroused as to the integrity of the management, and concerned for the interest of his wife, Vanderbosch had suggested a partition of the estate. It had never been divided, and Thomas Horton, the executor, was far too closely allied in business with the bank officials to suit Vanderbosch. He had been a large borrower at the bank, and to secure this accommodation had been compelled to indorse for the president and cashier in their schemes. He met his brother-in-law's suggestion with the advice that he mind his own business, but shortly after a check of his, used by his sister, was returned to her marked "No funds."

This was the climax; and when another appeal to Thomas Horton brought only another rebuff, Vanderbosch had notified the controller of the currency that in his opinion the bank was being looted by its officers. A bank examiner was on the scene speedily, and two days after his appearance early passers were surprised to see a placard on the bank door, reading, "Bank Closed by Order of the Controller of the Currency.—Anthony Cathcart, Special Agent."

"Of course it caused a terrible uproar," Conrad went on. "Before noon it was reported for miles around, and there was the usual crowd that collects at such times—everybody wanting his money and nobody able to get it."

"Oh, it was dreadful, Bradford," Anna broke in. "I was so sorry for the poor people. And we hardly knew what to do ourselves, for we'd hardly a cent."

"You said in your message the cashier was dead?" Bradford asked.

"Found dead in his barn next day—suicide, of course. When the books were examined they were found most irregular, and they put the teller and the bookkeeper in jail. Tom disappeared the first day—we've heard nothing of him since. Cathcart wanted an assistant to straighten out the books, and we thought of you at once, so I telegraphed. That's all, I guess."

"It's enough. Conrad, what have you to live on?"

"My income."

"That won't be enough."

"Enough or not, it's all we have."

"How long has mother been away?"

"Three months—we don't know when she will get home."

Bradford asked no more questions. Before noon he was installed as bookkeeper for the receiver at a salary of $100 per month, with the understanding that he could stay but three months. Beginning work on the account of the Henry Horton estate, he found in a day or two that it was largely overdrawn and the overdraft secured by the valueless notes of his brother Thomas, so that Anna and his mother were practically penniless. That night he handed Anna his own draft. "That will get mother home," he said simply. "But don't tell her where it came from." The money represented his savings for the past year.

For weeks Bradford toiled early and late, earnestly, sometimes almost discouraged. Out of his salary he helped to meet the running expense of the big house, so that matters went on quite smoothly, Conrad's income being materially increased by his engagement as attorney for Mr. Cathcart. After Mrs. Horton's arrival, her son moved his headquarters to the Inwood inn, and no persuasion from his sister could make him change his mind. Night and day the young man worked, until Cathcart saw that he was growing pale and thin, and that the three months would be gone before the work was done.

"Mr. Horton," he said one morning, "this will never do. We must have more help. I am not dissatisfied, but I fear for your health. I can get a man from Washington, but prefer to get one nearer, if you know of anyone."

"I do," said Bradford. "I know of a good one."

"Where is he?"

"In Albany."

"Experienced?"

"Yes."

"Knows bank work?"

"Perfectly."

"What is his address?"

Bradford gave it. "I have one request to make," he added. "Don't suggest to him that I gave you his name."

The receiver agreed, and at once entered into correspondence with the Albany man. As a result, one morning B. Oren-Toole walked into the Glencoe County National bank.

Bradford was working in the main banking room. He turned to see who had entered, but gave no sign of recognition. "What can I do for you?" he asked.

"Is there a Mr. Cathcart here?" In his heart Oren-Toole thought he had been trapped, but he gave no hint of it.

"Yes; he is in the inner office. Who shall I say wishes to see him?"

The caller gave his name, and on Bradford's return was shown in to Mr. Cathcart. In a half hour they emerged together, and the receiver introduced Mr. Oren-Toole.

"I have hired him as assistant for you. Go over the books with him."

Oren-Toole had never been so uncomfortable in his whole life as at that moment. He followed Horton's lead through the work that had already been done, asking few questions, but comprehending instantly the extent of the ruin and its causes.

All that day the two men worked in silence, broken only by the questions asked by the newcomer for information. The receiver took the new clerk with him when he went to his

Lafayette and the Ministry

BY JOHN BALCOM SHAW

Lafayette College, which is now making its appeal for an increased endowment, is no educational novitiate or ecclesiastical adventurer. Already it is hoary with age, having behind it not less than eighty years of splendid service to the church and the country—a record as honorable and inspiring as that which any college of the land can show. It has demonstrated its ability to put money to the most resultant use; it has given to the republic a long line of earnest, well equipped and useful leaders, who have served their fellow men with outstanding fidelity and devotion; and it has helped to keep the torch of consecrated Christian learning flaming high within the sphere of modern education.

What claim it lays upon the Bible-loving people of the land! With the book of books out of our public schools and our state universities, and practically ignored in most of our other institutions of learning, a college that actually and ably teaches the Bible in regular course, conducting examinations therein and offering prizes to encourage its study; that requires a course in Christian ethics and Christian evidences; that bases its teaching of philosophy upon the Bible, and in all its scientific instructions keeps the Bible in the place of honor and command, ought surely to fare better at the hands of wealthy Christians than those institutions which exclude religion from both its curricula and its official circles.

But turn to its roll of graduates and mark the starred names. Here are senators, congressmen, jurists, surgeons of note and in profusion, but there is one distinguishing mark that occurs with unusual frequency. What higher mission could any college fulfill than to have put 650 men into the ministry and sent scores of missionaries to the home and foreign fields. How has it done this? It has been no happen so. The type of men it draws to its classrooms will in part account for it—men of the more mature and serious type, men born of struggle and bent upon serviceable lives, many of whom are responsible for their own support and therefore more highly prize what they have acquired. Lafayette's singular power to evoke and inspire men is undoubtedly a second cause, for this she has to an exceptional degree; while the training she gives, the confirmation of faith which one experiences within her walls, the constant summons she addresses to what is deepest and highest within her students, her unfailing recognition of God and human accountability to God, could yield only the richest and most abiding harvest. As a result, she has graduates in every part of the world helping to forward the work of the Lord—in metropolitan pulpits and home mission stations, in college faculties and at the head of public schools, in city mission chapels and on the foreign field, and all standing for pure religion and worthily maintaining a Christian leadership.

Our churches and church people must better support this type of college, if they would have a continuing ministry and maintain the traditions and influence of the Christian church. A half a million dollars given to Lafayette College just now will mean large dividends to the kingdom in all time to come.

midday meal, and in that interval from business attempted to learn something of his history, but without much success. Oren-Toole had learned from some source the maxim of Ansley Jickers. But within a week Cathcart had seen for himself that neither he nor Horton knew anything more about banking than did Oren-Toole.

"What's your game, Drum?" Thus the new clerk addressed Bradford a few days after his arrival. Receiving no answer, he renewed his question. "I say, Drum, what's your game?" Once more there was dead silence at the other desk, and neither man spoke again for the rest of the morning.

Nonplused, but still an Irishman, Oren-Toole resolved to try new tactics. Next day, in his pleasantest manner, "What is your game, Mr. Horton?" he asked

"I'm playing no game. What makes you think I am?"

"The fact that you sent Mr. Cathcart after me. I suppose this is the first move toward trapping me."

"Wrong supposition, Oren-Toole."

"Why didn't you answer me yesterday when I asked you that question?"

"I have no recollection of your speaking to me yesterday."

"I did. I asked you this same question twice."

"Well, to be frank with you, I heard you ask the question twice, but as it was not addressed to me, I paid no attention."

"Not addressed to you? Isn't your name Drum?"

"No."

"Wasn't that old chap's name Drum?"

"No."

"Well, what was it?"

"What did he tell you it was?"

"He told me his name was Andrew Drum, and that you were his son. I suppose the whole story was a lie. I never believed him."

"No, not the whole. I am the son of that old man."

"Well, what's your name, then?"

"As you know, my name is Horton. I treated my father in a very unfilial sort of way when I shipped him off with that money, but it was lucky for you I did. If I'd kept him over night and my room had been searched in the morning, where would you be now?"

Oren-Toole subsided uncomfortably into silence, not, however, entirely satisfied about Horton and his intentions. Late that afternoon he could bear his uncertainty no longer.

"Say, if that old chap was your father," he asked abruptly, "how do you come by your name? Is it anything to do with these folks here?"

"My name is that of my adopted father, Henry Horton, the founder and first president of this bank. Thomas Horton is his son."

"So that's it. You might have said so at first."

"I had not the heart," said Bradford with a smile, "to deprive you of the pleasure of asking questions, Mr. Oren-Toole.

The other laughed with a mixture of pique and chagrin. "Did you send Cathcart after me?" he asked presently.

"He asked if I knew of a competent bank clerk who could help him here, and I gave him your name."

"What for?"

"To help Mr. Cathcart out, and to help you to be a man."

Oren-Toole was silent for a half hour. It is safe to say that he did more thinking than he had ever done before in an equal time. How his thoughts ran appeared when he next spoke.

"Why didn't Elmore and Maxwell go after me when they found where I was?"

"I had previously asked them, if they ever did learn where you were, not to go after you, and they had agreed not to do so."

"What made you do that?" Oren-Toole could hardly believe his ears.

"Well, for two or three reasons. You did not mean to steal that money; you meant to have it appear that I stole it. The money was not lost; it was all returned to the bank. The only person hurt in any way was myself, and I was not willing to have you sent to state's prison on my account. That would have made a criminal of you, and there's too good stuff in you to make a criminal of. You're going to be a straightforward sort of a man hereafter, I reckon."

There was another silence, while Horton wondered how Oren-Toole would begin next time. He was not kept wondering long.

"The old man got away with $200 of that money on a big spree in Albany. They could have held me liable for that."

"It was returned to the bank."

"Who paid it back? You?"

"Yes."

When his assistant came in next morning Bradford was already at work.

"Oren-Toole," he began, "will you——"

"Oh, cut it out, Horton, cut it out!"

"I don't understand. Cut what out?"

"That Oren-Toole business. My name's not Oren-Toole, any more than yours is Drum. I'm just Barney O'Toole, a red-headed Irishman. I fooled the Prestonbury crowd, but I can't keep it up with you." (To be continued)

Lafayette's Value to the Church

In the eighty years of its existence, Lafayette College has sent into the Gospel Ministry 627 men. Of these fifty-six were Foreign Missionaries, four giving their lives as martyrs.

Most of these men received tuition free of cost, an enormous saving to the Church in training her ministry. (The regular tuition fee at Lafayette is one hundred dollars a year.)

They received the highest culture the college afforded. They were given the splendid character for which the college stands.

In addition to these ministerial leaders and missionaries, Lafayette has trained a great army of God fearing men who as Elders and Christian laymen are serving the cause of Christ in the professions and in business.

Does the Church want such service to cease?

The Committee of the Synod of Pennsylvania

Rev. William E. Brooks, Chairman,
Allentown, Pennsylvania.

Twenty countries in two hemispheres have contributed the 174 students now in Dubuqu [illegible] College and Seminary. M [illegible] came directly from their foreign homes to this Presbyterian institution. They hope to be preachers and must be trained to be manly men. They will be Christian leaders among their fellow countrymen in America and thus will help to solve the immigration problem by the only final method. Many of them are earning their own way. They are hard working students and class room activities leave little time for other things. They greatly need a gymnasium in which they may exercise to keep in good health. The building will cost $30,000—a small sum considering what it means to this body of men. This may be your opportunity to have a share in the further work of a useful institution. The service that Dubuque is rendering to this country goes far beyond the efforts of graduates who are leaders in the community life of their people from Germany, Russia, Bulgaria, Austria, Mexico and other countries. The institution wants to send out men fully equipped—spiritually, intellectually, physically—to make their work count to the utmost. May we not give you more facts about this need--and any other information you may desire? What you can do, or what someone you know can do, may be discussed afterward. Write President C. M. Steffens, D.D., Dubuque, Iowa.

A chance to enlist in a kindly service

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS:

The Continent has many requests every week to place deserving institutions on its free list.

There are thousands of worthy objects. Thus:

Home missionaries
Foreign missionaries
Retired ministers
Orphans' homes
Industrial homes
"Shut ins"
Church libraries
Y. M. C. A. libraries
College libraries
Old people's homes
Soldiers' homes
Institutional churches
Sunday school libraries

And so on. Then there are opportunities to present Christian truths to the public. Christian Scientists are about the only persons who avail themselves of the opportunity to place literature in railway stations. There are thousands of hotels where men cannot secure good literature.

The number of copies The Continent may legally send free is limited; and extra postage is required. And while it may seem a small thing to send one copy one time, every paper represents an actual expenditure of money that, multiplied by fifty-two and by hundreds of beneficiaries, represents an amount no one would expect to be paid out solely by us.

Here is the chance to do a kindly service at a small cost which any one can meet. Think it over. If you do not know of a person or institution that would benefit we can find one readily enough. Send us a card indicating your desire and you will receive information as to rate, and the recipient of your kindness will be informed of it.

Workable Plan to Help Negroes to Homes

Helping negroes to help themselves, Boggs Academy, Burke county, Georgia, under the Freedmen's Board is offering to colored families small farms, which they may use as their own. Most of the land in the vicinity of this school is owned in large tracts by whites who will not sell in small parcels. High rents, together with large payment for equipment and seed, prevent many of the negroes from getting much of a start as farmers. The board now has fifteen families on small farms under rental, where they are reaching a higher scale in civilization.

These farms are operated in connection with the academy and church, which provide religious and academic instruction. So successful have the farm homes become that there are now demands for land amounting to 1,000 acres, which cannot be supplied, and 5,000 acres could be used. Appeal is being made for investment in the uplift of the negro race through this Presbyterian agency. The board would like $50,000 to enlarge this work at Boggs Academy. It has been suggested that fifty Sunday schools, societies or churches might pledge $1,000 each to this work. The land is rented by the board or sold, and the rent in ten years brings back the cost. Meanwhile the tenant is self-supporting and is under Christian influences. Communication may be established through John L. Phelps, Boggs Academy, Keysville, Ga., or the Freedmen's Board, 513 Bessemer building, Pittsburg, Pa.

Around the Shop

"Just about the time," said the pessimist, "that a man has reached the point in life where he knows pretty well what is good for him, he realizes that he hasn't much of life left."

"That's just your morbid philosophy," responded the Around-the-Shop Man consolingly. "You ought to have learned when you first started out to keep so busy looking for the good things that you wouldn't have time to go moping around discouraging your youthful friends."

"Yes, but——"

"Oh, I know what you are going to say—that facts are facts, and so on. I don't particularly blame you for not getting your program of life adjusted earlier, so far as your natural limitations go. Lots of us miss out because we simply aren't bright enough to discover all the helpful things. But we have no excuse when somebody leads us right up to the good thing. For example, as a periodical has recently inquired, why should men have to be reminded that carrying life insurance is a duty? Why shouldn't they go after it themselves as a matter of course? But they don't——"

"Well, sometimes——"

"Whatever you were going to say is O. K. Why, there are a good many people, good Presbyterians, too, who have to be reminded that they need The Continent. Their lives are missing from week to week just the thing that would make everything good they do count for more, and inspire them to do more things that count. Now, we can't very well send a special representative to each one of these people, but if each one of our subscribers would awaken one other good Presbyterian, and then that Presbyterian would give one other——Wait a moment!"

Some folks just simply can't wait for even the most interesting conversation to be completed when they have received the impulse to do a useful service.

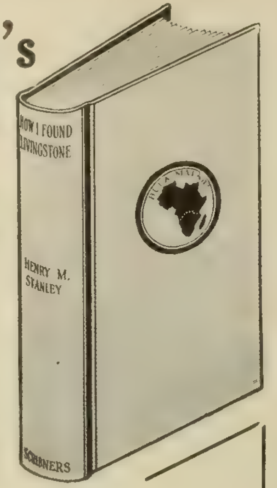
How I Found Livingstone

—Henry M. Stanley's World-Famous Book



Issued in a popular, inexpensive
CENTENARY EDITION

Introduction by ROBERT E. SPEER, Secretary Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions.

Profusely Illustrated, $2.00 net, mailed promptly on remittance

In this centennial year of the birth of David Livingstone, the publication of Stanley's famous account of how he found the lost missionary in the heart of Africa is appropriate. Livingstone's centenary will be celebrated all over the world, not only because he was a great missionary, but because to him, with Stanley, must be chiefly ascribed the fact that the light of civilization has now penetrated into almost every part of the "Dark Continent."

Children Missing!

IS THE CHURCH TO LOSE ITS CHILDREN?

The question is rife among evangelical leaders on both sides the Atlantic. A stir of new zeal in behalf of the children is shot through with an altogether unwonted quiver of anxiety.

Sir Robertson Nicoll in The British Weekly gravely studies the returns of a church census in Liverpool, and glaring decreases in attendance on Christian worship, as compared with ten and twenty years ago, he attributes to the absence of young people and children.

The children counted in earlier enumerations are still going to church, the editor thinks. But they are grown up now, and few present-day children come in their stead. Who then will be the grown-up attenders ten and twenty years hence?

In America church censuses are neither as regularly nor as carefully taken as is the custom in Britain. So there are no available statistics touching attendance on general congregational worship But the figures which have awakened forebodings in the United States are in some regards the more serious, for they suggest uneasy doubts about the Sunday school.

Presbyterian statistics for Sunday schools illustrate what is meant. Comparisons of figures for 1902 and 1912 demonstrate that nominal increase in these schools is really loss. Ten years ago the Sunday school enrollment in the Presbyterian Church U. S. A. exceeded the communicant membership of the church by about 18,000. Since that time the communicant roll has been increased by 235,000 names; the Sunday school roll by only 169,000.

Typical strong synods show this difference glaringly. New York Synod has today 28,000 more church members than ten years ago, but the average attendance in its Sunday schools is 2,900 less.

There are 21,000 more Presbyterians in Illinois now than in 1902, but only 7,500 more children are going to Presbyterian Sunday schools. Ohio has gained 33,000 in membership, 5,000 in the Sunday schools; Pennsylvania, 52,000 in the church, 9,000 in the Sunday schools.

But this isn't all. Dr. W. H. Roberts has been getting at something still more bothersome. In hundreds of schools, where there are plenty of children, nothing is being accomplished toward leading the boys and girls into the church.

The Continent lately printed startling figures which Dr. Roberts has compiled, showing that in five of the strongest Presbyterian synods 600 Sunday schools had 40,000 young people under instruction for a whole year without inducing a single one of them to confess Christ. To take the whole country together would treble those figures at the very least.

Everybody who knows anything at all about churches knows that they grow mainly by taking into membership young people trained from childhood under their own influence.

That failure to gain even one out of say 150,000 scholars in a whole year is a failure big enough for the whole church to drop through to oblivion, if the hole is not stopped.

What's the matter? Well, "race suicide" has something to do with it. As Dr. John R. Davies puts it, "You can't make Sunday schools out of empty cradles in Christian homes."

That is much too big a question to be handled here. What can be said, however, about it with much assurance is this:

If a Christian husband and wife don't feel a compelling sense of Christian duty urging them to reenforce righteousness in the next generation with a family of children raised in a Christian home, it must be because they have never unselfishly considered Christian duty at all.

Then there is a sort of similar default among a good many church people—pastors and elders particularly—who have lost sight of the importance of building Christ's church generation on generation.

It is a hideous mockery of true evangelism which sometimes persuades Christian leaders that to get the strong men of the community into church—the merchants and manufacturers, the lawyers and doctors and professors, the mayors and judges and congressmen—makes a bigger trophy of success than getting the children in.

Yet it is a fact that some pay mighty little attention to the children and run around to capture some big man or two in town, because such accessions give so much more prestige to the church.

But the worst blunder of all is the notion of superficial parents that children ought not to be influenced in religion but should be left to choose religion for themselves when they come to maturity.

This colossal folly flies so squarely in the face of all the natural order of parentage and childhood that it is almost incredible to find it in sane minds.

What, in all the universe of rational natural arrangements, do people imagine that parents are for, if not to train their children in religion?

No other obligation is so sacred in fatherhood or motherhood as the obligation to make the child aware of his heavenly Father.

And one profoundly important means of that introduction is to take the child regularly from earliest years to the assemblage of those who gather to worship the almighty God.

Obstructing this religious right of the child stand two wicked absurdities. Both deserve to be swept aside by ruthless disgust of sensible people.

One is the nonsensical prejudice against bringing babies to church for fear they will disturb somebody. What harm if they do?

The other is the ghastly delusion that if children are compelled to go to church when small, they will turn against it when older.

The few men who put up that excuse for not attending church can generally be proved to have switched off the track at a much less occult point of departure—selfishness or indolence.

On the other hand a thousand instances against every one of these can be cited to show that a fixed habit of church attendance from childhood has confessedly become in mature life a sheet anchor holding a man fast to righteousness amid desperate temptations.

"Why do you go to church?" a minister asked a strong congregation of metropolitan business men lately. And nearly all said it was because their parents took them in childhood. And all gave thanks for it.

Take the children to church. There is the remedy for all this alarm about the children

The World

The Cabinet Chosen by the New President

President Wilson's cabinet selections have been generally commended, for it is recognized that his advisers are men of ability. More of them are from the South than has been the case with recent cabinets. One peculiar incident reported is that Secretary Lane had never met the President until the day Mr. Wilson took the oath of office. Following is the list:

Secretary of state, William Jennings Bryan of Nebraska, thrice candidate for President; publicist, lay preacher and world traveler.

Secretary of the treasury, William G. McAdoo of New York, widely known as the builder of tunnels under the Hudson river, a man of affairs.

Secretary of war, Lindley M. Garrison of New Jersey, formerly a judge, one of the new figures in national affairs brought out by Mr. Wilson.

Attorney general, James C. McReynolds of Tennessee and New York City, well known by defendants in antitrust cases, for four years assistant to the attorney general.

Postmaster general, Albert S. Burleson of Texas, formerly a member of the house and a lawyer and planter.

Secretary of the navy, Josephus Daniels of North Carolina, an able editor and long a member of the Democratic national committee.

Secretary of interior, Franklin K. Lane of California, well known as chairman of the interstate commerce commission.

Secretary of agriculture, David F. Houston of Missouri, who has headed agricultural colleges in Kansas and Texas. He has been chancellor of Washington University, St. Louis, since 1908.

Secretary of commerce, William C. Redfield of New York, manufacturer and business man, regarded as an authority on tariff in the house of representatives, which he has just left.

Secretary of labor, William B. Wilson of Pennsylvania, congressman, formerly a union labor official, a Scotch miner of executive ability. This is the new department created by the last Congress.

The Vice-President as a Cabinet Member

A good many changes in manners and methods are coming with the advent of a new President and a new (or revivified) party in power at Washington. Some of the changes are ephemeral; others will be of lasting effect. Among the latter will doubtless be the policy proposed by President Wilson of getting and keeping in close touch with Congress. He proposes to visit the room set apart for the President at the capitol frequently instead of only on formal occasions or at the closing hours of a session of Congress to sign bills. This will be something no President has made a practice of. Mr. Wilson also wants the vice-president to be made, ex-officio, a member of the cabinet, thereby bringing that official into intimate relation with executive policies and problems and through him reaching the senate—of which the vice-president is the presiding officer. Incidentally the office of vice-president would be given actual and not merely nominal importance, and the incumbent would become a valuable member of the government, even though no accident of death should bring him the chief responsibility.

Final Veto of President Taft Commended

President Taft followed up his much criticised veto of the Webb bill with another veto for which he has been widely praised. He disapproved the sundry civil appropriation bill because of the provision in it forbidding the use of government funds for the enforcement of the antitrust law against labor unions and organizations to fix the prices of farm products. The idea that any class, whether it be workingmen or farmers, the rich or the poor, should be exempt from the operation of a statute was denounced as vicious by President Taft. Again, the method by which it was attempted to open a loophole was not open and aboveboard. If the Sherman law is to be evaded in part it should be done by direct amendment to the act itself and not by leaving the department of justice powerless to enforce part of it.

Secretary Bryan on Our Foreign Policy

To a group of newspaper men who asked the new secretary of state what he proposed to do in Mexico, Central America, in China and at other points where diplomatic complications are threatening, Mr. Bryan replied by referring them to an address made by him in Indianapolis in 1900. Though thirteen years old it is mighty good reading right now for anyone interested in promoting international peace and good will.

Here are some significant excerpts:

"I can conceive of a national destiny surpassing the glories of the present and the past—a destiny which meets the responsibilities of today and measures up to the possibilities of the future.

"Behold, a republic standing erect while empires all around are bowed beneath the weight of their own armaments—a republic whose flag is loved while other flags are only feared. Behold a republic increasing in population, in wealth, in strength and in influence, solving the problems of civilization and hastening the coming of a universal brotherhood—a republic which shakes thrones and dissolves aristocracies by its silent example.

"Behold a republic gradually but surely becoming the supreme moral factor in the world's progress and the accepted arbiter of the world's disputes—a republic whose history, like the path of the just, "is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day!"

Investigation of Vice and Women's Wages

The question of vice and the wages of women and girl workers is now being investigated on an extensive scale by a committee of the Illinois senate headed by the new lieutenant governor. Julius Rosenwald, head of the great Sears-Roebuck mail order house of Chicago, was minutely questioned as to the rate of pay of his nearly 5,000 female employees. He gave $9.12 as the average weekly wage. To girls under 16 years the minimum is $5. Exactly 1,465, he testified, received less than $8, and the $8 minimum is paid to all girls not living at home. Women at the head of departments earn as high as $3,000 a year. The large profits and surplus of the concern were brought out by the investigators.

In connection with Mr. Rosenwald's philanthropic activities he was asked about his membership in the Chicago vice commission and the American Vigilance Association, the latter designed to crush the white slave traffic. Mr. Rosenwald gave it as his deliberate conviction, based on study and observation, that there is no direct relation between low wages and immorality. Home environment, he asserted, played a large part in the question of vice, though the wage question is the easiest and most natural thing for a girl to blame who goes wrong.

The vice-president of Marshall Field and Company, James Simpson, regularly employing 4,222 girls and women, testified that none received less than $5, and the average wage is $10.76. Like Mr. Rosenwald, he believed that an infinitesimal percentage go wrong for the first time because of monetary reasons. E. F. Mandel, president of Mandel Brothers' department store, gave the average wage as $9.86, ranging from $3 for young errand girls up to $35 as a maximum. The firm wrote the committee stating that hereafter the lowest wage would be $4 a week.

Mr. Mandel gave the following estimate of the living expenses of a working girl maintaining herself without home assistance:

Room rent and board	$4 00
Lunches	.70
Carfare	.60
Clothing	1.00
Laundry	.25
Doctor and dentist	.60
Church contribution	.10
Total	$7.25

So far as it has developed, the theory ruling the committee's investigation is that higher wages would decrease vice, and that the way to insure higher wages is through a minimum wage law for women. The employers declare that a state law of this character would make it impossible for Illinois to compete with other states, and say a statute of this kind should be national.

Rowdyism Mars Suffrage Parade; Mr. Mann Scored

Unfortunately the suffrage parade in Washington the day before the presidential inauguration was marred by disorder and rowdyism on the part of hoodlum spectators insufficiently controlled by the police of the capital. Charges of mismanagement and neglect of duty were made against Major Sylvester, the chief of police, and a committee of the senate was appointed to investigate and report. The anger of the women after their carefully planned parade was nearly spoiled was intensified by a slighting remark made in the house of representatives by Congressman James R. Mann of Chicago, the leader of the Republican minority. Referring to one parader, who was insulted by a hoodlum, he said she "ought to have been at home"—which suggestion is bringing down upon his head no end of caustic criticism and official resolutions from various organizations.

New Parliament Has Liberals' Program

Another session of parliament opened on Monday after a momentary recess and the Liberal party program will once more be pressed against the opposition of the lords and the so-called Tories. The Irish home rule bill and the Welsh church disestablishment bill are to be repassed over the temporary veto of the upper house. A bill to do away with plural voting may precipitate another conflict over woman's suffrage. If these and some other matters of secondary importance can be disposed of the commons can then turn to the land problem as enunciated by Chancellor Lloyd George. The work of real estate valuation has been proceeding for some time, the ultimate object being to make the land a national revenue producer, as it is in America and other countries. It means an enormous increase in taxes for the privileged or landed classes, and will arouse the fiercest kind of opposition when it comes to a climax in parliament.

The Unionist party, which lost popularity and followers because of its advocacy of a tariff on imports, comprehending a "tax on food," is said to have decided to drop food taxes in order more successfully to fight the triumphant Liberal coalition headed by Premier Asquith.

Revolt in Mexican State of Sonora

Huerta and his de facto government in Mexico are coping with an energetic revolt in Sonora in the northern part of the country, but it appears to be a question of only a short time before all the "rebels" will either yield or be wiped out. A sensational statement was published by The New York World to the effect that American Ambassador Wilson, prior to the overthrow and assassination of President Madero, had connived with an American clique to handicap the Madero administration. However, these allegations evidently had little weight with the state department, for Secretary Bryan wired the ambassador in congratulation of his conduct during the recent crisis in Mexico City. The fact that about two-fifths of the total wealth of Mexico is owned by Americans makes the Mexican situation of vital interest in the United States.

Janina, Important Turkish Stronghold, Falls

Capture of Janina by the Greeks last week gave a different aspect to the Turko-Balkan war and immensely enhanced the prestige of Greece with her three allies. Heretofore the Bulgarians have done the bulk of the fighting and gained the greater part of the glory. Janina was one of the three cities which the Turks stubbornly and successfully defended, the others being Scutari and Adrianople. It it situated in southern Albania, just north of the Greek border, and was defended by a large force. If the Montenegrins and Servians had been able to do equally as well at Scutari in the northwest Turkey in Europe would sooner have been reduced to a remnant.

Adrianople, the chief prize in contention, was still holding out the first of the week, but the Ottoman government had indicated a willingness to surrender it as the price of peace. The ministry headed by Shefket Pasha found it was no more able to make headway than were Kiamil Pasha and his deposed cabinet, but the talk of yielding to the demands of the allies stirred up fresh discord and revolt in Constantinople.

—Former Secretary of the Treasury MacVeagh is being severely criticised for compromising over a million dollars' worth of oleomargarine tax claims against some of the prominent packers for a tenth of the amount in cash; also for settling import undervaluations of equal magnitude by the John Wanamaker stores for a similar fractional payment. On the other hand, the outgoing secretary is credited in an efficiency commission report with saving the government $8,000,000 by improving the system of his department.

—That increasing attention is being given to socialism is indicated by the fact that Yale University will next year offer a course in the subject. Professor H. C. Emery, formerly chairman of the government tariff commission, will give the course, which is to be "a study of the legal foundations of the present economic organization," with special attention to socialism.

General Every-Member Canvass Adopted

At the last meeting of the Executive Commission of the General Assembly U. S. A. the denomination was committed completely to the "every-member canvass" plan for all benevolences, which was first employed in the United Presbyterian Church and then adopted in the Southern Presbyterian Church and the Reformed Church in America.

The decision is that every year in March, beginning with 1914, a general effort shall be made to present to every member within the whole denomination a subscription blank on which all the benevolent causes of the church shall be enumerated, with spaces to indicate a subscription for each. To push the campaign of education, leading up to this month of special canvass, a general committee is to be provided, representing all the boards and agencies as well as the Executive Commission; and this committee is to work through the executive commissions of the presbyteries, fortified and assisted as far as possible with a special campaign committee in each presbyterial territory. An executive secretary will be chosen to develop the work denominationally on a consistent plan under the guidance of the united committee.

Although, as stated, the United Presbyterians first put into effect denominational action along this line, the idea of an every-member canvass seems to date from the undertaking financed by Henry P. Crowell a few years since in the Synod of Illinois in the interest of foreign missions.

Organizing Church Forces for Peace

The Federal Council of Churches announces the organization of the Church Peace League of America, which was authorized by the quadrennial council meeting in Chicago last December. The action of the Chicago meeting was in response to urgent requests which have been coming across the Atlantic for the past three years from England and Germany, where earnest Church Peace Leagues have been working together with very marked influence in improving the relations of those two empires. In their cooperation the desire sprang up for the further extension of the fellowship and for the inclusion of America in it. Lake Mohonk conferences have also recommended such an organization.

No rigid formal organization is contemplated, and no dues will be collected from members. But it is hoped to enroll especially all Christian ministers of the country who are willing to exert their influence in behalf of peace measures as international questions of a critical character arise from time to time. Doubtless the first effort of the Church Peace League will be to promote the arbitration of the Panama tolls question. Dr. J. M. Remensnyder of New York City is the temporary chairman of the new league, and will probably be its permanent president. Rev. Frederick Lynch is serving as secretary.

Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip Reviving

The Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip, an interdenominational organization of Christian men promoting prayer, Bible study and systematic recruiting for the church—a body having a large number of chapters in the Presbyterian fellowship—will be twenty-five years old in May. It is proposed to observe the anniversary by special thanksgiving services in Second Reformed church of Reading, where the brotherhood originated, and there will also be a public observance of the "semijubilee" in Philadelphia, where the brotherhood is stronger than in any other local center, having in all sixty-eight chapters within the city. The work of the Andrew and Philip international council—for with chapters in Canada, England, Japan and the West Indies, as well as the United States, the movement has an international scope—has suffered a serious lapse in recent years, but last summer a vigorous revival was undertaken by men who had experienced the benefits of the fellowship. With the election of Rev. R. Howard Taylor as general secretary, a widespread awakening of old chapters and formation of new ones began.

A committee of Christian business men in Philadelphia and vicinity, called together by John Wanamaker, has paid off the debt of the brotherhood and provided funds for maintenance of secretarial headquarters at 1328 Chestnut street in that city. A series of conferences in several important cities is planned to impart new vigor to the work of local chapers, and these will be followed next fall by a national convention, the first that has been held for Andrew and Philip men in several years.

Editorial

Facts Make the Real Difficulty

DR. WILFRID WARD has an interesting editorial in The Dublin Review for October, 1912, in which he deals firmly but kindly with some recent defenders of the Christian faith who protect it by reducing it. They find its defenses thrown out rather widely, and in order to make the central citadel more secure, they yield part of the territory which it has been supposed to claim.

One of Dr. Ward's contentions is so true to the history of Christian thought that it is worth emphasizing. He observes that most of the difficulties that men find with the standard doctrines of the Christian church are not difficulties really with the doctrines but with the facts of life and nature and history with which the doctrines deal. Christian doctrine makes no facts; it tries to explain them. It makes no difficulties; it is an effort of rational minds to clear the difficulties. There have been efforts at framing doctrines which have been untrue to facts, and which have increased difficulties. Before these doctrines are subjected to criticism, however, it ought to be asked frankly whether they are not simply statements of facts which would not disappear even if the doctrines were thrown overboard.

Take one of the troublesome facts and see how impossible it is to escape it. All the doctrines that turn upon imputation, whether of the sin of Adam, or the righteousness of Christ—all those which turn upon the existence in the world of a really moral order by which some men take the consequences of other men's deeds—all those doctrines issue from a series of troublesome facts. We are actually bound up together with other lives. Whether it is just or not, the facts are as plain as anything can be.

Think how closely we are bound with the past. Every one of us comes into the world saddled with his ancestors. Dr. Holmes's saying, that every man is an omnibus in which all his ancestors are riding, is true beyond question. Not only are we carrying our ancestors but we have inherited conditions and social qualities from a vast number of other people. We have not had an independent chance. It is absurd to pretend that we have.

We have ancestors who sit on the box beside us and help to drive. We have others that are forever lashing the horses and trying to make them run away. Some of us are born into a fight which others never know. Now, no scoffing at the doctrine of election does away with that fact. The fact is the troublesome thing. The doctrine only tries to explain it, to justify it; if we may put it in that way, to make it right from God's side.

Think how bound we are with the present. We simply cannot move independently. Thoreau can go off to Walden and live a recluse life, but the only reason he can do it is because other people do not do it. He takes with him the results of their work. With a sublime illogicality he actually writes books, which he would never do if his life were not bound up with society? He writes books that others may read them. His very rebellion against society shows his intimate relations to it.

Or, take a fact of any life that illustrates it. A man is walking on a railroad track, when a train comes behind him. Now, the only person really concerned with the approach of that train is himself. The engineer blows the whistle for him, not for anyone else. Yet there is no way of reaching him without using a medium, the air which unites him with everybody else within a quarter of a mile. That whistle which only he needed must disturb hundreds of people, and his indifference is paid for in part by their discomfort.

An instance in the life of Huxley illustrates it. Diphtheria broke out in his family. He investigated the cause and found that miles away from his home, in the construction of some drains, too small a pipe was laid down. The sewage could not escape and flooded back in a low lying place. Diphtheria soon broke out near by. While it was raging there a dairyman from Huxlay's section, running short of milk, sent for more to an infected dairy. Every house which he supplied with that milk was attacked with diphtheria. No one in Huxley's section had anything to do with the laying of that drain. Yet they all had to pay part of the price of the carelessness of the men who laid it. There is no use in rebelling against facts of that kind.

See, also, how we are bound up with the future. There is almost nothing that we have attempted which can possibly be finished by ourselves. There is no great movement of reform which we can hope to see ended. Death arrests us and takes us out of the work. Now, unless our work is to be overthrown, or rendered void, some one else must come in and take it up. That is, our own work is dependent upon the future for its justification and completion. In the same way, we shall ourselves soon be lying as a burden, or leading as an inspiration, in the lives of our successors. Whether we like to talk about the sovereignty of God or not, those are the facts. We can sneer at the doctrines, but we cannot get away from the facts without finding we have left foundations and are in the sand.

The purpose of all this is only to urge that Christian doctrine is no harder to believe than the facts of life. Mr. Huxley wrote to Mr. Darwin in 1876: "After all, Butler's 'Analogy' is unassailable, and there is nothing in theological dogmas more contradictory to our moral sense than is to be found in the facts of nature." He did not on that account accept the dogmas, but neither on that account did he reject them. There must be found some other reason than that for rejecting them.

Chicago's Invitation Quite Undeclinable

In the U. S. A. General Assembly at Louisville last spring a single mind prevailed as to the right location for the Assembly of 1913. Atlanta's invitation so chimed with everybody's sentiment that there was no room for another proposal after Atlanta had been heard from. And The Continent feels very sure that this bit of history is going to repeat itself this year when at Atlanta the question comes up on place of meeting for 1914. An invitation to come to Chicago, submitted by Fourth church, will be laid before Assembly, and it is a safe surmise that the fitness of things will once more be so evident that no one will wish to put in a rival claim.

The first consideration, which would doubtless be conclusive if standing alone, is the fact that Chicago, great Presbyterian center though it is, has not had the honor of entertaining a General Assembly for thirty-seven years, and that surely is a long enough lapse of time to justify Assembly's return. But reenforcing all this mathematical logic shown in the subtraction of 1877 from 1914 will be the lure of a bidding to come, see and virtually help dedicate the magnificent $675,000 group of Fourth church buildings, the noblest and most complete architectural enterprise ever yet undertaken in this country in the name of Presbyterianism. The high privilege of meeting beneath a dedicated roof reared to the worship of God with such notable generosity and with such stalwart determination to measure up to the tremendous demands of the religious situation in a modern city will be all the certification needed for the wish of Pastor Stone and his elders to be Assembly hosts a year from next May.

Divorce for Anybody Who Has the Price

In spite of all the honor it would do the Catholic Church to be really consistent in its professed opposition to divorce, the hierarchs at Rome cannot resist the request of any rich Catholic who is tired of a former marriage for permission to marry again. And so the pretense of believing that marriage is a sacrament that only death can dissolve is repeatedly trampled on by the church's own highest leaders. Of course nominal divorce is refused, but for any Catholic who has money an annulment of marriage can always be effected.

The shame of this duplicity has just been conspicuously shown again. American Catholic papers have lately been boasting that the inability of Count Boni de Castellane to get a divorce from his wife, Anna Gould, was a sign of the rigid honesty of the Vatican in regard to its antidivorce principles. Castellane, they said, has money and prestige, but he cannot break the rule. But most unhappily for the editors who made this argument, the case which they chose as a test turns out the other way, and for some trivial reason or other—of course a Roman ecclesiastic can always find a reason for doing what he wants to—Count Boni's petition is granted, and while his former wife still lives, he is set free from his first marriage to contract another, as he doubtless intends.

The Religious Accent in Wilson's Inaugural

"This is not a day of triumph; it is a day of dedication." President Wilson's religion rings out in that one sentence of his remarkable inaugural even more clearly and spontaneously than in the more formal "God helping me" a few phrases farther on in his address. No one who knows the President doubts that sincerity is on his tongue, and that word about dedication, being sincere, represents a diameter of difference between him and the average fighting politician gloating over a party victory. It is the worldly way to seize on the honors of political battle as badges of personal distinction and rewards to be individually enjoyed in power and pride. And many men otherwise sound in character, and even religious, are at this point worldly without mitigation, gathering their honors to themselves as their own alone. But the religious way is to think of high place and high power as obligations strictly, calling not for pride but, as President Wilson has so well phrased it, for humble dedication. Power to the real Christian is not a thing to enjoy but a thing to consecrate himself to.

A President who feels this on his inaugural day may be trusted to ally himself to the highest Christian ethics throughout his official career. That assurance will spread—has indeed already spread—among Americans of all classes the comfort of believing that America is entering upon an administration where moral ideals are to be supreme—quite above the assault of low expediencies. This confidence is all the surer because the solemn words accompanying this dedication pledged service to the whole nation, not irrespective of but superior to all divisions of party and class. There is nothing more expressive of sound spiritual life, even in Lincoln's wonderful second inaugural, than these closing sentences from President Wilson's lips on March 4, 1913:

"Men's hearts wait upon us; men's lives hang in the balance; men's hopes call upon us to say what we will do. Who shall live up to the great trust? Who dares fail to try? I summon all honest men, all patriotic, all forward looking men, to my side. God helping me, I will not fail them, if they will but counsel and sustain me!"

Professor Gregory Takes Sides with Traub

The new magazine, Faith and Doubt, which has appeared in New York, gives promise of being a useful and stimulating forum of religious discussion. It proposes to hear all sides, whether orthodox or infidel. Most men have given thanks that the age of religious disputation has passed by, but if ceasing to dispute means ceasing to care for religion—as often seems to be the case—then any man who could bring back disputing into vogue again would be a benefactor. Possibly Mr. Michaelyan, promoter of this new magazine, is destined for that service.

It is interesting that Professor Caspar Rene Gregory of Leipsic, whose sympathy with evangelical church purposes is always to be counted on, writes from Germany to the first number of Faith and Doubt deploring the verdicts of Prussian church courts by which pastors Jatho and Traub were last year silenced from the ministry. Professor Gregory admits that their theology went to extreme limits, but he says that Jatho in Cologne was certainly laboring with a burning zeal and great success "to draw men out of the slough of worldliness and selfishness and set them on firm ground of an intimate union with their Father in heaven." Yet Dr. Gregory does not criticise particularly the removal of Jatho, except for the method by which it was brought about. But he does say that Jatho's friend, Traub of Dortmund, was well justified in protesting against the unfair procedure of the court which condemned Jatho, and that the unfrocking of Traub not for heresy but for that protest was a judicial outrage which must react on the good repute of orthodoxy in Germany. Professor Gregory's opinion of this matter is thus quite opposite to prevailing reports coming from Germany through evangelical channels.

Professor David Smith's warm-hearted account of his faith in the virgin birth is a feature of the first number of Faith and Doubt which is worthy of special praise.

—It appears that a recent newspaper report is not true which announced the death of Brother Joseph, who succeeded the famous Father Damien as Catholic missionary among the lepers at the Molokai colony in Hawaii. It is said that Brother Joseph has not even contracted leprosy, and, though nearly 70 years old, is still in excellent health. Brother Joseph, as Ira Barnes Dutton (his civil name), served in the Union army during the war between the states and soon afterwards, although he had been raised a Methodist, he joined the Catholic Church and became a lay brother with the Redemptorist order. He volunteered to join Father Damien in 1886. Today so many fearless missionaries, both Protestant and Catholic, are serving in leper colonies that the public awe which once worshiped Father Damien as a superhuman hero has mostly faded out. Yet it should not be forgotten that the great number of men and women now doing this work are no whit less admirable in their devotion than was Father Damien when he was the object of a whole world's applause.

—World's Work, keeping up its very stimulating interest in the country church, pays in its March number deserved compliment to the wise aggressiveness of Pastor R. H. M. Augustine in the historic old Presbyterian parish of Hanover, New Jersey. People who say that the social interest cannot be cultivated without cost to the spiritual tone of a church ought to know Augustine and Hanover. The World's Work article is by G. Fred Eastman, one of Dr. Warren H. Wilson's lieutenants.

—It is a common generalization causing many laments among far-sighted educators, that the specialized scientific education of the universities seems to crowd out of the minds of the students desire for well founded mental and spiritual culture of the whole man. But the generalization fortunately does not always hold good. A remarkable token of specialism and science appreciating these larger things is an editorial in a late number of The Cornell Veterinarian, organ of the veterinary school in Cornell University. Observing that religion is usually considered to be outside the veterinary curriculum, this student editor boldly says: "We earnestly believe that although not in the curriculum, it should be of it. There is one thing that is greater than professional success, and that is character. Character is molded from many elements, and one of the most essential is morality. The university schools as a rule require a physical examination of students upon admission, and guard their physical health more or less throughout their course. Is their moral health as well guarded? We speak of it in whispers. A certificate of moral character is required upon entrance. Is the validity of the certificate always as good upon departure?" We trust Cornell has plenty of professors of a sort to let it be known that they sympathize with student writing of that kind.

—Of Mormon trickery so many infallible proofs have appeared in late years that the American public is no doubt rather too ready to believe new stories of underhand schemes attributed to the prophets and apostles in Salt Lake City. But the latest of such stories to get abroad undoubtedly does injustice to an upright gentleman who has sincerely repudiated Mormonism and all its works. William R. Wallace, the Democratic state chairman in Utah, has quite recently connected himself with the Presbyterian Church, and since Mr. Wallace comes of a conspicuous Mormon family, the daily press has inferred that in this way the Mormon hierarchs are foisting one of their agents into Presbyterian ranks in order to come closer through him to the Presbyterian who is now President of the United States. But the truth which should be known to Mr. Wallace's credit is that he and his family have long attended First Presbyterian church of Salt Lake City. Mrs. Wallace, who was raised a Catholic, and the four sons, who have grown up in Presbyterian Sunday school, have for some time been members of First church. That the husband and father should join them in their communion there accords with an intention which he expressed to his personal friends years ago—long before he or other men in the country ever guessed that Woodrow Wilson was destined to be the nation's President.

—The Presbyterian Banner, though badly disappointed, has to confess admiration for the sturdy negative with which Dr. Jowett resisted what from a Pittsburg standpoint ought to have been irresistible—an invitation to come to Pittsburg and address the annual meeting of the Presbyterian Union. The spectacle of a man who cannot be moved from his own work at home by the flattery of an invitation to travel abroad and talk is indeed rare enough in this country to compel both wonder and respect. But Dr. Jowett's heroic restraint in staying at home faithfully by his own task might well appear in the light of an example for some other men who are much too often driven by their own experience to take comfort from the proverb: "A prophet is not without honor save in his own country." And in passing it may be pertinent to add that what Pittsburg has thus failed at other cities might as well not try for. Dr. Jowett's determination to confine himself to preaching in Fifth Avenue church, New York, is a matter of duty conscience with him and is not to be shaken by either the cordiality or the persistence of outside invitations.

—The new intermediate catechism, which is once more under discussion, does not really need discussion. Critical opinions as to whether it is good or bad amount to nothing when formed only on the reading of it. It is use that tells, and the only man who has a right to praise or condemn the catechism committee's work is the man who has taught it to children. The Continent notices that people who have thus put it to use are quite unanimous in praise of it.

Jots and Tittles

—Putting the lost sheep on the reserved roll is a slow way of getting them back to the fold.

—The difference between a church and a congregation is one of the lost secrets of preaching.

—Faith belongs to the future and the one devoid of it has already closed his life.

—The best things of life are to be found among our disappointments.

BY WILLIAM PIERSON MERRILL

Men First, Not Plans

NEVER WAS THERE a workman of God upon whom lay so severe a necessity for the best use of scant time as lay upon Jesus. Again and again we catch from his lips words that reveal the pressure upon his spirit. "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished." "I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day." Three short years in which to do his mighty task.

Look at that task in its most obvious and outward aspect—the founding of a new religion, the establishment of a brotherhood, a church, for all races and all times. What a policy that was to frame and execute! There is much talk to the effect that four years is too short a time for a President of the United States to carry through any definite and worthy policy. Jesus had less time than that in which to introduce a new and revolutionary idea, declare its principles, set its machinery in motion, secure its officers. How painful must have been the pressure! Surely no follower of Christ can ever have the right to say "I have no time for that" of anything for which Christ found time.

Jesus Was Never Too Busy for Anyone Needing Him

There were matters for which our Lord could not find time. We are told that sometimes he could not stop for food, nor for proper rest. He slept on a cushion as he journeyed in a little boat. He prayed while others slept. He had no time for enjoying the fame that came from his mighty deeds. Once the disciples wakened to find the people of the town thronging the street before the house to do honor to the Saviour who had healed their sick the day before. But Jesus could not be found. At last they discovered him in a lonely spot, at prayer. Eagerly they urged him to return; they said, "All men are seeking thee." But he said, "Let us go to the next towns; that is why I came forth." The combined pressure of great work and scant time was upon him. He could not stop for praise and appreciation.

But in this busy, driven life, with such achievements to gain, and so short a time in which to gain them, there was one thing for which Jesus always had time. He always had time to spend on individuals who needed his attention. The supreme interest of our Lord was in people, their needs, what he might do for them. Anything else might wait, but that always had first claim. Plans, programs, sermons, meetings, all these were subject to interruption if some individual needed attention. If Jesus were preaching in the synagogue, and a man cried out for relief from illness or demon possession, it was easy to see which was primary and which secondary in his estimate. The sermon was dropped and the man helped.

Trace the life of Christ through from beginning to end and everywhere you find this human personal element at the front. His first miracle is not reserved for some great occasion; it is wrought to save the self-respect of simple country folk. He spends an exciting day in Jerusalem, a day full of words of healing, addresses and controversies. At night comes a man to talk with him. Most of us would have excused ourselves as needing rest. Jesus sits and talks with that man through the night. Passing through Samaria, he is too weary to go into the town, and sinks down by the wellside while his friends go for food to refresh him. When they return they find that instead of resting he has been pouring life and joy into a sick and needy soul.

He is talking of the solemn and weighty matters of his kingdom; and some women appear, bringing their babes that he might touch them. The disciples rebuke them for their presumption. But Jesus is actually indignant with the disciples, and lets his teaching wait while he blesses the children and rejoices the hearts of the mothers. He is passing on his way on the solemn last journey to Jerusalem. But he hears a blind beggar call, halts the march and gladdens the poor fellow with the gift of sight. He looks through and over the throng that lines the street in Jericho and catches the appeal in the eyes of a man in a tree above the way, and goes to the man's house to encourage and save him.

In the garden, arrested, facing the crisis of his life, he takes thought for his friends, securing their freedom. Hanging on the cross, he sees to it that his mother has a home. He prays for the ignorant soldiers as they drive the nails through his flesh. Risen from the dead, he remembers to send a special message to Peter. From one end of that life to the other you catch the constant spirit of the shepherd who knows his sheep by name and is always seeking and saving the needy one. It is wonderful how ready he always is to minister to the simple needs of the individual, to put his greatness at the humble service of every soul that comes near.

But Christians Often Ignore People in Order to Do Work

In very many and very distressing ways we Christians are far from what Christ was. But of them all there is scarcely one in which we of this age are more painfully unlike our Master than in our attitude toward the individual. Too much we yield to the spirit of the age, which regards thoughts and programs and plans as more important than individual needs. There are men and women who pride themselves on being learned in sociology and pedagogy and missions, when week after week they are concerned only with thoughts, and never touch human souls at their point of need. There are men and women who are very religious, and yet would not dream of letting the interests of an individual take precedence of their business. My friend, if your Master were there in your office instead of you, would he shut out the interests of the individual, your helper in the office work, the chance visitor, the tiresome but needy intruder? Would he shut out the soul in the absorption in business as frequently and absolutely as you do?

Here is something practical for us to emulate in our Master's character. No man is too great, no work is too important, to be sacrificed and spent in the service of the humblest individual need. I know a man who was put in charge of an important mission enterprise in one of our great cities. He was on fire with enthusiasm. He gave himself unsparingly to his work. One day the office door opened and a foreigner timidly entered, with something for sale. The peddler was of the very race and class this missionary was trying to reach. But he angrily ordered him out on pain of arrest. I doubt if the incongruity, the painful travesty, of his conduct ever struck him. He acted exactly as Jesus would not have acted. He forgot the individual in his great work. Jesus would always let the work go to be kind and helpful to an individual.

Sometimes, in these busy days, we fail where failure is worst and most shameful—in not finding time for those whom God has given us in our own homes. There are men, and worse, there are women, so occupied with business and outside cares that they have no time for the home. I met such a man a few weeks ago. He had been, for ten years or more, a very successful business man. Impaired health sent him on a long vacation, and gave him time to think. And he said, "I begin to suspect that I have been losing some of the best things these years past. Early away each day and late returning, I hardly know my own children. My boy is a stranger to me. What shall I do?" What is the most brilliant success the world has ever known compared with being true to your own boy, meeting his needs as they arise, putting your strength simply and constantly at his service? Let business halt, or wait, rather than fail in your home.

Personal Service as the Great Saving Force

Personal service, interest in individuals, is the great saving force in the world's life, the power in the church and kingdom of Christ. Far more important than your abstract theories and ideas is the simple question how you meet men and women and children every day—what they find or fail to find in you, whether your touch with them weakens, or inspires, or leaves them unchanged. We talk gravely of all we need to win the world to Christ and his saving gospel. And the needs are many and pressing. But I tell you, if the church of Jesus Christ had no money, no worldly power, no wise program, no effective organization, but if everyone who has named the name of Christ made it a chief aim to meet men always as Jesus met them, to care supremely, as he did, for individuals and what we can do for them, the kingdom of God would come with power.

It is a story often told, but worth many a retelling, how, before one of his great victories, Nelson gave his captains the plan of attack. One of them raised the possibility of some misunderstanding. Nelson gave the great answer. "No English captain will make a mistake if he lays his ship alongside a French ship." There lay the secret of a conqueror. There is the secret of the great Captain of our salvation. We say it is hard to know just what to do and how to do it in the cause of Christ today. Yes, much is uncertain. But this is true, yesterday, and today, and forever, that no Christian makes a mistake, however poorly equipped he may be in mind and opportunity, if he lays his life alongside another life.

Tom Blodgett

An Epidemic of Lay Preaching in Kansas

BY ANDREW MELROSE BRODIE

Introductory: Tom Blodgett of Wichita started something one day in Kansas which has had results he never dreamed of. "Get the laymen to preaching" has been the remedy suggested by scores of religious experts for the slow increase of the church in this country. Tom Blodgett had no philosophy about it, but he did it unawares, and in this stirring article the pastor of First Presbyterian church of Wichita, where the team has led the services, tells what has come to pass since.

"Watch Wichita Win" are the blazoned words in large electric letters that span the main business street of the city. Until a year ago this motto had to do solely with the bustling activity of our enterprising citizens on the hunt for trade. Today "Watch Wichita Win" has a far deeper significance. Twelve months ago our people were neither better nor worse, religiously, than the average. But pastors and officers realized that something must be done to arouse the members of the church from the fearful indifference everywhere evident and enlist men for service in the kingdom.

Billy Sunday was invited; a tabernacle seating 10,000 persons was erected, and almost from the first day the building had a capacity audience, while ofttimes hundreds were turned away. For six weeks Billy Sunday preached "righteousness, temperance and judgment to come." As a result 5,200 persons from all ranks of life were converted. Most of these were received into the fellowship of the churches, but not to be lulled to inactivity. Instead they were organized for Bible study, service and sacrifice.

"Going Everywhere" to Preach the Word

Today more than 7,000 women gather in groups every week for Bible study—but that is another story. Here we are to write about men and about men in evangelism. We have today in Wichita no fewer than twenty-four "gospel teams" or groups of men who conduct services in churches, theaters, halls, shops or in the open air, and these teams have visited more than a hundred towns and cities within 250 miles.

Just one year from the organization of the first team, 1,913 men and boys have been reported as converted as the direct result of the work of this aggressive lay ministry. Converts in other towns in turn have organized teams and have extended the work into other districts, and report similiar harvests. A letter before me from a town in Oklahoma expresses gratitude for the visit of one of our teams, when forty converts were secured, and the writer adds significantly, "We now have a team of our own and have visited a number of places, and down to date"—a period of about two months—"we have 125 converts."

Shortly after the team work began the leaders of the Men and Religion Movement visited the city and added not a little to the efficiency of our organized men. The churches perfected a federation and secured a secretary who began at once to make dates for the teams and to give general supervision to the extension work.

How Tom Blodgett Got Started

There's a story about how the first team in this already great army came into existence. It wasn't planned. Providence developed it. Soon after the close of the Sunday evangelistic meetings the pastor of one of the churches was to be absent for a Sabbath. He invited Tom Blodgett of the wholesale firm of Cox-Blodgett, a convert of the late campaign, to take charge of the evening service. Mr. Blodgett invited some of the recently converted friends, all good fellows, to meet him at the Young Men's Christian Association at 6:30 p. m., Sunday, saying, "We are going out to have a good time." The men met in the parlor, Mr. Blodgett outlined the plan, and after general prayer they proceeded to the church.

After the congregation had sung some gospel songs and each man had led in prayer—this was the first public prayer for most of them—each man in turn told in his own way what it meant to him to be a Christian, and what a friend and helper he had found Jesus to be. As a result, that night nineteen men came forward and decided to live a Christian life. To date no fewer than 476 converts are credited to the work of Tom Blodgett's team.

These gospel teams are made up of men from all walks of life. There are bankers and barbers, capitalists and cattlemen, dentists and drivers, editors and electricians, lawyers and laborers, merchants and mechanics, teachers and traveling men, all bound together by one bond of faith in Jesus, one steadfast and consuming purpose to win men into the kingdom. These man walk long distances to hold meetings, go in automobiles or charter Pullman cars, as the Tom Blodgett's Gospel Team, Made Up of Business and Professional Men Animated by a Common Zeal for the Kingdom of Christ case may require, each man paying his own traveling expenses and hotel bills, giving freely of his time, substance and service for the Master. Lately, however, our independent Kansas towns, when visited, prefer to pay traveling expenses and give entertainment.

Scarcely a Meeting Without Converts

No two meetings are conducted exactly alike. Usually there is hearty singing, much prayer, earnest and direct, and the speaking is not unlike the testimonies given at the class meeting of the early Methodist movement when each one told his religious experience and what God had done for him. Often the meetings are continued long into the night, sometimes into the early morning hours, but seldom is a meeting held when there are no visible results, and as many as fifty-nine converts have been reported from a single night's work. Nor do the men confine themselves to Sabbath services or set times; they are ever on the alert to win men. One incident will illustrate:

A few days ago some of the men of Tom Blodgett's team went on their annual hunting expedition. At supper time they arrived at a ranch house some fifty miles away. Supper over, the big-hearted ranchman, to show the genuineness of his hospitality, brought in glasses and a well filled decanter of old rye, and proposed that the boys have the usual "good time." Imagine his surprise when one of the team said, "Since we were here last year we have been converted and have cut booze. Thanks; we don't drink."

With evident embarrassment and stammering apologies, the big broad-shouldered ranchman made a hasty retreat with glasses, decanter and contents. On learning that there was to be a meeting in the church some two miles away the men proposed that all hands go. They did, and the night air rang with gospel songs as the men of the team, the ranchman, his family and help walked through the moonlight to the rural church. After the leader said, "The meeting is now open" the team prayed, talked and exhorted in turn, and never was such a service in that community.

Next day the team hunted little for game; they had meat to eat the world knew not of, and all the country folk present the night before kept their phones busy inviting all their neighbors far and near to a service that night to be conducted by some business men from Wichita. The place was crowded and the Spirit of God was there in manifest power, the ranchman alone seeming unmoved.

Next morning when the team entered the auto to come home the ranchman asked that he might accompany them to the main road. This reached, all got out, joined hands and then each member of the team prayed earnestly for the people of the community, but especially for their host. When the last man had ceased the brawny ranchman, with bowed head and tearful eyes, uttered his first prayer, "God be merciful to me, a sinner." The Lord is adding to the churches daily those who are being saved. This is how Wichita is winning.

New Creed for Chicago Chinese Church

First Chinese Evangelical church of Chicago has the distinction of having had a new creed written for it alone. It is contained in the constitution of the church and is said to be a new thing in ecclesiastical history. It has been subscribed to by representatives of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Disciple, Baptist and Congregational bodies, each representative yielding some point of doctrine or government to form this new organization. Into this church, which is now in the process of formation, it is expected that there will be merged ten or a dozen Chinese missions and Sunday schools.

Chinatown in Chicago, on account of the spread of business, has been forced to find a new location, and the Chinese residents have moved to the vicinity of 22d street and Archer avenue, on the South side of the city. In this new location it was felt desirable that a church be erected, and the Cooperative Council of City Missions, under whose direction all new religious enterprises of the city are handled, thought it unwise to confuse the Oriental mind with denominational distinctions. It is the usual policy of this advisory body to permit certain denominations to work in specified territories rather than to establish union churches of no denomination. In the case of the Chinese, among whom four denominations have been at work, it was thought best to alter this plan of religious strategy and establish a new church. A committee of five was appointed to draft a constitution and creed: Dr. O. F. Jordan, Disciples of Christ; Dr. F. L. Anderson, Baptist; Dr. G. B. Safford, Presbyterian; William Spooner, Congregationalist, and Rev. John Thompson, Methodist. This committee worked for parts of six months and has agreed on a statement of belief necessary for members of the Chinese church in which all denominations will assist.

"This church is founded on the fundamental truths of the gospel," says the constitution. "This church shall instruct its members from the Scriptures with regard to the fatherhood of God, the divinity and saving grace of Jesus Christ, the work of the Holy Spirit, the inspiration and authority of the Holy Scriptures, the sanctity of the Lord's day, baptism and the Lord's supper and the fundamental necessity of living daily with God's help, in harmony with the teachings of Jesus Christ."

Members are to be publicly received on the following confession: "I believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and accept him as my Saviour and guide."

The affairs of the church will be directly under the control of a board of management appointed by the cooperative council. The trustees of the church will have charge of the finances of the institution under the board of management.

This new Chinese church will be unique not only in that it has a new creed. If present plans do not miscarry, a building will be erected around which religious and physical activities of the Chinese will center. The Y. M. C. A. will have charge of the physical and social part of the work and the newly formed church, with pastor, will supervise the spiritual side of the colony. This will make one of the strongest works for Chinese in any American city.

The Cooperative Council of City Missions under which this church is being formed is a loose organization of the mission agencies of five denominations which have mutually agreed to pass upon all changes in location or extensions of church activity. Questions relating to the activity of two denominations in any territory are determined by the secretary of a third board after investigation. The council represents 122,000 church members and is working zealously to equalize the church representation in Chicago and suburbs. Where harmful competition is engendered through present location of missions among foreigners the council seeks to consolidate the work of two denominations or otherwise remove the obstacle to the largest accomplishments.

Turkey's Debt to America

In these days there is more general recognition than formerly of the influence of missionary work in changing the political and economic character of eastern nations. Missionaries as a class have kept remarkably free from political entanglements, but work done to make a people better morally cannot fail to show the effect nationally. In an article prepared for The Youth's Companion and now published the late William T. Stead says:

"The general apathy and indifference of the average educated American in Europe to the one supremely great and useful achievement of Americans in the Old World is to me almost inconceivable. Of course there are a select few who know what is being done, for otherwise the work would cease. But of the Americans I have met, I think that not one in a hundred has any realizing sense of the immense value of the work that is being done by their countrymen and countrywomen in European and in Asiatic Turkey. I am not writing from the missionary point of view. I am writing as a man interested in the civilization, the education, the general uplifting of his fellow men. And I unhesitatingly affirm that when I get sick and weary over the contemplation of the mean intrigues, the squalid ambitions and the unscrupulous doings of politicians, I find an unfailing refreshment for my soul in remembering the heroic pioneer work that is being done in the dominions of the sultan by the citizens of the United States

"Great Britain, absorbed in diplomatic, naval and military affairs, has spent untold millions of dollars in propping up the political system established in the East. But today you look in vain for any lasting trace of good resulting from all her sacrifices. The American government, on the other hand, has spent nothing, and has accomplished nothing. But private American citizens, subscribing out of their own pockets sums that in fifty years might perhaps have equaled the amount spent to build one modern ironclad, have left in every province of the Ottoman empire the imprint of their intelligence and of their character."

Not Sure of His Title

"That's a swell umbrella you carry."

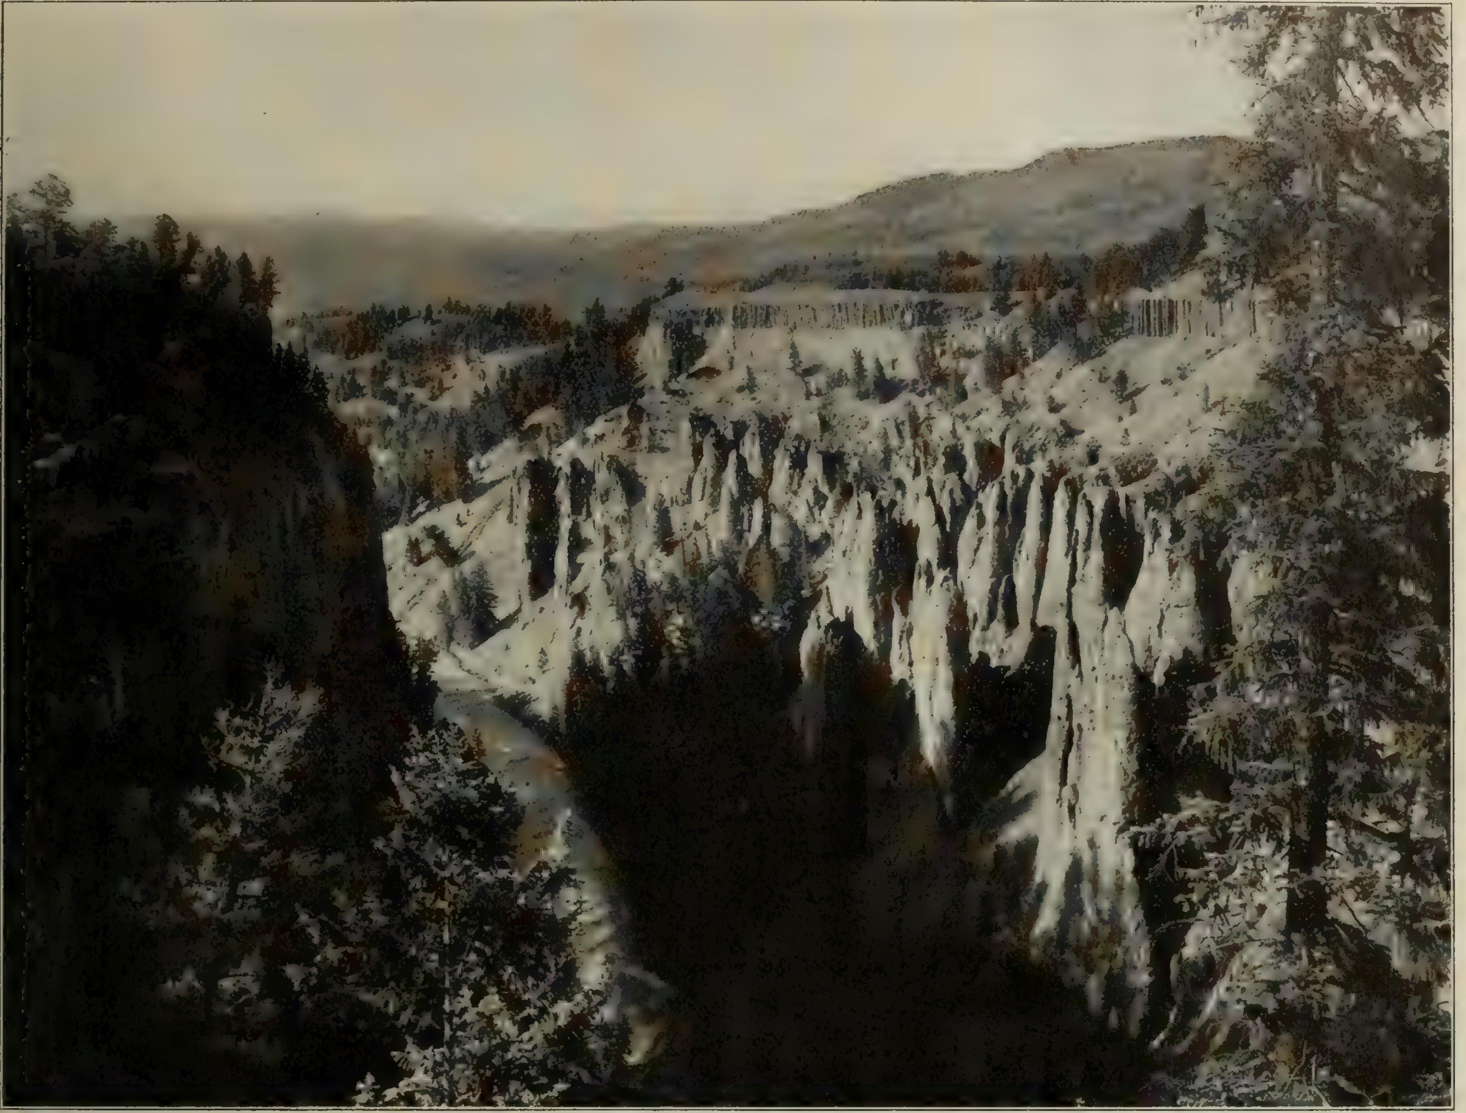
"Isn't it?"

"Did you come by it honestly?"

"I haven't quite figured out. It started to rain the other day and I stepped into a doorway to wait till it stopped. Then I saw a young fellow coming along with a nice large umbrella, and I thought if he was going as far as my house I would beg the shelter of his umbershoot. So I stepped out and asked, 'Where are you going with that umbrella, young fellow?' and he dropped the umbrella and ran."—Houston Post.

"ALL AROUND AMERICA"

Nature's Rugged Beauties in Yellowstone Park



In the heart of the Rockies between Wyoming, Idaho and Montana lies the American people's greatest national park—the Yellowstone. The park is nearly sixty miles square, and recently two forest reserves have been added, more than doubling the original area. United States troopers patrol the roads, prevent spoliation and protect the wild game. Fishing, however, is permitted by law under reasonable restrictions. A chain of modern hotels reached by stage coaches makes sight seeing easy. And such sight seeing it is! Boiling springs and spouting geysers by the hundreds, the most wonderful in the world; canyons, lakes and falls, with mountain scenery rugged, beautiful and picturesque—such is Yellowstone park.

The Wayfarer Sees a President Made

THE WAYFARER feels as the men must have felt who heard Lincoln's Gettysburg speech. He has gone apart from a great event in the mood with which one leaves a sacramental service. The exaltation of a great hour is upon him. If he writes with fervor it is because his spirit is aglow, lighted by the burning beacon words of President Wilson's inaugural address—an utterance surely destined to take high and permanent place in American history. Unless this hearer's judgment has forsaken him utterly, that address was epochal.

* * * * *

Wedged in the front ranks of the mass of people—not privileged ticket holders, but a plain, everyday representative American crowd of us common folk—the Wayfarer heard every word of the inaugural ceremonies, and could trace the lineaments of the speaker as the new President read, from a budget of very small sheets of paper held in his left hand, his confession of faith and his vow of service. The words, which are now for the whole world's reading, need the straight, strained presence of the speaker to interpret them.

The President had repeated after Chief Justice White reverently, clause by clause and word by word, the words of his oath of office; and had kissed the open Bible in a manner far from perfunctory. He stood consciously in the presence of his greatest experience. The occasion was so momentous that there were no pleasantries, no trace of campaign speaking, no affable attempt to make the retiring President, who sat in the background, feel comfortable. It was a chosen leader speaking to his people. And when he spoke of "the fearful physical and spiritual cost to the men and women and children upon whom the dead weight and burden of it all has fallen pitilessly the years through," there was almost a break in his voice. Could the nation have heard that tender note of sympathy it would have loved on the instant its new President. There flashed into the Wayfarer's mind, "Like as a father pitieth his children." The same tensing of the muscles of the cheeks, the same nervous lifting of the head, the same pitiful quality in the tone of voice, was noted by those of us near at hand in the words, "There has been something crude and heartless and unfeeling in our haste to succeed and be great." Again it came with the sentence, "There can be no equality or opportunity, the first essential of justice in the body politic, if men and women and children be not shielded in their lives, their very vitality, from the consequences of great industrial and social processes which they cannot alter, control or singly cope with."

The electric sense of that hour was voiced by the President's words: "The feelings with which we face this new age of right and opportunity sweep across our heart-strings like some air out of God's own presence, where justice and mercy are reconciled and the Judge and the Brother are one." As the brief address, which the multitude had for the most part received in a silence more impressive than huzzahs, drew to its close the vibrant note of purpose rang out dominant. A vision of Sir Galahad at the altar flitted across one hearer's mind. One sentence comprehended it all: "This is not a day of triumph; it is a day of dedication."

* * * * *

The Wayfarer dwells upon the address because it was the preeminent event of an unusual inauguration. Politics is outside the sphere of the present chronicler, but it did seem as if many things on March 4 symbolized a new political order. One little act at the ceremony of taking the oath revealed this. The cadets from West Point and the middies from Annapolis had been drawn up in brave array in front of the great stand. The resplendent staff rode between. The scene suggested the fact that it was the new commander in chief of the army and navy entering into power, with the visible evidences of his authority before him. After the President and the President-elect had descended the long red carpet leading through packed grandstands of notables, preceded by the justices of the supreme court and followed by the brilliantly clad diplomatic corps, and the members of Congress, there became evident some change in the arrangements directly in front of the small white stand where the presidential party sat. A new order had gone out to the marshals in charge. The cadets were drawn aside. The gorgeous staff, with their orderlies, reluctantly rode after them. Then into this cleared space, the most jammed spot on the globe's surface at that hour, the people were summoned—the multitude who had no influence to secure grandstand seats; the patient, loyal crowd who had been standing for hours by the thousand behind the ropes. With a rush and a cheer the host crowded close—and President Wilson made his inaugural address to the plain people. It was symbolic.

Frankly, this Wayfarer likes crowds, democratic, good-natured American crowds especially. And in particular Washington crowds, with their large proportion of elemental, soft-speaking country folk from the South and West. To mingle with the rank and file of "us folks," catching the observations upon men and things of the persons whose work is done with their hands, learning their splendid undisguised patriotism, is an education and an inspiration. American crowds are inextinguishably fun-loving. A poor, distraught chap, who had been seeing visions of an invasion of America by Rome's legions, began to harangue the crowd concerning what Abraham Lincoln would have thought of this great display, and the crowd laughed, rather sympathetically, as he was led away by a policeman. When some bumptious individual claimed privileges above the rest of us the crowd cheered as he was squelched. A pickpocket, caught and hustled off by the police, was greeted with derision. The good-humored endurance of discomfort, the readiness to make a wall of defense about an old woman caught in the jam, the quick pathway made for one who had fainted, the amused tolerance of an excited police official and his fumings—those are American traits which spell strength.

* * * * *

An inauguration of a President is wholly unlike a royal coronation. The open air ceremony, the simplicity of it all, the close-thronging people in everyday clothes, the multitudes of spectators filling every available space, including the roof and dome of the capitol, and the surrounding trees, the background of officials and near-officials, not one in ten of whom wore a silk hat—all these American characteristics lent a dignity altogether unique and none the less real.

* * * * *

A good friend in Washington had provided the Wayfarer with a seat for the parade in the reviewing stand directly opposite the President. There he watched the way the President and Vice-President conducted themselves through the long ordeal of the four-hour parade. Alongside the President was "the White House baby," wee Miss Cothran, and so human are we all, upon every occasion, that during the time of her presence on the stand the baby shared the honors with the chief magistrate himself.

That parade is a long story. In its military divisions it gave an impression of might unmistakable. The Indian chiefs imported a touch of color to it all, and the Boy Scout band made one of the distinct hits of the day. But it was the solid legions of college students that meant most to the Wayfarer. These typified new thoughts of the place of the educated men in public service; they are the soldiers of the new day in politics which this inauguration represented.

* * * * *

Of the tens and hundreds of thousands of persons who witnessed some part of the inauguration day proceedings, every one could say, with a new glow of pride at his heart, "Thank God, I also an an American!"

THE WAYFARER.

Church and Daily Paper

A veteran daily newspaper man who has "done thirty years time" in reportorial and editorial work, culminating with the management of two great dailies in a hustling city of the Northwest, writes thus bearing on the question of newspaper publicity for the church:

"It is true that most newspaper men—those responsible for the news and feature matter—do not appreciate the value of religious news and have so little sympathy with church interests of any kind. In view of the fact that they are rarely personally identified in any way with religious movements of any kind, it is not unaccountable that they should be so indifferent to religious news. They are inclined, and indeed they have a right, to estimate the value of any particular class of news by the 'splash' it makes, and so long as they hear nothing from religious news they underestimate its value. The people of the churches have treated the newspapers with almost as much unwisdom as they have treated the theater, with somewhat similar results. They have let the devil steal the art of expression and are going to have a hard time to get it back, though it will be done. Happily the art of painting was not entirely surrendered, but on the contrary was employed in its highest triumph in sacred subjects. Some day the churches are going to show such appreciation of church news that the editor will know it is worth printing."

BRADFORD HORTON, MAN

BY RICHARD S. HOLMES

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS—Bradford Horton, working his way through Prestonbury Theological Seminary, becomes entangled in a money theft which not only threatens his reputation but also puts him in a false position with regard to his parentage. Two friends remain openly loyal during his trouble. A third, Miss Elmore, though less outspoken in her championship, displays sufficient loyalty to give her father considerable uneasiness. He is, therefore, relieved in mind when, at the beginning of a long foreign tour, he sees that she has won the love of a young Scotchman. His relief is short-lived, however. A hot defense of Horton in a discussion results in an open breach with her father. Mr. Elmore, resenting her defiance of his wishes, collapses under the strain, but after several months' illness he forgives her and reconciliation follows. In the meantime Horton is called to his home to straighten out affairs in the bank founded by his adopted father, which has been wrecked by ventures in Wall street. To aid him in this work, and in a spirit of noblesse oblige, Horton sends for Oren-Toole, through whose jealous machinations his fair name had been smirched. Friendship between the two men results.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Continued

ONE OF BRADFORD'S hands was on Barney's shoulder, while the other held the Irishman's in a hearty clasp. "That's worth while. That's a big step toward manhood. It's a clear path now, Barney." The bars between the two were down at last. "You can count on me," said the clerk, "till your dying day, Mr. Horton."

"I'm Bradford, Barney," was the quiet reply.

So began a friendship that is still the talk of Prestonbury.

At noon, as Barney went out for lunch, Bradford handed him a note. "Will you leave this at the Horton house as you pass?" he asked.

The messenger found Mrs. Horton and her daughter on the porch, and handed the missive to Mrs. Vanderbosch.

"What is that, Anna?" inquired her mother when he had gone.

"A note from Bradford."

"Oh!" very coldly. "Anything particular?"

"Only our week's money."

"Money? Our week's money? What do you mean?"

Then followed the whole story of Bradford's generosity, which the mother had not heard before.

"Do you mean to say," she asked finally, "that Bradford sent me the money to come back from California?"

When Anna answered "Yes," the mother said no more. But in the afternoon Conrad Vanderbosch carried a note to the bank, and that night Bradford dined at the old house. Mother and son spent the evening together in her room. What happened in the interview neither ever told, but Rosalie Horton came from it a chastened, softened woman, and Bradford moved back from Inwood inn to his old room next day.

"Conrad," said Anna, "this bank failure has been the happiest event since we were married. The breach between Bradford and mother is closed forever. We are all one again now, but Thomas. Poor Thomas! I wonder where he is?"

CHAPTER XIX.

A HIGHLY SUCCESSFUL AUCTION

"MR. MAXWELL, will this bank lend me $6,000?" "What's up? Going into business?" "No, I want to buy a house." "Going to be married?" "Married? I should say not! I just want to buy a house." "What's the security?"

"The house. It's worth $10,000. It's my mother's, gone down in the wreck of the Glencoe bank, and I don't want her turned out of doors."

"When do you want the money?"

"In October."

"I'll put the matter into Ansley's hands—he's our attorney. If he says it's all right I'll see you through."

"Good," said Bradford. "That'll be satisfactory."

Ten days later Ansley Jickers sent for him. It was now the last week in September and Bradford had been back in Prestonbury almost a month.

"I've looked up that house matter," said the lawyer. "Going to be sold at auction, I learn. You want to bid it in, eh?" Bradford assented, and the other went on, "I've been through the title, too. Title's all right, but the valuation is too high."

"It's one of the best houses in Glencoe, Ansley. It cost twice that appraisement to build."

"No doubt. But the question with real estate is not what went into it but what you can get out. When a man wants a house, that house can get what it thinks itself worth; but when a house wants a man, it can only get what the man chooses to give. You put a $6,000 mortgage on that house and you'll never get your money out of it."

"That's no reason why I shouldn't put it in. I'm not going into a real estate deal."

"Don't you mean to sell, some day?"

"No. You know I mean to give that house to my mother."

"Yes, I know. I also know something that you don't; namely, you're not going to Glencoe to buy that house."

"Who is?"

"I am. You would get rattled. The moment the house was put up you would bid $6,000. Everybody knows you in Glencoe. Some fellows would say, 'I told you so. Those Hortons have money hid away, and I'll make them come down with more.' Then he would overbid you and where would you be?"

Bradford saw the point. "That's so, Ansley; but I hate to bother you."

"Bother be hanged," growled the lawyer. "What's friendship for?"

The two men talked for an hour, and when Bradford left the lawyer knew the main features of the situation. Two hundred and forty-five acres of the Horton farm would be sold first; then the big house and five acres adjoining; then Mrs. Rosalie's Horton's town house. He also learned that the claim of the bank against the Horton estate on account of bank stock assessment was $40,800 His last words to Bradford were, "Don't you tell a soul on earth what is in your mind."

Two days later they met on the street. "I forgot," said Bradford, "to tell you that Oren-Toole is with the receiver of the Glencoe bank. He came in a short time before I left. Mr. Cathcart brought him to me one day and introduced him as B. Oren-Toole. Naturally we talked some, and one day when I had addressed him as 'Oren-Toole,' he broke out, 'Cut that out, Horton. I'm just Barney O'Toole, a red-headed Irishman.'"

"He did? That's good. He's coming to his senses. Bradford, I am not much influenced by likes and dislikes, but I must say I never saw that teller that I didn't want to kick him out of the bank."

"Why?"

"For shamming so. I've known all about him and his history for years. B. Oren-Toole! My, what a fool a fool can be when he really wants to be a fool! Why, the little red-headed, freckle-faced boy was as plain in him in evening clothes as when he used to run barefoot with the pigs at Devil's Spring."

"So you knew when he was teller that he was Barney O'Toole? Ansley, is there anything you don't know?"

"Nothing about Barney. Good-by."

The immediate result of that conversation was a letter from Ansley to Oren-Toole, Glencoe, which brought surprise to its recipient. "I shall drop in at the bank some day," wrote Ansley. "When I do, be sure not to recognize me, or make any sign that you ever saw me. I will see you the same night in my room at the Inwood inn." What was the game, Barney wondered as he read.

A few mornings later he saw Ansley pass the bank window and did not turn around to see who the caller was when the bank door opened. He heard the question, "Is Mr. Cathcart in?" and he answered without turning, "Yes. Pass into the inner office."

Cathcart looked up as the stranger presented his card.

"What can I do for you, Mr. Jickers?"

"I understand there is to be a sheriff's sale to satisfy a judgment decree against the estate of Henry Horton, deceased."

"Yes; the sale is advertised for tomorrow."

"The property consists of a farm and two houses; and the amount of the claim is $40,800?"

"That is correct."

"Will the property bring that?"

"No."

"What will the farm bring, probably?"

"Twelve or thirteen thousand dollars. I have offered it to a man who says he means to buy it. He refused my offer on the ground that he can buy it more cheaply at auction."

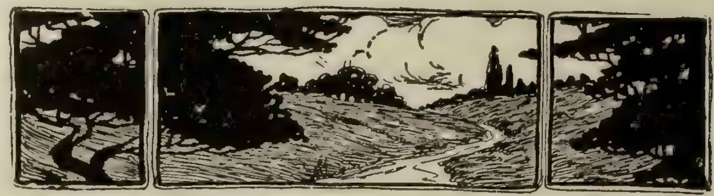
THE HOME COUNCIL

A Contrast in Humankind

By Lee McCrae



A NEIGHBOR of mine, visiting in the North Carolina mountains, wrote back of the wonderfully beautiful home and grounds of a multimillionaire in that region. In conclusion she said:

"Never before have I seen such a profusion and variety of dahlias! Indeed, he is said to have the choicest collection of them in America. Immediately I asked if it would be possible for me to buy a tuber or two, but I was told, 'No indeed! Those he does not wish to plant he has burned.'"

Think of the supreme selfishness, the foolish short-sightedness, that refuses to spread beauty even in its own neighborhood, where its own eyes would get the benefit! "Those he does not wish to plant he has burned."

I gasped over the heartlessness of such an attitude, and a sense of disappointment in human nature was still possessing my soul when a dear little woman came to call.

"You have heard of 'casting bread upon the waters,'" she began in her cheery way, "but I cast seed 'upon the waters' last year and got back a hundredfold this summer. You know my cottage, most unfortunately, is built with its back door obtrusively near the dining room windows of my neighbor, whose house faces the side street, and our foundation is not so sightly as it might be.

"So to make the situation as endurable as possible for her, I planted a lot of rose moss—that perpetually blooming, carpety stuff—close against the bricks, so close I could not see it at all. But she saw, and appreciated it, too!

"Well, this year the bright little flowers had not only sowed themselves anew for her benefit but the rain against the house had washed innumerable seeds out into the grass, where they grew up in full view of my window—bless their cheery colors!

"So I have got a hundred back to one I planted. How is that for literally 'casting bread upon the waters'?"

Looking into her face, I wondered if the multimillionaire ever wore a smile like that!

And I am wondering, too, whether we—blessed beyond counting in more things than bulbs and seeds—are "burning" those we cannot use or casting them "upon the waters."

More About "Refined Speech"

After reading about "Refined Speech in the Home" in the Home Council department of your issue of Feb. 13 I was reminded of an illustrative incident that happened when I was teaching in the public schools of New York City a number of years ago.

Before the days of kindergartens we taught the beginners reading by means of charts. These charts had a row of pictures with a few words beside them. After teaching picture and words, we asked the children to tell us about the lesson in their own words.

One day the picture was a cow and a horse. The reading was, "Is this a nice cow? Yes. Is the cow as nice as the horse? No."

The following is the lesson given in one child's own words:

"Get on to the cow. Ain't she a beaut? Is she in it with the horse? Nit."

What kind of a language can America expect if the public schools do not see to it that good English predominates over the careless speech and slang? This child was a foreigner.

Louise M. Phillips.

[This is perhaps an extreme case. The language used by this little foreigner savors more of the city street arab than of the average schoolboy. It may be said in defense of the public school that it is more or less handicapped in its efforts to promote the use of pure English by the fact that an hour of after-school association with children whose English is poor is usually enough to undo all the good accomplished during the day. Another illustration of how evil communications may corrupt good manners. It is here that the home influence steps in. The child who since babyhood has heard nothing but correct English falls unconsciously into the use of it. Since refined speech is virtually bred in the bone of this child, he will fall less easily under the influence of careless speech. It is true, however, that instead of the home influencing the child, the reverse is frequently the case. It is not unusual to hear a mother introduce a bit of slang into her conversation, and then interrupt herself to say apologetically, "I learned that from my boys." The Home Council would be glad to hear from some of its mothers how they are grappling with the refined speech problem.]

Hint for Easter Party

Novelties for special occasion parties for children are rather difficult to think out; therefore this description of an Easter egg festivity, given in The Mother's Magazine, is offered as a suggestion. The party started with a novel egg hunt. Eggs had been blown and colored in as many shades as there were guests. In each egg was inserted a slip of paper telling how to begin the hunt, a long thread was drawn through the egg, its ends split and held against the outside by a star, colored like the egg, pasted over the opening, and the eggs were hung in a doorway.

Each little guest was asked to select an egg, then blindfolded and told to go and get it. Of course many did not get the egg chosen, but that only added to the fun. The children were then instructed to pull the thread, when off came the stars, revealing the little slip of paper in the inside. These instructions were all different, but we will follow the fortunes of only one of the children.

The slip in the blue egg read, "Hunt for the little blue basket, and whatever you find place within, but keep your eyes open for further directions." After the blue basket was found the hunter discovered an egg-shaped card tied to the handle which said, "Search for egg with the gilt stars. Pull off the largest one and look within." The largest star had a little ribbon pasted in the center, and when pulled off revealed an opening at the top of the egg, which was found to contain tiny egg-shaped bonbons. Hidden among these was another slip of paper containing these words, "Keep a lookout for the bunnies," and so on. The last card read: "Find an egg decorated with a pansy, then your search will be over."

A half hour was allowed the guests to compare spoils and examine them. All received the same number of gifts, but eggs and booklets were decorated in different ways.

A quiet game followed this hunt. The guests were given egg-shaped cards, to which tiny pencils were attached, and each was asked to write a little Easter verse, or a little Easter story. Later these were read aloud, and were very creditable.

Uncolored and colored eggshells were scattered over the floor. Each guest in turn was given a spoon and told to get as many eggs as possible in the basket at the other end of the room with the spoon in a given time. No one was allowed to use his hands in lifting the eggs, and time was called promptly. The different-colored eggs had a different value; for instance, the white eggs counted five, the yellow seven, etc.

In the center of the supper table stood a large crepe paper egg, and at each plate a little eggshell vase filled with violets. At a signal the paper egg was lifted by a wire, fastened to the top and run through the chandelier into the next room, disclosing a whole flock of downy chickens. Refreshments were egg sandwiches and other egg dishes, with egg-shaped ice cream for dessert, while an angel food cake was hollowed out and filled with candy eggs.

BITS BY THE WAY

HOME TRAINING AND DIVORCE

The idea has recently been advanced that to improper training of children is due, in part, the large number of divorces in America. The present-day method of withholding restraint that children may develop their individualities is counted little short of a crime, in that when children thus reared grow up and marry, each party to the marriage contract desires all the privileges he or she had at home. Failure to obtain these privileges means a clash and eventually the divorce court for incompatibility of temperament. To use a popular phrase, the children have become the bosses of the household.

Life is not a path of smoothness for any of us, and children cannot be taught too young how to overcome obstacles. It is distinctly harmful to a child to let him grow up without good, wholesome training in mastering difficulties. Lack of such training leaves his whole moral fiber undeveloped, and so weakens for the delicate task of adjusting himself to exactions of a differing personality.

"The primary evil of divorce," declares one close student of the subject, "starts in the laxity in which our children are brought up and allowed on the streets after dark, whether in cities or villages. It is a woeful lack of home government that causes a good deal of this evil, and parents should know where and with whom the children are after dark."

Another, speaking along the same line, says that "the divorce increase is also the result of the prevailing spirit of lawlessness and a lack of respect for the courts. Not all the necessary treatment of this subject can be done by the law, but moral suasion can teach the children that marriage consists largely of give and take."

If the fault lies in the home, then from the home must come its proportion of the remedy.

NEPHEW FOR LINCOLN

A small girl whose education in American history far surpassed her biblical knowledge went to Sunday school not long ago and was much surprised to hear the teacher refer familiarly to Abraham and his nephew Lot. The clergyman, so the story runs, noticing she was a new pupil, inquired:

"Ada, what was your Sunday school lesson about this morning?"

"Well, really, Mr. Wilson," Ada replied, "we didn't have any Bible lesson. The teacher took up all the time talking about Mr. Lincoln and his nephew Mr. Lot."

—English women have recently won another step toward equality with men. The Royal Geographical Society henceforth will admit them as fellows on the same terms as men. A vote of 2,189 won this privilege, as against 678 opposed.

A Quarrel in Cloud Land

BY ANNE PORTER JOHNSON

"THERE, THERE!" exclaimed Father Sun as two little clouds came sailing through the air. "Something is going to happen, or I miss my guess. It's strange that those foolish clouds will fly along at such a breakneck speed, with never a thought of what might happen! I've warned them time and time again."

Just then the two foolish little clouds came together with a dreadful bump, and Father Sun had just time to get out of the way.

"Oh, oh!" screamed one little cloud. "You've nearly killed me!"

"Boo-hoo!" shrieked the other. "Now see what you have done to my head!"

"Why didn't you get out of my way?" cried the first cloud.

"I don't have to get out of anybody's way. Besides, it's my way as much as it is yours," declared the second cloud. "I started first."

"No, you didn't! I've been thinking of this trip since yesterday."

"Well, the weather man started me, and I rather guess that gives me the right of way. It's all your fault."

"My fault! How dare you say it's my fault! I've just as much right to go racing through the air as you have, and I want you to get out of my way at once."

"Indeed, I'll do no such thing! You're the one to get out of my way."

So they fussed and fussed, while the bumps on their heads grew bigger, and hurt worse and worse. They cried until the tears rolled in great drops down, down, down, and finally fell on Boy Twin and Girl Twin playing in the garden.

"Here, here!" called Father Sun away out of sight behind the quarreling little clouds. "I don't like this fussing at all. What's the use? Make up, do, and be nice."

The little clouds looked up quickly when Father Sun spoke, but both shook their heads stubbornly.

"I'll not give up," said one.

"I'll not give up," said the other.

"Pshaw, now!" said Father Sun, a little out of patience. "I'm tired staying back here behind you. Besides, I have a contract to shine all day, and I don't like to be stopped by two fussy little clouds. Can't you make it up and go on out of my way? You have nothing to quarrel about, anyhow. For all I can see, one is as much to blame as the other."

The two little clouds just kept on shaking their heads. "I'll never give up," they both repeated.

"Oh, oh, oh! Well, we'll see about that!" exclaimed Father Sun, poking his big round face right in between the two little clouds. "Ha, ha, ha! See how bright everything is when I show my face. Now dry your tears and behave. Look down there. Boy Twin and Girl Twin are watching you, and I do believe they're laughing."

"Oh, oh! Father Sun, we're so glad to see you again," exclaimed Girl Twin, clapping her hands.

"We thought you had gone for all day, Father Sun, when those two hateful little clouds bumped up together right before your face," said Boy Twin.

"What were they crying about?" asked Girl Twin. "Their tears came down on our heads and we had to run for the porch. And such growling!"

"And sometimes it sounded like—well, like spats and slaps, and naughty words," said Boy Twin.

Old Father Sun looked thoughtfully a moment at Boy Twin and Girl Twin. "It's too bad, but these two little clouds had a quarrel," he said.

"A quarrel!' laughed Boy Twin.

"How funny!" said Girl Twin. "What kind of quarrels do clouds have?"

"Well, about the same kind as other children have, I think," replied Father Sun, twinkling at Boy Twin and Girl Twin. "They got out of the wrong side of the bed this morning, I suppose, and, of course, you know that always makes trouble."

Boy Twin and Girl Twin looked down and said nothing.

"And each little cloud was determined to have his own way, and that made more trouble, of course," went on Father Sun. "So when neither would give in there was a smash-up, and we had a terrible time, I tell you. That was when you heard the spats and slaps, I suppose. Finally I got right between them, and then everything brightened up. I do hope they'll behave now. I can't say that I like quarrels and fusses very much, either among little clouds or other little—well, I don't like them, anyway. It makes me feel like hiding my head. In fact, I always get 'way out of sight if I possibly can."

"Well, we got out of the right side of the bed this morning, Father Sun," said Girl Twin, looking shyly at the dear old fellow up in the sky.

"Yes," said Boy Twin, "and we're good-natured. Mother said so."

"Oh, oh, oh!" laughed Father Sun. "That's fine! We'll certainly have a nice day."

Father Sun sailed on merrily, and the two little clouds looked at each other sheepishly. Then they clasped hands and off they went together as nice as you please.

"Oh, Father Sun!" called Boy Twin and Girl Twin. "There they go together. They've made up."

"Well, now," replied Father Sun broadly smiling, "I'm glad of that. How are your bumps?" he called to the little clouds.

"Oh, they're all well now, Father Sun," replied both little clouds, smiling.

Our Little Hindu Sisters

These two little girls are of a Brahman family in Allahabad, India, and are standing in front of an Allahabad mission house. The picture shows the way in which the "sari," their long cloth that is both skirt and blouse and hat, is worn. When this garment goes to the wash there is no trouble about its losing either shape or buttons, for it is in a single piece, without any frills or ornaments. Nevertheless, it it very becoming, and no one doubts that it suits the climate.

The older of these girls is now old enough to be kept in seclusion, because the laws of her caste forbid her appearing in public after a certain age. One of the reasons why the women of the very poor classes in India are healthy, in spite of the hard manual labor they must perform, is that they may move about in the open, enjoying the sunshine and God's out of doors. The only life their wealthier sisters often know is in a close courtyard.

The Hindu girl is very fond of jewelry, and the father or husband often uses her person as his bank. When he saves some money he has a gold or silver anklet or bracelet made for her which no thief can remove. When the times become hard he can sell this for nearly its original value. Rings through the left nostril and heavy earrings are also very popular.

Rhymes to Remember

A BOY'S MOTHER

My mother, she's so good to me,
'Ef I was as good as I could be,
I couldn't be as good—no, sir!
Can't any boy be as good as her!

She loves me when I'm glad or mad;
She loves me when I'm good or bad;
And what's the funniest thing, she says
She loves me when she punishes.

I don't like her to punish me;
That don't hurt; but it hurts to see
Her cryin'—nen I cry; an' nen
We both cry—an' be good again.

She loves me when she cuts an' sews
My little cloak an' Sunday clo'es;
An' when my pa comes home to tea,
She loves him most as much as me.

She laughs an' tells him all I said
An' grabs me up an' pats my head;
An' I hug her, an' hug my pa,
An' love him purt' nigh much as ma.

Dotty, Bun and Rab

ONCE THERE was a little girl whose name was Dotty Darling. Dotty had two toy rabbits, which she called Bun and Rab. One day Dotty took Bun and Rab into her nursery, where mother had filled a large glass bowl with autumn leaves.

Dotty got her large picture book and began to show them the pictures which were in it. At last she came to her favorite picture. It was a picture of the Pilgrims talking just a few days before Thanksgiving Day.

As Dotty thought that Bun and Rab ought to know what the picture meant, she told them that the people were nearly starving, as they were so poor, and that Governor Winthrop tried to feed them corn out of an almost empty barrel. She told them that at last Captain William Pierce had arrived with a ship which was filled with good things for the people to eat.

The Pilgrims were so happy that they set a day apart for a feast. They invited all of their friendly Indians to their feast. After the feast was over games were played.

This story which Dotty told seemed to be very interesting to Bun and Rab, for they pricked up their ears and looked very wise, and they decided that they were thankful for having plenty to eat on Thanksgiving Day.

A New Use for the Ibex

A teacher was giving to her class an exercise in spelling and defining words.

"Thomas," she said to a curly-haired little boy, "spell 'ibex.'"

"I-b-e-x."

"Correct. Define it."

"An ibex," answered Thomas, after a prolonged mental struggle, "is where you look in the back part of the book when you want to find anything that's printed in the front part of the book."

Harry—"We see the blue sky."

Teacher—"Correct; and what do we see above us on a rainy day?"

Harry—"An umbreller."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

March 23, 1913—Isaac and Rebekah

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Genesis 24. Golden Text, Proverbs 3:6: In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he will direct thy paths.

The last time we saw Isaac he was standing by an altar awaiting his death. Today we are introduced to an altar of another kind, not of wood but of gold. The story of Isaac's courtship and marriage is one of the most beautiful idyls ever written. For thousands of years it has lain like a jewel by the highway of history. Everything connected with the event moves into its place with precision. Isaac himself was a pliable subject in the hands of another. He was now 40 years old, and so far had shown no desire to live apart from his father and mother. Their strong personalities overshadowed him as the pine overshadowed the willow, but he seems to have been perfectly content. Like others of his class, he found life ready made for him.

But one day Sarah, his mother, was carried out to Machpelah, and with his father he returned to a desolate home. Under such circumstances the father usually turns to his children, but Isaac was perhaps negative comfort. For this he was not altogether to be censured. It was his misfortune to have been born rich and the only son of indulgent parents.

Isaac Willing to Accept Father's Judgment in Matter of Marriage

At the age of 40 most men are either married or have had an affair of the heart; but Isaac appears to have been an exception. Abraham lived with God's promise ever before him, and through Isaac lay his only hope of its fulfillment. The son no doubt was ready to marry providing the annoyance of detail was assumed by another. In the Orient marriage was arranged by the parents. The parties most interested were scarcely consulted. Sometimes it turned out for the better and sometimes for the worse, as it does today. Systems are never infallible, but the suggestion is important. If young people listened more to their parents at this, the most important crisis in their lives, the divorce mills would have less to do. But infatuation is often mistaken for love and both are deaf to the voice of reason.

It will be remembered that when the patriarch left Haran sixty-five years before his brother Nahor remained behind. This brother had also become rich in children and goods. Why not seek a wife for his son from among his own kindred? To come of a good family is a valuable asset in character. One is more likely to find a Rebekah among the descendants of Nahor than from the Philistines. But Haran was 500 miles away. The patriarch was in a dilemma and no doubt wished a thousand times for but one word from Sarah, the counselor of his life. But Sarah was not there, and in the absence of friends one must act for himself. Abraham was strong in two things—faith and common sense. Both are essential to the solving of the problems of life.

Abraham Chooses Servant to Plead Isaac's Cause at Haran

In accordance with the custom of the times someone must go to Haran and press the claims of Isaac at the court of Nahor. But who should this be? The patriarch was too old, and Isaac was too young, not in years but in stability of purpose. Should he go he was likely to remain and Canaan would be lost as the land of promise. When the best thing becomes impossible the next best takes it place. Abraham had a servant whom he trusted. To this man he would commit the responsibility of the mission, but first he must swear that in no event should Isaac go back to the land of his forefathers, or marry outside the line of his kindred.

The escort was worthy the occasion. A caravan of ten camels was fitted out and took up its march in the direction of Haran. In those days the idea of compensation was not entirely absent from marriage, and the groom rewarded the parents, in turn, for the gift of their daughter. Abraham's servant was well furnished to meet any exigency. His display of bracelets and rings would naturally bewilder the sight of the simple-minded Rebekah, even if they failed to unlock her heart.

Finally the caravan arrives at Haran and the event at the well becomes history. That scene has never received its full justice at the hand of the artist. The lines are too fine and the colors too delicate for human touch. And the one feature more marvelous than all else is the very one most likely to escape appreciation—the part played by the steward. No ambassador at any court ever acquitted himself with greater skill. It was diplomacy reduced to a science. For some reason Bethuel, the father, who should have acted as one of the principals, seems to have taken a secondary part in the transaction. But this could have made no material difference, as his place was taken by his son Laban, one of the most adroit manipulators in Jewish history. His peculiarities the steward seems to have read as if by instinct, and a sight of the jewels was quite sufficient to inspire the invitation: "Come in, thou blessed of Jehovah; wherefore standest thou without?"

Servant with Supreme Eloquence Proposes Marriage of Isaac and Rebekah

Eliezer, for he the steward undoubtedly was, proved more than equal to the occasion. He accepted the invitation and at the table gave the world a masterpiece of eloquence scarcely surpassed in literature. Every possible objection to the marriage was met in advance. Isaac, it will be remembered, was 40 years of age, and Rebekah possibly 20. The grandfather of the one was a brother to the father of the other. Eliezer was not unmindful of the discrepancy, so he remarked incidentally that Isaac was born when his mother was old. And then follows what must have been of more interest to Laban, that unto Isaac had Abraham committed all that he had.

All this had its influence, but Eliezer had lived too long with Abraham not to know the power of faith. The Lord God of his Master Abraham had sent him, and what answer should he give when he returned to his master? To such earnestness there is usually but one answer. The farewell was a benediction in harmony with all that had gone before. The procession was soon re-formed with its face toward the west, and there at the end of the journey stood Isaac, waiting for his bride.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Analysis—Duty of the believer is to "marry in the Lord." Isaac's love of peace and Rebekah's love of action give promise of a well balanced home.

The most important step in life is often taken with least premeditation. A man will choose a home with far more deliberation than he exercises in choosing a wife, while a maiden will often throw to the winds all prudence in taking a step which, though later repented or reconsidered, can never leave her where it found her.

In his old age Abraham was true to the religion of his earlier life. His one anxiety was that his only son should not contract any alliance with the heathen about him, nothwithstanding some of them were rich and some sovereigns of their tribes. He did not seek a castle or a coronet for his son, but a wife of like faith and common aim. In later days his descendants intermarried with the Assyrian and the Egyptian and brought irremediable woe upon their land. Abraham believed there could be no happiness in the home where husband and wife had different gods. His grandson Esau was to exhibit the mournful outcome of a different course (ch. 26:34-35). The first requisite for a happy home is harmony, and that can hardly be secured where husband and wife have diverse faiths, principles and aims. Abraham knew this, and while his relatives whom he had left in the east did not share his religious enthusiasm, they knew his faith and honored him for it. True religion was to be kept alive through his descendants. He would not have the stream poisoned at its source by an unholy alliance in the marriage of his son.

Verse 58—Although Rebekah's parents approved the proposed marriage they left the final decision to her. Rebekah was not a chattel to be disposed of without her own consent. The Bible conception of a woman's dignity and rights was even in Abraham's day far above that which prevails in most non-Christian lands today. Her own consent indicates that she had heard of the new enterprise, the founding of a new state and church in the far away country of Palestine. She answered the proposal of Isaac's messenger with neither haste nor delay, as one who knew what it involved and was in sympathy with the purposes of Jehovah.

Marriage of Isaac and Rebekah Not a Mercenary One

Verse 59—That this was not a mercenary marriage is evidenced by the absence of any wedding gifts. Accompanied by a single attendant, Rebekah went to meet her future husband, who was rich and powerful, but who was to her personally unknown. She felt that a man who sought a wife who would share his faith must be a man to whom she could intrust her person and her fate.

Verse 60—It is the dominant passion of the Orient to live in a numerous posterity. But the peculiar wording of this passage leads one to suppose that the promise which Abraham cherished (ch. 12:1-3) was well known to the family of Bethuel, and that Rebekah herself believed it to be from God.

Verse 61—Every wedding has in it a touch of pathos, so little is known and so much must be taken on trust. But the departure of Rebekah from her home at Haran to go 500 miles to the south and make a new home among a people strange to her has been paralleled in our own days only by young women who leave kindred and native land to become wives of missionaries engaged in extending God's kingdom in heathen lands.

Meeting of Isaac and Rebekah Full of Dignity and Feeling

Verse 62—It is a beautiful story which is here briefly told. Isaac seems to have been expectant and restless, waiting the outcome of Eliezer's embassy, and doubtless he spent many a twilight hour dreaming of the future. The exigencies of the season had apparently driven him far to the southern border of Palestine, close to the borders of Egypt, a country far from prepossessing and devoid of all that could recommend it to a newcomer from the more fertile and beautiful district about Haran. He may have dreaded meeting his future wife amid fields so forbidding. And the passage suggests that his meditation was not wholly joyous.

Verses 64-65—Nothing could be finer than Rebekah's conduct. She exhibited submission without servility, reverence without cringing, and she promised fidelity rather by silence than by protestations of obedience. There was nothing lordly in Isaac's demeanor, and on the part of his bride nothing undignified. There was no false reserve and no impudent challenge of criticism. It is a lovely little story of trust and affection and faith.

Loyalty to the Living Not Disloyalty to the Dead

Verse 67—Isaac did not welcome his wife as a new acquisition for a harem; he installed her in the tent of honor, the tent in which his mother had so long exercised her domestic sovereignty. To her was accorded that place of honor which his mother had held, and the love which he had bestowed upon his mother he gave as openly to his wife.

The best way to cure a sorrow is through love. Wounds will come, but we should cure them, not keep them open and bleeding. There are those who make a sort of religion of their grief, leaving the garment of the loved one just where it was last laid, closing the door upon the disorder which he left that morning when he went out never more to return, and cherishing as a pagan cherishes an idol "the little brown shoe in the corner (that) puts all your arguing down." It is in a measure true, as Lowell bitterly puts it, that "all the preaching since Adam never made death other than death." But what preaching may not do love will. Another babe may wear the little shoe. It is no disloyalty to the dead mother that a living wife occupies her tent and comforts Isaac. Isaac was not less a son because he became more a husband. The lesson holds the suggestion that the living need our love more than the dead need our grief.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning March 16, 1913

Topic—The wicked husbandmen. Mark 12:1-9.

The Pharisees and scribes doubtless felt that they had already heard quite enough from Jesus when he said to them, "Hear another parable." Then he spoke the parable of the wicked husbandmen. And "they perceived that he spake this parable against them."

The occasion demanded severity. During those last days of teaching in the temple Jesus delivered blow upon blow against the pretensions of the Pharisees. They fully understood his meaning and were filled with anger by it. They were exasperated to feel that his intellectual strength was superior to their own, and they did not dare openly to resent his accusation.

The vineyard is Israel. This symbol was a favorite one with the prophets throughout the history of the nation. "The vineyard of Jehovah of hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah his pleasant plant" (Is. 5:7). "Israel is a luxuriant vine, that putteth forth his fruit" (Hos. 10:1). In the coinage of the Maccabean age the Jewish nation was frequently symbolized as a vine.

The owner of the vineyard is God, who has himself planted it, set a hedge about it, digged a pit for the winepress and built a tower in the midst of it. This is a parable spoken not for the illumination of an inner circle of disciples but for the comprehension of the multitude. It is a parable of judgment, directed against the religious rulers of Judaism, and, as such, even in some of its details has an unmistakable reference.

The hedge of a vineyard was either a wall of stone or a thorny growth of prickly pears or aloes. The latter was generally preferred as affording the better protection against foxes and other animals that might destroy the vines. The hedge doubtless symbolizes the law, whereby Israel was protected from the abuses of the heathenish worship of the nations around.

The watch tower and winepress indicate that God has left nothing lacking that was requisite to the care of his chosen nation, whether to safeguard it against sudden surprise from without or to enable it to enjoy, with inner quietness, the fruition of its privileges.

And he has intrusted it to husbandmen, to the long succession of religious leaders who had governed the nation from the days of Moses. Evidently Jesus recognized the official authority of the scribes and Pharisees. "The scribes and Pharisees sit on Moses's seat: all things therefor whatsoever they bid you, these do and observe" (Matt. 23:2). They were still the regularly constituted authorities of the religion of Israel, to whom had been committed the spiritual culture of the people.

And Jesus—he is the Son, the Heir, in whom the long succession of the prophets, the special messengers of God, had culminated. Thus the religious history of Israel is drawn out in two long lines of teachers, representing the two antithetical tendencies of her life. The one line includes the priests, and the priestly minded exponents of the law. This law, which was intended to be unto life, because of the weakness of human nature worked unto death. It ended in formalism and self-interest. The other line is the prophetic, which served not in the oldness of the letter but in the newness of the spirit. Inasmuch as the prophets were usually in protest against the inadequacy of the established religion they were generally looked upon as meddlesome disturbers. But they were the true servants of Jehovah, come to claim for their Lord the fruits of righteousness and praise, which were the due return of his interest in them. With the prophetic order Christ links himself and finds in the treatment accorded himself by the religious officials of his day the culmination of the persecution directed against the prophets who came before him.

These two principles run through all religion everywhere—the formal and the conventional, which demands conformity to accepted doctrines as the one sole basis of spiritual good, and which tends to remove God to a distance from his world and his worshipers; and opposing this, the spiritual, which is also vital and mystical, and which finds the sole reality of religion in the experience of God in the heart of his servants.

For these husbandmen the absence of their lord, so long continued, seemed to have removed all fear of his ever coming back. They had only to do with men who were servants like themselves. And they were in possession. They almost believed themselves the owners of the vineyard.

In the time of Christ the religious rulers felt that the whole institution of religion in Israel was their property. The temple area was full of graft, and its revenues were manipulated so as to yield to the chief priests the largest possible gain. The house of God, from being a house of prayer, had become a den of thieves.

Jewish tradition tells us that Isaiah was sawn asunder, and that Jeremiah was stoned to death. Whatever may be the value of these traditions, the whole history of prophetism was one of wrongs and bruisings and broken-heartedness (compare Heb. 11:36-38).

And finally they slew the Son. They had no longer any fear of God, or man, or duty. Jesus does not, of course, mean that they deliberately slew their Messiah, knowing that it was he. But he does mean that in essence this was just what they did. They were responsible both for their lack of knowledge and their crime. If they had recognized Jesus for what they knew him to be, they would soon have learned more about what he was.

The lesson here taught is the awful issue of the habit of seeking one's own advantage, of pursuing one's own profit. This habit, if allowed to go unchecked, will ultimately make men capable of any crime, however heinous and dastardly. And the danger is greatest when the profession of religion is made to be a way of gain. God has been thrust out of his inheritance that his servants may possess it.

In proportion as men, in their thinking, remove God to a distance, so do their ideals become lowered.

The men of this age need to bring back into vivid consciousness the faith in God as Sovereign and Absolute, the God who has intrusted to human hands the care of his pleasant vineyard. We need the renewed sense of God's nearness, for our sense of responsibility is didirectly related to our sense of his presence. We need an ideal of life lifted above material things and reaching out into eternity for its fulfillment.

The day of reckoning will come. No debt can forever remain unpaid; it is simply allowed to accumulate against the final settlement.

We have been given higher privileges and a nobler estate than those Jewish rabbis ever held. It is ours to develop these to the glory of our Master. May God give us grace, that when he shall return to reckon with his servants we may be prepared to give in our account with joy and not with grief.

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

THE LIFE TRIUMPHANT

Topic—Vital living: the lesson of Easter. II. Corinthians 4:8-18.

Yesterday our friend was here; today he is not here. Where is he now? The mystery of death has intervened. Faith assures us that all is well with him, but still a host of unanswered questions throng us. Is he still himself? How conscious is he now of this world and of us who are left behind? Has his personality passed over the great gulf with him? Shall we again know him in the peculiar relationship of personal friendship? These are the mysteries hidden even to faith, and unsolved by reason. The only shaft of light that shines upon the immortality of the soul streams from the open grave of the risen Christ. Were it not for the light of his resurrection, all would be dark.

The full truth of the life beyond the grave is known only to those who have passed through the strait gate called death. It is useless to lend ourselves to idle speculation concerning it. But this we know, that life here and now may be enriched and enlarged and made glorious by the power of the risen Christ. His resurrection was not merely for use in eternity. The triumphant experience of the resurrection life was meant for everyone who could say, with the apostle, "I have been crucified with Christ; and it is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me; and that life which I now live in the flesh I live in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."

They who live as if life were a noble, conquering, joyous possession are a constant Easter message to an ever widening circle.

We call death the great divider, whereas, really and finally, it is the great uniter. All love-knit souls, severed here on earth, are at last brought together in the life to which death is but the portal.

The great argument for full and abundant life is not that death draws on apace, but that Christ lives and shares his conquering life with his friends. A holy life is the best testimony that a Christian can bear to his Master. The proof that a person is saved is less his getting to heaven—for we who remain on earth can know nothing about that—than his living an emancipated life right amid his present circumstances. I have seen folks, church members at that, whose souls are starved and dreary; who are slaves to petty cares. They know nothing of the joy of life, full, bubbling and overflowing, such as is the sure portion of those whom Christ has delivered from bondage. If religion is at all vital it is a present experience.

Professor William James did the world great service by his essay on "Second Wind," wherein he showed, by the analogy of the runner's power to get his "second wind," that every one of us has unsuspected reserves of life which ordinarily are unused. His summons was to larger and more vital living—to the life more abundant, physical, mental, social and spiritual. Science echoes the message of the Master, "I came that they may have life, and may have it more abundantly."

They multiply life who live in other lives. The art of sympathy and cooperation, of giving self to others and sharing others' selves, is Christ's own secret of vital living.

When we live for the same things for which Christ lived we are sharers of his largeness of life.

The yardstick for the measuring of a vital life is not in the world's hands. The best lives are often the obscurest—the "life hid with Christ in God." Publicity has its uses, but it never has been, and never can be, a true measure of the value of a life. Moreover, it carries ever the insidious temptation to make the plaudits of men, rather than the approval of God, the test of success. The apostolic ambition was to be "well pleasing unto him." The life that satisfies God needs no other reward.

Here is a great mystery. The theologians have never been able to expound it, but myriads of unlettered saints have experienced it—that newness of life is "in Christ," lived by his imparted power. Victory over the soul's downward drift, over innate littleness and sordidness, over earth's tug and pull, is somehow mysteriously given to those whose lives are in the keeping of the risen Christ.

MISSIONARY WORK

Christian Interests in Troubled Mexico

Presbyterians now have but two pieces of missionary property within the limits of the city of Mexico—the Church of Divine Salvation and the building of the mission press. The latter came within the zone of fire when the forces of Madero and Diaz were fighting in the Mexican capital, and the building was for a time hotly peppered with shot. Not being, however, directly between the contending forces, it did not suffer severely, but while the battle was on the employees were huddled together in one lower room, where much of the time they lay on the floor in order to be protected from the fire.

Other Presbyterian buildings at San Angel—a suburb forty minutes out by trolley—were the refuge of a number of people who came out from the city to escape the battle there. Many of these were themselves suburbanites who, at the outbreak of trouble, had gone into the center of town in order to escape the raids that they feared on the outskirts. They soon, however, discovered that they had miscalculated the place of greatest danger, and most of them were glad to get back to the suburbs.

The anxiety of the Presbyterian mission forces was doubled at this time by the sudden illness of Rev. R. A. Brown, the secretary of the mission and a professor in the theological school of Coyoacan. Owing to the disturbed situation in the city, it was impossible to obtain the American doctor who usually attends the missionaries, but the Mexican doctor called did not hesitate to pronounce it typhoid fever. It is hoped that Dr. Brown's illness will not be serious. The missionaries were also distressed at the death of Daniel Cavaleta, a young medical student and a very fine Christian young man, the son of the Presbyterian minister at Chilpanacingo.

The Y. M. C. A. did not come off so well as the denominational missions, for the handsome central building of the association in the City of Mexico was occupied as a fortress first by one side and then the other, and as a result became a target for fire from both directions. When the disturbance came to its tragic close, and the association secretary could look over the property, he calculated that the damage done was about $40,000, nearly one-half the original cost of the building.

In connection with the Mexican disturbance it is interesting to note that the Y. M. C. A. secretaries are now looked upon as indispensable adjuncts to both army and navy. As soon as it was determined to concentrate troops at Galveston for possible intervention service across the American border, Major General Wood, chief-of-staff of the army, telegraphed immediately to the international Y. M. C. A. headquarters in New York, requesting that secretaries be assigned to the Galveston camp. The admiral who took charge of the squadron dispatched to Vera Cruz sent a similar request as soon as he was ordered to sail.

Specifications of Missionary Calls

The Board of Foreign Missions in New York issues a statement of the candidates for appointment whom the board hopes to have present themselves during the year 1913. The statement is quite independent of the 1913 contingent of the 100 missionaries whom the General Assembly ordered sent out to China within the next three years, and for whose support the China emergency campaign is now raising funds.

In years past there has been a sort of alternation of needs. Sometimes there are more candidates applying than money is available to send; sometimes there is more money than candidates. The latter seems to be the situation now, and the board secretaries are offering earnest prayer for an increase in the number and improvement in the quality of volunteers desiring appointment. Of specific needs stated in the new circular some of the most interesting and attractive may be enumerated as follows:

In the Philippines an ordained minister is needed at each of the three stations of Dumaguete, Albay and Iloilo. At Leyte and Tayabos doctors are needed; at Bohol a trained nurse and at Cebu a matron for the girls' dormitory.

In Mexico the mission press at the capital wants a superintendent, and four teachers able to instruct in Spanish are called for—two men and two women. Also three ordained men are wanted.

Dr. Mary E. Gregg in Guatemala city needs a trained nurse for her hospital.

It is proposed to strengthen very decidedly the three mission stations in Colombia, and four ordained married men and four unmarried women are desired as reenforcements.

Some of the most important immediate opportunities in China are positions for a professor in the University of Nanking, a woman physician in Peking, a kindergartner in the same city, a teacher for the Theological Training School in Hainan, a trained nurse at Ichowfu, a physician for the Kerr hospital in Canton, two women teachers, college graduates, in the True Life Seminary in the same city, and ordained ministers at Hangchow, Ningpo, Chengchow and Shuntehfu.

Korea desires a man to take charge of the self-help department at the Syen Chun Academy, a teacher of domestic science at Pyeng Yang, a normal teacher at Seoul, two trained nurses at Chong Ju and Chai Ryong, and four ordained men at Taiku, Seoul, Fusan and Kangkai. The latter is almost exclusively pioneer work.

The needs of the Japan mission are summed up as four ordained men and three single women.

In India it is noted that the village settlement started at Islampur by Miss Grace Wilder has progressed to the point where an evangelistic preacher is needed. Men teachers are required at Kohlapur and Vengurle, while at Marji there is an opening for a medical man to teach in the medical school founded by Dr. Wanless. Woodstock College, where the daughters of missionaries and other Europeans and Americans are educated, needs a woman teacher, as does also the boarding school for boys in Ludhiana. A normal teacher is wanted in the school at Allahabad and a trained nurse in the Seward Hospital for Women at the same point. Evangelistic preachers are asked for at Lahore, Ferozepur, Ludhiana, Ambala, Gwalior, Etawah and Allahabad.

The Laos mission wishes eight ordained men, three physicians, one teacher and four unmarried women.

Siam emphasizes the need of ordained ministers chiefly and specifies locations for six of them, including a man to preach to the English-speaking residents at Bangkok.

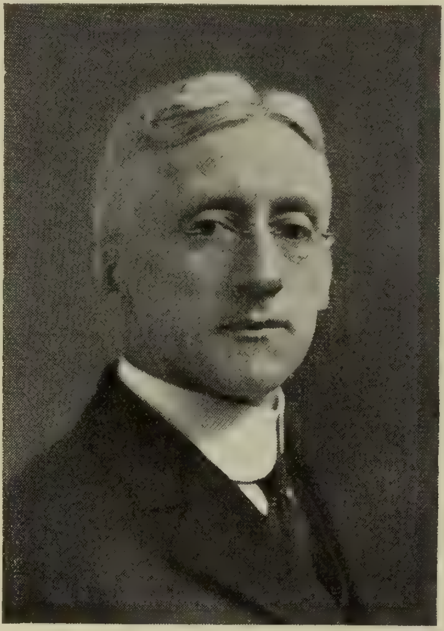
West Africa finally calls for one ordained minister, a physician, a farmer, a printer and a carpenter, beside two teachers, man and woman, to conduct school in Spanish at Benito.

Persons to whom any of these opportunities make an appeal are invited to write to Dr. James B. Rodgers, 156 5th avenue, New York City.

What Was in the Black Book

"I'd like to see what he has in that book."

It was a sticky afternoon in August—the dust and cinders seemed to penetrate through every pore into the souls of the passengers, making them raw and sore—when a smiling man, with prematurely gray hair, came briskly in, carrying two heavy grips with an ease suggesting long practice. Within a few moments he had opened a bag and was dictating rapidly and easily to his stenographer. The discomfort was nothing to him. It was refreshing, almost cooling, to watch him.



David McConaughy

Frequently he referred to a small loose-leaf book, occasionally making notes in it. The energy, coolness, industry, good nature and efficiency of the man so impressed a dignified banker who sat near that he said:

"I'd like to see what he has in that book."

Probably hundreds of other people have thought, or said, the same thing, for the indefatigable man was David McConaughy, and the black book contained the notes he has used in conducting his classes in the summer conferences, and during the winter campaigns in the larger cities.

Now the contents of the black book have been put in print. They make a singularly attractive little volume called "The World Book." The first part contains a concise history of the development of our church boards and a clear statement of their benevolent achievements, even to their influence upon recent revolutions. The second part presents a satisfactory solution for various financial and educational problems of the church—not mere theory but the successful practice of churches of widely differing types and locations—a plan which could be worked out only by a man of great ability and experience not only with church boards but also with pastors and people who were dissatisfied with the ordinary financial system—a plan worthy the genius and experience of David McConaughy.

But there is more than mechanism within these covers. The author's summary of the field now open to the church and of the church's responsibility is a statesmanlike challenge. His "thumb-nail" sketches of men who have made our church history open a wide field of Presbyterian biography. Intensely human illustrations, both humorous and pathetic, make the most abstract facts spring into life. Snapshot word pictures abound. His appeal is not merely for missions but for a continuation of all the great work the church has undertaken.

Board Notes and Announcements

—On presbyterial day at Room 48, Chicago, devotions were led by Mrs. J. G. K. McClure. The Japan map talk was by Miss Clark of Second church. Pablo Apacible, a medical student from the Philippines, welcomed by Mrs. Hill, president, spoke a few words. "I don't know," he concluded, "if all the Presbyterians are like Mr. Wright, but hope they are." Dr. Mary Gregg, planning to sail for Guatemala, spoke hopefully of both school and hospital. Mrs. Henderson of Westminster church, Minneapolis, gave the history of the "Mary Hill literature boxes." Mrs. Shaw announced the sudden death of Mrs. E. S. Williams of Minneapolis, a manager of this board almost since its formation and for twenty-eight years vice-president. A cablegram from Shanghai of the death of Mrs. J. M. W. Farnham was reported by Mrs. Coulter, whose words about this lovely Englishwoman who since 1860 has been telling the good news in China made a former foreign secretary say: "We ought to realize, and help young people to realize, that to work with God and for God is glorious." The report of Mrs. Glass, treasurer of Chicago Presbyterial Society, showed over $33,000 received during the year.

SOME NEW BOOKS

Livingstone and Stanley

How I Found Livingstone, by Henry M. Stanley, is a centenary reprint of the familiar book first issued in 1874. It reawakens the old interest and retains the old charm. Mr. Stanley's travels, adventures and discoveries in central Africa were crowned by four months of residence with Dr. Livingstone before he returned to England. This edition of his narrative is made notable by the excellent introduction written by Dr. Robert E. Speer of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. In a score of pages Dr. Speer brings the African story down to date, showing what "the spirit of Livingstone" has already done, and what it needs still to do. It is specially stirring in its statement of the new evil which has befallen Africa since Livingstone's day—the liquor traffic. He quotes Sir Richard Burton's declaration that "if the slave trade were revived with all its horrors, and Africa could get rid of the white man with the gunpowder and rum which he has introduced, Africa would be the gainer by the exchange." It is well to hear this indictment of civilization as the centennial of Livingstone's birth occurs. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $2 net.

Some Recent Fiction

My Little Sister, by Elizabeth Robins. Attracting first by the simple art with which it is written, and then riveting one's attention by the problem it presents, Miss Robins's little story ought to have a wide reading among students of social conditions. Her heroines are two little English girls—one 16, the other 18—brought up by a widowed mother in the sheltered seclusion of a rural estate. Neither of them has the slightest knowledge of the world; neither expects anything but good from people. The older one is developing a character of sturdiness and strength; the younger is in the stage when to have a "good time" is the essential thing in life. Both go up to London to visit an aunt whom they haven't seen for years and remember most indistinctly. They are met by a charming woman—supposedly but not really the aunt—and taken to her home. Peculiar conditions arouse vague suspicions in the older girl; and at dinner the man beside her confirms them by disclosing that she is in "one of the most terrible places in London," and tries to aid her escape. She manages to leave the house successfully, rush to her aunt's for help and start back to rescue Betty, when she realizes that she doesn't even know the address of "the terrible place." Little Betty is never heard from again. The probability of the story has been questioned, but Miss Robins vouches for it with her own investigations. American conditions are not so free from this sort of tragedy that one can refuse to be enlightened by Miss Robins's book. And, besides, it is an excellent piece of literature. The Lapse of Enoch Wentworth, by Isabel Gordon Curtis. An improbable tale of an actor who pledges his life into another man's keeping as the result of a poker game. There is no trace here of the charm and human appeal that made the author's "The Woman from Wolverton" so delightful. [F. G. Browne and Company, Chicago. $1.25 net.

The West Wind, by Cyrus Townsend Brady, is announced as a story of red men and white in old Wyoming. There is plenty of Indian fighting—all of which is described by the author as having actually occurred. [A. C. McClurg and Company, Chicago. $1.35 net.

Booklets for the Easter Season

THE OPEN HEARTH

Defying Conventional "Demands"

Does the average Presbyterian minister live beyond his means? This is the question that continually comes to my mind as I read the well worded appeals of the Relief and Sustentation Fund—with which I am in sympathy—as well as articles which comment on the restlessness of the ministry.

That the minister's income is small enough we all well know. But being what it is, does the average minister tend to live beyond it?

The ready answer will be that the minister and his family have "tastes" that must be gratified as well as unusual "demands" which must be met.

Without pausing to note that "tastes" need not always be gratified, I am interested to inquire what might be the result if the minister refused to meet the demands. The demands may be reduced to this, that a minister spend his entire income annually in an effort to keep up appearances, or, as we are inclined to say, increase his usefulness.

Suppose that he refused to do it!

Suppose that a minister, called to a new pastorate with a promised salary of $2,000, should call his officers together and have a heart-to-heart talk with them. Suppose that he should tell them he made it a habit to tithe his income; that his life insurance cost him $200 annually and that he was accustomed to set aside $25 a month for the oft-referred-to rainy day. Therefore it would be necessary for him to live in a locality and on a scale befitting a $1,300 income.

His congregation would either increase his salary or it would not. If it did the former to the amount, we will say, of the life insurance premium, then you have a practical contribution of $200 to the relief fund from a congregation that habitually gave perhaps one-tenth of that amount. But suppose the congregation feels that it cannot make an increase. Then suppose the minister chose a cottage among the wage earners of his community, where he could live comfortably upon the $1,300 at his disposal. What would be the result?

Do you say, "He would lose caste?" I wonder if his loss would not be abundantly compensated. Apart from his own peace of mind and freedom from financial strain with all which that implies, would not his very residence help to solve the problem sometimes suggested by the expression "church and labor"? Might he not, while being the pastor of the church, automatically become a leader among the very persons whom the church is energetically trying to "reach"? J. R. Z.

Interest-Taking Called Sinful

In the description of the supremely virtuous man, as written in the fifteenth psalm, we read these words: "He that putteth not out his money to interest, nor taketh reward against the innocent" (American revision).

Americans worship the god of Judas, and few can stand this acid test, "Sell that which ye have, and give alms." But George Muller, observing this law literally, and continuing in poverty, lodged, fed and educated thousands of orphans, receiving donations for them, as a result only of prayer to "the living God." But we, to get increase and interest, devour widows' houses and enslave children, forgetting that "labor is the common burden of mankind; so that the effort of some to shift their share of the burden onto the shoulders of others, by increase, interest, slavery or other oppression, is the great durable curse of the race"; and not perceiving that interest tends to put the wealth of a country into the hands of a few. The lender is "at certainties" and the borrower "at uncertainties," so that at the end of the game most of the money is in the hands of the bank; which by manipulating credits, keeps the actual dollar employed and drawing interest in several places at once.

"The interest bearing debt of the world can never be paid"; and the bondholders seem not to care, if only they may receive their interest forever.

The Romans of Cicero's day considered the lending of money for interest "an infamous and degrading profession"; and until the sixteenth century the church regarded interest as a species of robbery; and God calls it abomination (Ezek. 18:13, American revision).

Shall Presbyterians Imitate Mormons?

From the October Home Mission Monthly this fact concerning Mormon manners and customs is noted: "The saloon and dance hall abound, the latter often under control of the [Mormon] Church, as dances are held in connection with conventions of the various parts of the church." Here is a new objective for the Chicago Suburban Presbyterian church whose pastor confirms the report that dancing is to be a feature of a side room of the house of God this season. The Mormons argue that if the dance is good for the individual church, it is also good for a convention of churches! Onward then, progressives, let there be no rest until at our Christian Endeavor and Sunday school rallies our young people have the privilege (under careful chaperonage, of course!) of learning the latest steps from the last word in Presbyterian ecclesiasticism, namely, our official dancing master! Well, why not?

One Day in Seven Rest

A program of action is fast assuming shape for reducing labor on the Sabbath day and overcoming seven day toil. For years past business and labor have been tending more and more toward seven day labor. Railways have increased their traffic from a few trains to many trains on the Sabbath, and from perishable frieght only to all kinds of freight. Factories are planned with reference to seven day work. Men have lost conscience and enter into seven day labor as a necessary condition to secure work to support themselves.

The government report shows that over 29 per cent of the employees in the iron and steel industry of the United States labor seven days in the week. About 20 per cent of them labor twelve hours a day on the Sabbath and every day. Many of these labor where continuous employ is not necessary. In one county, it is reported, 14,000 persons work twelve hours each day and seven days in the week. In a quiet city of 30,000 population, where a one-day-in-seven rest law is being secured, it was said that there are scarcely any people in this town who work seven days in the week. But an investigation shows that about 4,000 persons are employed in that city in Sunday labor—in amusements, daily papers, drivers, railway service, electric plants, telegraph, telephone, bakeries, stores and in certain industries. Over 7 per cent of the entire population of one of our states labor seven days in the week. Many of the other states are not far behind that one.

We cannot estimate the loss in religious life and Christian character resulting from this condition. Can we wonder that many do not attend church? Does this not account, largely, for the small percentage of increase in church membership, and that about 3,500 Presbyterian churches did not add one person on profession last year? We must overcome labor and business on the Sabbath day if we hope to win these toilers to Christ.

The first object is to reduce Sunday labor. This can be done by one-day-in-seven rest laws by the legislatures. Many states are considering the measure now. J. P. Hutchison.

Unique Service in Honor of the New President

The recent first page editorial in The Continent, "God Aid the President!" was used in a unique way in Jefferson City, Mo., church March 2. The pastor, Rev. George S. Fulcher, in the course of the morning service read those portions of the editorial constituting petitions for divine guidance for the new President. With bowed heads the congregation joined in the response, God aid the President!

Ways of Working

Work of the Ushers Always Important

Many congregations magnify the office and work of the church usher in a way that adds much to the popularity and success of the meetings for public worship. It is a mistake for a small church not to have someone to see that people are seated comfortably and that strangers are welcomed. In some of the most successful churches the ushers have an organization with regular meetings, and have in their membership some of the leading men.

People attending a church and accepting the help of an usher to a seat should follow his lead and not drop into a place and leave the usher in an embarrassing situation.

While men of prominence should gladly serve as ushers, they should see that some of the younger men are always in training for the work. The leader of the committee of ushers should have a sense of responsibility for all that relates to the comfort of the congregation and should so study the church building that he may know how to ventilate wisely and how to regulate the temperature.

The tender care of old or crippled people, wisdom in handling boys and girls not with their parents, all that relates to quiet and good order makes the task of the usher not easy but very important. DUNCAN C. MILNER.

What of Your Church This Summer?

Many a minister who was discouraged at the work of his church last summer is making plans for better results this year during July and August. Perhaps pastors who have solved the summer problem for their locality will be glad to tell how they did it, for the inspiration of others. The Continent will print in this column three or four of the most helpful of these experiences. The articles should not exceed 400 words; better a little shorter, so two can be printed in this column at once.

Report of Attendance

There is a Chicago church of another denomination which uses a plan which could be adopted with profit by many Presbyterian churches. Once a month the chief usher prints a report in the weekly bulletin giving the attendance at each of the regular services by weeks. The totals are divided among the men, women and children so that an accurate record is kept of the attendance.

Instructions for Ushers

Some churches issue for the ushers suggestions regarding ways of keeping order, preventing people from finding seats during Scripture reading and the dispersing of groups inclined to talk at the back of the church before service.

Three Tested Plans

—The habit of lunching together one noon a week or every two weeks has long been tried by officers of churches in many cities with marked increase in interest and efficiency. Plans of definite work are talked over and reports made. Sunday school officers also do this, sometimes meeting Monday noons while the difficulties of the preceding day are fresh in mind. Such a noon meeting saves time and attracts men who will not give an evening to the same work.

—Clean blotters with hours of service and an invitation are distributed by many churches to hotels and writing rooms. Often copies of the church calendar accompany the blotters. Many a traveling man has been drawn to service in this way. Churches in small cities can use this scheme to good advantage.

—A hardware dealer of Covington, Ind., recently gave 10 per cent of his sales one day to the women of three churches who acted as clerks.

Tell of Presbyterian Colleges

The year 1913 celebrates the thirtieth anniversary of the College Board, and in honor of this occasion and also to give to the church information about its educational institutions, the board has now on the press an illustrated book, "Presbyterian Colleges."

The volume will give a brief historical sketch of the growth of Presbyterian college work during the past thirty years and then devote two pages to each of the Presbyterian institutions. Of the sixty colleges now affiliated with the board, only seventeen were in existence as colleges in 1883; three were counted as nonsectarian in 1883; eight were received with the Cumberland Church and thirty-two were organized or grew from academies into colleges since the organization of the College Board.

Bradford Horton, Man

"Suppose someone should go above $13,000—what then?"

"I think the man would go above the bidder."

"Will the dwellings be up before or after the farm?"

"Afterwards. The large one first."

"What will they bring?"

"The two? Oh, perhaps $15,000."

"Will you sell me that large house?"

"No. It will have to go under the hammer. I have a customer who has wanted it for a summer hotel for a long time. I offered it to him for $15,000, but he said he could buy it at auction better."

"Your customer would have done well to take your offer. He will not get it for that now."

"Are you a bidder?"

"Well, I represent a man who has had his eye on that house for a long time. I have heard him say it is worth $20,000. I must tell you that I intend to further the interests of my client in every way possible."

"Then do I understand that you will bid $20,000 for that property?"

"I did not say I should. But I will say your customer will not get it for a song."

His talk with the receiver finished, Ansley Jickers proceeded to call upon Mrs. Horton and her daughter, introducing himself simply as a friend of Bradford. The elder lady, quick to recognize a man of no ordinary rank and breeding, made him welcome, with a little added touch to her appreciation of Bradford, if such a man as this was numbered among his friends.

"When did you see my boy?" she asked. "Is he quite well?"

"I saw him two days ago, madam, and he was in excellent health."

"You are kind to call, Mr. Jickers," said Anna. "We are always glad to hear directly from Bradford."

The conversation ran on easily, touching oftenest on Bradford's nobility of character, while beneath the surface of the talk the lawyer was thinking, "The old lady doesn't mean to admit that he's not her own, now he's turned out so well. She doesn't know how much I know." And in the mother's mind the thought repeated itself, "Then my letter did not harm him, if men like this are his friends. Oh, I am thankful!"

"I suppose," she said at last, "that since you live in Prestonbury you are acquainted with a Mr. Elmore—Richard P. Elmore. Is he still living?"

"Very much so, madam. Just now, however, he is abroad and will not return for a year yet. I infer you may have known him?"

"Yes, many years ago."

"It is strange that Bradford should not have mentioned him;" proceeded Ansley, enjoying his own duplicity. He knew why his friend had not mentioned the subject. "He prepared his grandson for Yale, and has his room at present in the home of the boy's mother, young Mrs. Elmore."

Anna replied before her mother could. "Oh, he told us of the boy he tutored, and of what a delightful home he had, but he never mentioned the name."

Mrs. Horton let the conversation slip away from her, while over and over in her mind she gave thanks that her letter had done no harm. None the less, when the caller was gone, she sat down and spent an hour or more on a letter to Mr. Elmore, which she inclosed in a note to Ansley Jickers at his Prestonbury address.

"I intrust to you the inclosed letter," she wrote. "Please do not deliver it while I am living." To herself she added, "There is no

What Another Elder Says

"In the last issue of our various church papers I note in the card of our Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, "What Two Elders Said." Permit me to ask if this occurrence was an actual fact or only a parable in the interest of the board. If the latter, I have nothing to say, but if the incident did occur, I have a remark to make. I can conceive how some such narrow, penurious man may have slipped in and had his name entered on a church roll in the absence of a full meeting of session, but how such a man could under any ordinary circumstances become an elder I cannot conceive. Truly he is out of place and his church should investigate the rotary system of eldership. This "elder" says that "ministers ought to earn enough to take care of themselves." They do, and if it were not for just such folk as this elder they would receive it; and if they did there would be no necessity for either of these boards.

"When I hear such expressions from an elder in the Presbyterian Church I become considerably warmed up, and if I should meet such a one (I hope I may not) I fear I would fall from grace long enough to say some things which might make it necessary to call a meeting of our session for a case of discipline. It is a shame that a church such as ours, with a ministry second to none in intelligence and ability, should permit its ministers to serve for a salary which an ordinary clerk would refuse to consider. And should a minister modestly hint for at least sufficient salary to live decently and raise his family respectably, he is regarded as mercenary.

"No other calling or profession requiring anything like the years of preparation is so poorly paid, and no other demands so complete a consecration to specific service; and no other comes so close to the heart and homes of our people. And none should be so free from any necessity of giving temporal affairs consideration as regards this livelihood. Can we not convert the finances of our great church, owned by our people as stewards of the Master, so that the necessity of a minister to ask for relief or aid will only be a dark memory we want to forget, and a simple hint would bring more than enough to make every faithful servant of the Lord rest in ease so far at least as a living is concerned? All we have comes from our heavenly Father, and is not ours. We are only the ones who distribute and we must give an account of our stewardship.

"A MEMBER OF SESSION."

Beaver Falls, Pa.

No, brother elder, it was not a parable but an actual fact. Thank you in behalf of the Presbyterian ministry for your faithful and splendid rejoinder!

Do not the elders of the 4,000 churches that gave nothing to this cause last year, and the elders who themselves gave nothing, even though their churches did contribute, feel the sting of this brother elder's plea?

need for him to know, at least for Bradford's sake. The letter did no harm."

Punctually at midnight Barney O'Toole knocked at the door of the lawyer's room in the Inwood inn. Ansley went straight to the heart of his business.

"I asked you to meet me at this late hour, Mr. Oren-Toole——"

"Drop it, Mr. Jickers. I am Barney O'Toole. That student of yours, that singer, that whatever, whoever he is, has jolted the Oren-Toole out of me. I've been shamming on the name business for a wood while, but I've quit."

"Good, Barney. I knew your father. I knew when you moved your mother into town. I've known all about you, of course. But that isn't what we're here for now. I'm here to save for Mrs. Horton all that can be saved out of this wreck, and I want your help."

"All right. I'll help."

"The farm must sell for $70 an acre. Henry Horton always held it at a hundred."

"That would make $17,150, Mr. Jickers."

"Those are my figures. Now, the big house must bring $20,000 and the small one $4,000."

"That's more than the whole claim, Mr. Jickers," said Barney in surprise.

"Of course. More is always better than less, when it comes to paying debts. Our job, you see, is to get those prices. There's an old farmer here, I'm told, who wants the farm, and I know someone who will bid the property up till the price that farmer offers reaches my figure."

"Good. And where do I come in?"

"Presently. I'll bid on the big house myself, and make it sell for the $20,000. And I want you to buy the small one."

"I see. Well, I've no money to buy houses with myself, but I think I see your game. Horton's trying to save that house for his mother, isn't he?"

"Exactly. As to money, here's your $4,000. Keep cool tomorrow and don't get rattled. Start the bidding low and keep it low for a while. There'll be someone bidding against you, but when you say $4,000 the hammer will fall like a shot. You can hold your tongue?"

"Sure."

"Then we're started in good shape. Money all there?" as Barney, with the banking instinct, began to count it. His signature to the receipt for it closed an evening's work very satisfactorily to Ansley Jickers.

The summer hotel man, arriving from New York, had been informed by Cathcart on that same evening that he had a competitor on the ground ready to pay $20,000 for the big house.

"Well," he said with a shrug, "if he gets that house he'll pay more than $20,000 for it."

School and College

The Sons of the American Revolution will establish a scholarship in Whitman College.

Pikeville College is placing large emphasis on the study of the Bible. Classes in Bible are taught by Dr. M. D. McClelland, pastor of Pikeville, Ky., church.

J. F. Clokey, D. D., pastor of Westminster church, Dubuque, Iowa, is delivering a series of lectures on practical theology to the seminary men at Dubuque German College and Seminary.

The junior class of Western College, of which Edgar Stillman Kelley is an honorary member, were the guests of the composer at a Friday Cincinnati symphony concert. The symphonic poem, "The Defeat of Macbeth," by Mr. Kelley, was the opening number.

The annual senior day was celebrated at Western College Feb. 22. The second largest senior class in Western's history, numbering thirty-six, made its initial bow in cap and gown. Mrs. Frances Squire Potter gave an address.

Agnes Scott College, Decatur, Ga., suburban to Atlanta, will next year eliminate its preparatory department and centralize upon strictly college work. Agnes Scott College is one of the few woman's colleges in the South which are recognized as standard.

The special college preachers for the term in addition to members of the faculty and pastors of the local churches have been chosen to present various aspects of mission work. They are S. Hall Young, D. D., Alaska; Rev. Robert M. Labaree, Persia; Robert H. H. Goheen, M. D., India; while China is to be presented by Dr. Arthur J. Brown of the Board of Foreign Missions.

Dr. Cleland B. McAfee of McCormick Seminary, a son of the first president of Park College, conducted the annual series of vocational conferences in that college Feb. 20-23. The purpose of these conferences is to help the student body decide the problem of life work.

The sermon on the Day of Prayer for Colleges at Lafayette College was preached by John R. Davies, D. D., of the class of 1881, pastor of Bethlehem church, Philadelphia. The series of meetings immediately preceding were conducted by William H. Foulkes, D. D., of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation; Rev. Samuel Guy Snowden, Fifth church, Trenton; J. Beveridge Lee, D. D., St. Paul's church, Philadelphia, and Rev. George Gordon Mahy, secretary of the General Assembly's evangelistic committee.

Whitman College trustees have received official announcement that the General Education Board will contribute $125,000 for the endowment of the college, provided that by June 30, 1914, a supplemental sum of not less than $375,000 shall be contributed. This is the first gift which the board has made in the Pacific Northwest. When the conditions shall have been met Whitman College will not only be upon a firm foundation for future development but will be able to extend its present work into new fields of effort. Last year the people of Walla Walla, Wash., and the immediate vicinity raised $213,146 to clear the college from indebtedness and to place it in condition so that it could receive this contribution from the General Education Board.

With the Detroit Churches

From March 14 to 17 the special campaign for China will be pressed by a very competent committee, of which Dr. Joseph A. Vance is chairman. Special speakers will address meetings and all of the pastors will heartily cooperate.

Rev. T. Walker Malcolm has been celebrating the fifth anniversary of his pastorate with St. Andrew's church. When he went there the church was receiving aid from the Presbyterian Alliance and was discouraged by the encroachment of Jews and foreigners. The large congregations and Sunday school are evidence today of the aggressive work that is being done.

Highland Park church is installing the pipe organ which was formerly in Central church, and before that in First church. It was the gift of presbytery, through the church extension committee, which had charge of the changes in readjustments of church property.

The newest Presbyterian church of Detroit, Gratiot Avenue, in spite of its limitations in the temporary portable church, is by its diversified industries and its growing congregation and Sunday school compelling presbytery to face the necessity of a permanent building in the near future. Two police officers were kept busy clearing the aisles in Pasadena church on a recent Sunday when Dr. Henry van Dyke preached to a crowded house.

Hugh H. Wallace of Los Angeles was elected president of the County Christian Endeavor Union at its recent convention at Long Beach. The next meeting will be in Pomona Feb. 22, 1914.

The annual meeting of Brooklyn church, Oakland, showed that $6,933 was raised during the year, of which $1,900 was for missions and benevolences. One of the missionaries of the church was present at this meeting. Rev. H. K. Sanborne is pastor.

North Carolina

The new church being built at Mebane is nearing completion. An up-to-date Sabbath school room adjoins the main auditorium and will be separated from it by rolling partitions. A large basement will provide room for parlors, reading room, kitchen. The building, finished and furnished, will cost about $12,000. Rev. F. M. Hawley is pastor. A home department was started the first of January, in which forty-four members have been enrolled.

Colorado

A campaign is about to be commenced to install a bowling alley and athletic apparatus in the basement of First church, Fort Morgan. Rev. W. H. DuBose is pastor. He believes that the addition of athletics to churches would go far toward solving the boy and girl problem.

Indiana

A two weeks' campaign to raise funds for a new church on Washington avenue, Evansville, will be commenced soon.

Logansport First church, Dr. Frank Granstaff pastor, has had steady growth during the past year. Dr. and Mrs. Granstaff have given themselves untiringly to the work of the church and have opened their home and dispensed a most gracious hospitality.

Wisconsin

New Milwaukee Church Opened

The new edifice of Perseverance church was dedicated March 2 with splendid exercises. Dr. George L. Robinson of McCormick Theological Seminary preached in the morning and at the special service of dedication in the afternoon. In the evening Dr. J. B. Donaldson of La Porte, Ind., father of the pastor, gave a sermon. Despite the untoward weather the church was filled three times, the audience in the afternoon overflowing into the Sabbath school rooms. It was announced that the entire cost of the structure, $16,000, was provided. Under the leadership of Rev. Robert S. Donaldson, who was called six years ago upon his graduation from McCormick Seminary, the church has grown until the old structure was inadequate. The completed structure is of brick veneer, with beautiful art windows, and the interior finish in light oak. A gallery extends across the rear of the auditorium, making its total seating capacity about 400. Into this the Sabbath school rooms can be thrown, adding space for several hundred more. There are shower baths in the basement, to be used in connection with the athletic work of the Sabbath school. Special attention has been paid to educational equipment. Several rooms have been fitted with blackboards, tables, maps and charts. Special features are the concealed lights in the auditorium; the annunciator by which the pastor, touching various buttons in the pulpit, can communicate with the ushers as to temperature, and an electrically lighted bulletin—said to be the largest in the Northwest—on the outside of the building.

During the dedication week there was the formal opening of the athletic department Monday and Tuesday, a special Lenten service Wednesday night, a general reception Thursday night and a sacred concert Friday night. The membership of Perseverance is now 450, and rapidly growing. E. A. C.

STRENGTH

Without Overloading the Stomach

The business man, especially, needs food in the morning that will not overload the stomach, but give mental vigor for the day.

Much depends on the start a man gets each day as to how he may expect to accomplish the work on hand.

He can't be alert with a heavy, fried-meat-and-potatoes breakfast requiring a lot of vital energy in digesting it.

A California business man tried to find some food combination that would not overload the stomach in the morning, but that would produce energy.

He writes:

"For years I was unable to find a breakfast food that had nutrition enough to sustain a business man without overloading his stomach, causing indigestion and kindred ailments.

"Being a very busy and also a very nervous man, I decided to give up breakfast altogether. But luckily I was induced to try Grape-Nuts.

"Since that morning I have been a new man; can work without tiring, my head is clear and my nerves strong and quiet.

"I find four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts, with one of sugar and a small quantity of cold milk, is delicious as the cereal part of the morning meal, and invigorates me for the day's business." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

"There's a reason."

With Cleveland Churches

At the March meeting of the Presbyterian Club Dr. Wilber C. Mickey read a paper on "Tabernacle Evangelism," dealing mainly with the popular objections. The work of Billy Sunday was continuously mentioned in the discussion, and it was evident that the work of this evangelist is rapidly rising above all opposition in the minds of the clerical brethren.

Plans for the union or federation of Barberton Presbyterian and Reformed churches are being earnestly discussed. Presbytery intrusted to its executive commission power to act. The Reformed church is older than the Presbyterian and has a larger membership, but only about one-half as much property.

A peculiarly sad affliction recently entered the home of Dr. Thomas S. McWilliams of Calvary church in the death of the mother of Mrs. McWilliams, the latter being in Europe.

Rev. G. A. Johnston Ross will conduct services during Passion week in Calvary church.

Boulevard church has entered upon a campaign of evangelistic work, Rev. H. H. Ryland of Pittsburg assisting the pastor, Rev. Robert J. MacAlpine. This movement commenced with thirty-five prayer meetings in the parish, with the determination to win at least 100 new members.

The annual banquet of Miles Park church will be held March 14.

Methodists and Presbyterians are making use of portable chapels in inaugurating new mission work. Presbyterians recently erected a $1,200 portable house for the work at Phillips Avenue.

With the dedication of the new Woodland Avenue church gymnasium this church takes its place among the seven-days-a-week institutions.

The charts and photographs of the Presbyterian exhibit after four weeks in Beckwith house of Euclid Avenue church are to be transferred to Bolton Avenue church, of which Rev. E. P. Cleaveland is pastor.

Tusculum Bulletin No. 5

The Tusculum Student

Tusculum is located under the shadow of the Great Smokies, in the very center of the beautiful East Tennessee Valley.

She draws her students not only from the prosperous and cultured families of the towns and valley, but also from the sturdy mountain folk who have had neither money nor opportunity.

The Tusculum student comes to college, he is not sent.

From 50 to 100 letters similar to the following are received by the president at the beginning of each school year:

> "DEAR DR. GRAY: Your letter is at hand, and I am sorry to say I cannot pay $50.00 for the year, for I haven't it. If I could, I would, but I am a poor boy and have no one to help me. I pray God to open up some way for me, for I do want to go to school."

One boy sold a sheep and a shotgun, his sole possessions, and walked 60 miles to Tusculum. He spent four years, graduated with honors, and is now one of the leading ministers of the country.

A girl, whose sole capital was $18.00, derived from the sale of a cow, worked her way through Tusculum, took a post-graduate course in a leading eastern university and is now doing a splendid work as a teacher among her own people.

First church of Reading, Rev. R. M. Blackburn pastor, has lost by death its senior elder, J. H. Sternbergh.

Chambers Memorial church of Rutledge, Rev. L. Van Alen pastor, has installed a new pipe organ at a cost of $3,000.

The Presbyterians of Coatesville recently gave their pastor and his wife, Rev. and Mrs. George E. Gillespie, a brilliant reception in commemoration of the close of the twelfth year of his pastorate. Over 600 persons attended.

The annual dinner of the men's Bible class of First church, Allentown, to the men of the church Feb. 21 was addressed by Dr. S. N. Doyle of Philadelphia and Dr. A. G. Rau of Bethlehem. This class is taught by Judge F. M. Trexlee, who is well known throughout eastern Pennsylvania for his work for juvenile delinquents.

Campaign for World Missions Stirs North Dakota

A new manner of campaign for awakening churches has just been tried with conspicuous success at Fargo, N. D. It was a combination of the idea of the China campaign with a little of "The World in Fargo" combined with the suggestion of a school of missions. The campaign lasted fourteen days and was called a world campaign of missionary evangelism. Admission was charged for the course. Delegates were registered from all parts of North Dakota and many from eastern Minnesota. Some of the campaigners were sent on two day missions to interior points of the state to hold special meetings. It was under the control of the Presbyterians, but all the churches of Fargo cooperated. The Commercial Club contributed to the expenses and the Masons loaned their hall for a big banquet.

Four trunks of curios, with liberal supplies of literature, provided a "world studio" in charge of Mrs. C. E. Bradt. People bought large numbers of books on missions and had to be driven from the place near midnight every evening, so great was the interest. Conferences and luncheons were held with various church officers to counsel on matters of church management in addition to the lectures, mission study courses and other regular features of the campaign. Missionaries were present from seven countries. The newspapers gave large space, and several cities are competing for the next such conference.

Dr. Penhallegon Resigns Pulpit

After acting for twenty-four years as pastor of First church, Decatur, Ill., Dr. W. H. Penhallegon has announced his resignation to take effect in April. He has been asked to assume charge of the mission work of Illinois outside Chicago. He has for twenty years been chairman of the home missions committee of Springfield Presbytery.

Churches Lead Community Life

City and Country Congregations Expand Their Work—Farmers Join Derby Men's Association—Chapter House for Lafayette.

BUFFALO—A number of churches of this presbytery are adding institutional features. Allegany, a small village church, has just completed a large basement under its auditorium, which it has fitted up for social functions and with gymnasium equipment. A healthy community interest has been aroused and all departments of the church have been quickened.

The church at Derby, a new church whose membership is made up of commuters and the people of the open country, has recently purchased a large modern barn which has been equipped for social and athletic purposes. The five-acre plot on which the barn stands is also being used in the community work of the church. The interest which has been aroused is indicated by the fact that 125 farmers have joined the men's association, paying the annual fee of $5.

The church at Alden has just announced that its generous patron, Colonel Joseph E. Ewell, has donated $20,000 for the immediate erection of a village library upon the church property and has set aside $25,000 for its maintenance.

Dunkirk church has nearly raised $15,000 for the erection of a community house.

Lafayette church of Buffalo affords the most striking instance of the return of the modern church to its place of leadership in the community life. It stands in the heart of one of the best residence parts of the city and has just expended over $16,000 on its social center on the remote East side, and now its men's association has launched a movement to raise $100,000 to add to its great church plant a chapter house for the social and recreational life of the community.

Your Grocer Is Your Friend

Of course you don't go to your grocer for advice as to what you shall eat, and yet you like to have him keep you in touch with the latest products of the food factories and the latest discoveries in dietetics. If you are one of his regular customers he is apt to call your attention from time to time to foods that he thinks will tempt your palate or appeal to the tastes of some particular member of your family.

Like every other merchandiser, the grocer must move forward with the procession. New things must take the place of old commodities which have fallen into disuse.

There is one product, however, for which the grocer will not offer you a substitute. He will not offer you a substitute for shredded wheat biscuit because there is no substitute. Shredded wheat biscuit is in a class by itself, a product that is unique in its wonderful adaptation to the needs of the human body. While whole wheat has been recognized for four thousand years as man's staff of life, it is through the process of steam cooking, shredding and baking that it is made most digestible in the human stomach.

There are two reasons why ordinary whole wheat flour bread does not possess the food value of shredded wheat. The first reason is because it is very difficult to find real whole wheat flour in this country. The second reason is that whole wheat flour, when made into a dough and baked in the oven, is not thoroughly digestible. Through the shredding process every particle of the rich, body-building material in the whole wheat grain is made digestible in the human stomach.

One or two of these biscuits, eaten every morning with hot milk and a little cream, will not only supply all the strength needed for a half day's work, but its daily use at one or more meals will keep the bowels healthy and active. Being ready cooked and ready to serve, it is a great boon to the housekeeper who is called upon to prepare a wholesome, nourishing meal quickly and without kitchen worry or trouble. The biscuit is deliciously nourishing when eaten with stewed prunes, sliced bananas, baked apples, peaches or preserved fruits of any kind.

Confer on Relations with Union

Committees Discuss Seminary Standing with Church—Devotional Meeting of Presbytery —Dr. Matthews in Brooklyn.

NEW YORK—Union Seminary has appointed a committee to confer with the special committee of General Assembly appointed in May, 1911, at Atlantic City, to consider the reestablishment of harmonious relations with the Presbyterian Church. This committee and the church's committee will hold their first joint meeting at the Hotel Savoy March 13. Among the members of the seminary committee are President Francis Brown, Dr. Anthony H. Evans and Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst. The church's committee has Dr. John F. Carson as chairman. The other clerical members are Dr. David G. Wylie of Scotch church, who introduced the original resolution before Assembly; John R. Davies of Philadelphia, Samuel S. Palmer of Columbus, Ohio; Frank C. Monfort, editor of The Herald and Presbyter. All the laymen on the committee are judges except Louis H. Severance. The judges are Warren E. Settle of Frankfort, Ky.; Henry B. Freeman of Chicago and Elisha H. Perkins of Baltimore.

Rev. William Sinclair, until a short time ago assistant at First church, Yonkers, was recently installed as pastor of Jay Gould Memorial Reformed church, Roxbury, where he succeeded Rev. N. H. Demarest, who left to return to Japan as a missionary, where he had been twenty years before.

New York Presbytery held a devotional meeting in Fourth church, of which Moderator Edgar W. Work is pastor, the afternoon and evening of March 10. At night there were addresses on "Personal Work in Winning Souls" by Doctors John Henry Jowett and Jonathan C. Day.

A memorial service for Mervin J. McMillan was held in Hope chapel Sunday afternoon, March 2. Mr. McMillan was an elder in Broadway church, the mother of the chapel, for more than twenty-five years.

DEDICATE NEW ITALIAN CHURCH

The beautiful new Italian Church of the Ascension will be dedicated Palm Sunday. This is a product of the church extension committee and is the second Presbyterian church for Italians in the city. The pastor is Rev. Francesco Pirazzini.

Northminster church, Rev. Arthur H. Limouze pastor, celebrated its eighth anniversary Sunday, March 2.

Dr. William J. Dawson of "old" First, Newark, addressed the ministers' association March 10. Other speakers this month and their topics will be: March 17, Rev. J. Jeffrey Johnstone, First church, Huntington, L. I., "The Secret of Power"; March 24, Rev. Chauncey W. Goodrich, assistant at Fifth Avenue church, "Religious Forces in France; Will They Keep France Christian?" March 31, Dr. Curtis Lee Laws, new editor of The Baptist Examiner, "The Problem of Religious Journalism."

Moderator Mark A. Matthews addressed a mass meeting of Brooklyn Presbyterians in the Academy of Music Wednesday evening, March 5. The churches abandoned their weekly prayer meetings to attend. The same morning Dr. Matthews spoke at the Bible Teachers' Training School, New York City.

Dedicatory services of the new Throop Avenue church, Brooklyn, began March 2 and will continue through two weeks.

Brick church will hold a service every afternoon in Holy week at 5 o'clock, with different ministers officiating. Thursday there will be a special celebration of the Lord's supper.

The Neighborhood Lunch Club of Brick church celebrated its first anniversary March 5 by a public meeting. The general theme was "Work for Girls in New York City." The speakers were Miss Florence Simms and Miss Cordelia E. Marshall, both ardent workers for self-supporting girls. Brick church serves every day, the women themselves waiting on the table, luncheon in a basement near the church at reasonable cost, so that working girls can have a hot meal within the limits of their pocketbooks.

President John G. Hibben of Princeton was the leading speaker at the annual dinner of the Social Union of Brooklyn at Masonic temple the evening of March 11. Other speakers were Dr. Wilton Merle-Smith of Central church and Professor Thomas C. Hall of Union Seminary.

Broadway church, Walter Duncan Buchanan, D. D., pastor, is steadily increasing in membership.

STRIKERS WERE GRATEFUL FOR FAVORS

Monday evening, March 3, the men from the cutters and white goods workers and the girls from the white goods workers met at Labor temple for a celebration of their recent victory won in their general strike. They presented a beautiful silver loving cup to the superintendent of the temple for the kindness shown during time of need.

The National Federation of Gospel Missions holds its annual convention in New York City beginning May 10. On Sunday, May 11, the leaders of rescue mission work in various American cities will be the speakers in most of the churches of metropolitan New York.

New Church in Use in Dallas

First Church Completed at Cost of $150,000—Men of Both Branches of Presbyterianism to Join in Banquet.

DALLAS—First church entered its beautiful new house March 2. It was almost two years in building and cost over $150,000. It is a magnificent pile of brick, stone and terra cotta. It is a thing new in the religious history of the city. It blends the Greek and the Byzantine in architecture and has a seating capacity of about 1,000 in the main building and 500 in the Sunday school room. Its gallery has no equal in this section, supported as it is by steel beams, all of which are hidden. The pastor is one of the most popular in the Southern Assembly. The church has 1,000 or more members.

The two branches of Presbyterianism are dwelling together in unity in Dallas. Five churches belong to the Southern and five to the Northern Assembly. At the banquet of their Social Union March 27 they will have as guests 100 Presbyterian men, fifty from the U. S. and fifty from the U. S. A. churches of the two synods. Doctors James E. Clark, Henry Sweets, S. M. Templeton and R. E. Vinson will be the speakers. A larger consciousness of the oneness and the need of Presbyterianism in Texas it is hoped will result.

Rev. J. H. Burma of Second church has recently assisted Rev. James Kirkland of Bethany in a series of successful revival services.

Exposition Park church, from which Rev. J. H. Curry resigned to go to Kansas City, is still vacant.

Rev. B. P. Fullerton, the field man of the Southwest for the Home Board, held his annual conference with the presbyterial chairman of Texas Synod last week in Central church. William C. Templeton, D. D., of Emporia, Kan., the newly elected field man of synod, met with the state workers. J. A. Hornbeak, Robert A. Rogers, W. E. Green, L. Clay Collier and Horatio F. Olmstead were elected pastor-evangelists.

Central church has again contracted for the sale of its lot, this time for $145,000—possibly the largest price ever received for a church property in Texas. The lot was bought fifteen years ago for $6,000. That year, the second of the pastorate of J. Franklin Smith, D. D., the present house was built. The expansion of the city and the incoming of interurbans along the street in front of the building have rendered the site unsuitable for a place of worship. Three years ago the church bargained to sell the property for $60,000, but was stopped by the first of several legal tangles. Should this deal be successful a new church will be built on a lot in the heart of the city bought recently for $45,000. J. FRANK SMITH.

Lafayette Endowment Growing

Encouraging Reports at Alumni Banquet—Book of Dr. Holmes's Writings in Press—Chester County Fights Saloons.

PHILADELPHIA—The Lafayette College Alumni Association held its annual banquet at the Bellevue-Stratford March 6. It was attended with much enthusiasm. Commendable progress is being made in the raising of the million dollar endowment fund. A recent contribution of $980 was received from First church of Wellsboro, Pa., Rev. G. P. Hershey pastor, following a presentation by Dr. S. H. Doyle, field agent of synod's committee.

The Presbyterian Board of Publication has in press, to be published shortly, a volume of literary and religious productions from the pen of the late corresponding editor of The Continent, Dr. R. S. Holmes. They have been edited by his daughter, Miss Mabel D. Holmes, in response to many inquiries for such a volume.

John M. Somerndike of Philadelphia, for many years connected with the Sabbath school department of the Board of Publication, has been elected missionary superintendent.

Miss Anna H. Jessup of Beirut, Syria, daughter of the late Dr. H. H. Jessup, assisted her cousin, Mrs. J. R. Swain, in the woman's Bible class of Woodland church on a recent afternoon. In the same church a memorial service to the late Mrs. Louise W. Comegys on the evening of March 12 was addressed by representatives of the Woman's Foreign Board and the Foreign Missionary Society of presbytery.

New Church Is Organized

Knox church has been organized with 200 members, sixty-one of whom were received on confession. The Sunday school has a membership of 278. Rev. Charles Cooper, for some time stated supply of the mission, has been called as pastor of the church.

Dr. Crafts of Washington and Rev. John Quincy Adams Henry addressed the ministers March 3 and Dr. C. Linn Seiler, secretary of the department of publicity, made an appeal for children March 10. Samuel Ridout of Plainfield, N. J., will speak March 17 on "The Person of Christ as Revealed in the Scriptures."

The Christian citizens of the neighboring county of Chester have for some weeks been lining up in the courts for a contest with the new applicants for liquor license. The no license forces are thoroughly organized. Charles L. Huston of the evangelistic committee of General Assembly is chairman; John H. Cole, an elder of Mendenhall and president of Chester County Sunday School Association, is secretary. Rev. E. M. Van Note, pastor of Fairview church; John W. Dalles, an elder of First church of West Chester, and Rev. W. G. Nyce of St. Peter's are the other officers.

New Plan for Assembly

Philadelphia Presbytery held its March meeting with Ninth church, Dr. J. A. Higgons pastor, and was entertained by the ladies. Rev. Waldo Stevenson was received from Presbytery of Havana; also his son Waldo W. as a candidate for the ministry. An overture in favor of Assembly reduction was directed to be sent to General Assembly reading thus: "Each presbytery the communicant members of whose churches number 4,000 or more shall send one minister and one elder for each 4,000 members. Each presbytery having less than 4,000 members shall send one minister one year and one elder the next."

Rev. Albany R. Smith, son of the evangelist, Gipsy Smith, has been addressing meetings in Philadelphia. W. P. White.

A Gift for You—This Beautiful Calendar

FOR THE ASKING

The above illustration is a reduction of a large beautiful photograph taken on one of our thousands of attractive and prosperous Idaho farms. I framed a few copies of the photograph in artistic calendar form without any advertising and mailed one to each of our customers who are readers of THE CONTINENT. One of the acknowledgments reads as follows:

"The beautiful Calendar came today. It is certainly a work of art and I appreciate it highly."

¶ I shall be pleased to send one of these handsome calendars free of charge to any other readers of THE CONTINENT who desire to invest their funds safely and profitably. The actual cost of these calendars is $3 each, but I shall be glad to give them to prospective clients.

¶ The IDAHO TITLE AND TRUST COMPANY has been advertising in the columns of THE CONTINENT for a considerable time, and is becoming well known to its readers. In order to get still better acquainted with you, I am using this simple form of announcement, just as if I were talking to you personally. As to my reliability and experience in making safe and profitable investments, I can refer you to ten banks, to Presbyterian ministers, and to CONTINENT readers in various parts of the country. The readers will be pleased, I am sure, to tell you in what manner I have handled their own funds.

¶ The following investments will meet the requirements for safety and good profit not only for the institution or individual who has a considerable amount to invest, but also for the man or woman who merely has a small amount available or who desires to place small monthly sums where they will earn considerably better interest than the savings bank rate.

No. 1. FIRST MORTGAGES on some of the most profitable and attractive farms in the Northwest; $1,000 to $15,000; 6 per cent interest payable annually. Loans range from one-third to one-fifth of the actual cash value of the land; also FIRST MORTGAGES on income city property; 40 per cent of cash value; in amounts from $300 to $5,000; will net you 7 per cent per annum, payable semiannually.

No. 2. GUARANTEE CAPITAL Fund Certificates: In amounts from $100 to $5,000. These certificates are backed by First Mortgages on improved real estate; 8 per cent annual interest, and as much more as the earnings of the Company will justify. These certificates entitle you to participate in the earnings of the Company. The premium at this time is only 3 per cent. These are better than any investment in real estate, because you have only 50 per cent of the cash value of real estate invested, and the increase in value of your certificates will be much greater than the annual increase in real estate values. This issue covers only $100,000, and nearly 70 per cent have already been sold.

No. 3. GUARANTEED INVESTMENT CERTIFICATES: For small investors: You pay $3 per month, or any multiple thereof, for twenty-four months, or as long as you like. You can draw out your money and 8 per cent per annum, interest compounded semiannually, any time after twenty-four months. The certificates are also backed by First Mortgages on improved real estate and sell at a premium of $1 on each $100 certificate.

I have loaned money in Idaho lands for eighteen years and have sold a very large number of Mortgages. In no instance have I failed to pay principal and interest when due. Besides being President of the IDAHO TITLE AND TRUST CO., I hold the same office in the NATIONAL TRUST AND SAVINGS CO., and among my associates are many bankers and retired capitalists. Write for complete information about the one of these three forms of investment that fits your means best.

News from several hundred churches in all parts of the country gives in compact form the latest important events in church life.

Financial Situation

More Moisture for Crops—Stock Exchange Is Quiet—Insurance Companies Discourage Policy Loans—How 6% Interest Is Made.

Snow and rain in many parts of the country recently has added to the amount of moisture soon to be needed for crops and has strengthened the optimism of business interests concerning the coming season. The amount of moisture is of more interest to holders of bonds and real estate mortgages than is the fact that the New York Stock Exchange has had a continuance of the spirit of peace and quietude which has prevailed in most financial centers since the first of the year. The large amount of stocks held in small blocks in widely scattered parts of the country is said to be responsible for the lack of trading. People have bought for investment rather than speculation. The possibility of new issues soon has also hindered trading.

Several insurance companies have recently announced an increase in the rate at which the insured can borrow money on policies. The habit of raising money through life insurance policies has been growing rapidly the last ten or a dozen years. In fact, the increase in the amount thus loaned by companies in New York has been 9,540 per cent in twenty years. The total amount now out on loans is about $500,000,000. The companies are attempting to curb this sort of financing.

Bonds Lowest for Three Years

During February there was a decline of over a point in a list of twenty-five railway bonds of high class and the average price is lower now than it has been for over three years. It is not often that so sharp a decline is felt in bonds in a month. Some in the list have declined three points over the price a year ago, and none of them are as high as last year. This on the face of things would indicate that it is a good time to buy. It is, however, a poor time to sell.

Just how it is possible for companies with full knowledge of property and of borrowers to make a larger income than ordinary investors is told in the advertising circulars of a large New York company which has been doing business for a number of years: "Under ordinary conditions a borrower can secure money on first mortgage on New York City property at the rate of 4 per cent if he borrows 60 per cent of the fair value of his property. If he wishes to borrow 65 per cent his money will cost him 4½ per cent, and if he borrows 70 per cent he has to pay 5 per cent interest. If a company loans on a piece of property worth $100,000 the sum of $70,000 at 5 per cent it receives as interest $3,500 per annum. Suppose it then assigns a senior or prior right in the mortgage of $65,000 at 4½ per cent to a savings bank, trust company or other institution, paying $2,925 interest per annum. This will leave it with an investment of only $5,000, on which it retains $575 from the interest received, or 11½ per cent on its investment. It thus can easily pay 6 per cent to investors.

people on a C. O. D. basis as do the express companies

—Every forty-two minutes a new firm starts business in Chicago.

—Sears, Roebuck and Company during February sold $7,509,000 worth of goods, an increase of nearly $500,000 over a year ago.

—That the "coal trust" gave $4,000,000 in additional wages and exacted on this excuse $13,450,000 from the public is asserted in a recent report of the department of commerce to the house of representatives.

—Professor E. F. Ladd of North Dakota has figured that on most articles of food the larger share of the price paid by the consumer goes to the one who handles the product rather than the producer himself. With eggs, for example, the man who handles the eggs gets 69 per cent of the selling price; poultry 55 per cent; peas, parsnips and turnips 60 per cent, and oranges 30 per cent.

Was Sexton Over Half-Century

E. L. Bradley of Second Church Dies—Ministers Commend Absence of Wine in Washington—Dr. Nicely Has Anniversary.

CHICAGO—Edward L. Bradley died Monday morning after a long illness. He had been sexton of Second church for fifty-one years, the only position he had after being dismissed from the army after the civil war. He retired from active work five months ago. Mr. Bradley was born in Dansville, N. Y., in 1842 and was known over the country as are few church sextons. Mr. Bradley had a habit of holding impromptu prayer meetings when things went wrong about the church and applied sanctified common sense to his work. Several years ago he wrote a book, "Talks on Many Topics," the only book ever published by a church sexton. It attracted considerable attention and contained suggestions for the work of church officers more exalted than sexton.

The ministers next Monday will meet in Fullerton hall as guests of the Congregational ministers to hear Dr. Gunsaulus.

The appreciation of the ministers of the city at the action of President Wilson and other high government officials in banishing liquor from meals was expressed in a resolution adopted Monday. A large number of the pastors heard Dr. S. Hall Young tell of conditions in Alaska.

The tenth anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. J. W. Nicely at Crerar Memorial church was commemorated last Sunday and the days following by special services. Dr. B. L. Hobson of McCormick preached Sunday evening. The membership of the church has grown from 105 to 550 in the decade.

MAY BECOME AN EVANGELIST

One of the men who recently went to Popular hall, conducted by the Christian Industrial League, will probably soon become a singing evangelist under the Christian denomination. He was nearly starved when he dropped into the meeting and was given employment in the shops of the league and later joined the denomination of his mother. Large crowds are attending the Sunday afternoon meetings at the hall, over 200 being turned away on a recent Sunday.

Increase in the gifts of laymen for missions was urged Tuesday evening at a dinner at the Auditorium hotel in celebration of the banquet of the Laymen's Missionary Movement three years ago. George Innes of Minneapolis and Philadelphia and J. Campbell White, general secretary of the movement, were among the speakers.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Presbyterial Missionary Society at First church Thursday will be addressed by Chinese missionaries.

"Men's week" is being observed this week at First church by a series of special meetings for men and boys, with Dr. Francis M. Fox speaking Thursday evening and Dr. John Timothy Stone Friday night.

H. E. Holt and Ralph Cummins, seniors in McCormick Seminary, have been named by the Home Board as holders of immigration scholarships established some time ago. They will spend next year in Europe studying the immigrant before he leaves his native country.

Rev. John Bamford, pastor of Westminster church, Des Moines, who was invited to become assistant pastor of Second church, will not leave his present charge. The people refused to accept his resignation.

The new building for the Persian mission on the North side is nearly completed. It cost, with the ground, $30,000, supplied by Fourth church.

The men of Wilmette church approve the plan of a building which will house the varied activities of the Industrial League as outlined to the ministers recently. Rev. George A. Kilbey addressed the men last Friday.

AUSTIN MEN STIRRED TO WORK

Dr. Francis M. Fox began his field work in Chicago with Austin church, Rev. R. H. Beattie pastor, After preliminary conferences with church officers a meeting of the men was called to lay before them facts concerning the number and proportion of men of the church now at work with definite responsibility upon them; the approximate number of men irregular in church attendance and somewhat uninterested; a view of a chart showing the field in which this church is especially interested and for which it is in a large way responsible; the number of families resident in this district, and by inference the large number who must needs be out of touch with any church. A more careful canvass of the field was determined upon and plans made for effecting it. The men decided to meet a week later at dinner to take further action. Twice as many men attended the dinner as were present at the conference and in the meantime two districts had been canvassed, several smaller conferences had been held, Dr. Fox had preached on "The Activities of Christian Men" and on "Personal Work." Dr. J. T. Stone brought the men face to face with their duty to church members and the community. The session submitted a broad plan for the organization of a department of men's work and the meeting authorized the appointment of committees, emphasizing the work of social service, invitation or visitation and Bible study.

The Presbyterian Training School is furnishing several trainers of stewards for classes in various churches of the city.

Clergy and Laity

In the town of Hudson, N. Y., the dean of the local clergy is Dr. George C. Yeisley, the Presbyterian pastor. Dr. Yeisley has been pastor of the one church for thirty-seven years.

Dr. S. E. Persons of Cazenovia, N. Y., who spoke last Friday at Union Theological Seminary, has just finished a month's service for the department of church and country life. Episcopalian and Congregational churches appealed to this department recently for a speaker on the rural church. Dr. Persons spoke to the clergy of the diocese of Connecticut at Middletown and to the Congregational home missionaries of New Hampshire at Concord. Cornell University and Oberlin and Muskingum Colleges also asked for a similar service.

Pittsburg Plans Another Church

Concord Will Have $40,000 Building — Evangelistic Services in Progress in Several Centers—One Pastor Goes Into C. E. Work.

PITTSBURG—Concord congregation is planning for a new $40,000 building. This church is located in Carrick, one of the attractive suburbs of Pittsburg. The congregation is one of the old organizations of the community and was known for many years as a country church, but during the past few years the city has grown out to and beyond it. A fine piece of ground was donated to the congregation eighty-one years ago by Judge Wilkins, part of which is now being sold to realize money for the new building. Plans have been adopted and committees are at work to raise money and carry the work to completion as soon as possible. Rev. J. H. McCormick, the pastor, has been on the field about two years and there has been a rapid growth.

Claysville church, Rev. J. T. Lind pastor, burned a mortgage of $6,500 which had been hanging over it since the completion of the present church building in 1904.

Dr. Samuel Callen, pastor of Fourth church, is conducting a three weeks' evangelistic campaign. The Lord's supper will be observed the Friday evening before Easter. Dr. Callen will do all of the preaching himself.

A series of evangelistic services is being held under the auspices of the East Liberty Y. M. C. A. Dr. William Evans of Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, is in charge and is making a specialty of addresses to specific classes.

The Superintendents' Association of the Allegheny County Sunday School Association held its annual banquet Tuesday evening, March 4. A number of addresses on special lines of Sunday school work were delivered by local speakers. Attorney W. H. Pratt was elected president for the ensuing year.

A farewell reception was given to the retiring pastor, Rev. A. E. Weston, by members of South Side church March 5. Mr. Weston will take charge of a church near Los Angeles.

The Pennsylvania State Christian Endeavor Association has selected Rev. M. B. Macrory, one of Pittsburg's wideawake young pastors, as field secretary. Mr. Macrory has been pastor of Mount Washington U. P. church for several years. It has been decided to run a special train, starting from Philadelphia, to Los Angeles to the international convention in July.

Ask the Home Board's Ideas

At the closing session of the recent meeting of the Executive Commission in New York that body voted to inquire from the Board of Home Missions what is its view concerning the policies recently criticised by Dr. Joseph L. Weaver of Rocky Ford, Colo. Dr. Weaver, who is himself a member of the commission, presented a paper very similar to complaints against the Home Board he has made in The Continent and other church papers. The commission appointed a committee to consider whether or not it should take up the issue. This committee brought in a report emphasizing the fact that the commission had no jurisdiction over the board to regulate its policies. But it was also recognized that there is interest in the church as to the present bearing of some of these policies, and the subcommittee thought it proper for the commission to hear and make public the board's explanations. Accordingly a committee of inquiry was named, consisting of Dr. William P. Fulton of Philadelphia, chairman; Dr. Wallace Radcliffe of Washington, D. C., and Elder Isaac H. Orr of St. Louis. They will proceed to get information as to the expense of administration and as to the relations of the board with the synods and presbyteries in whose territory it works.

The commission also requested all boards of the church to furnish it with a detailed report of their expenditures.

What the Men Are Doing

The brotherhood of St. Louis, of which James J. Parks is president and Josiah A. Parker secretary, has laid plans to visit every Presbyterian church in the city and vicinity within the next few months, with a view to appealing to all men for the establishment in their homes of daily family worship.

Rev. Samuel Semple of Titusville, Pa., was the speaker at the fourth annual dinner of the William P. Jenks Bible class of the Brookville, Pa., church.

The brotherhood of First church of Dixon, Ill., gave a banquet for the boys' club of the church, which is under the direction of the pastor, Dr. Crissman.

Steps toward the formation of a brotherhood have been taken by the church at Hamilton, Mont., Rev. J. C. Irwin pastor. A recent meeting of representative men of the city was held at a large hotel dinner.

The annual dinner given by the ushers' association and men's Bible class of Rome, N. Y., church was addressed by Dr. Philip H. Cole, pastor, and Dr. George B. Stewart of Auburn Theological Seminary.

The brotherhood of Philipsburg, Mont., First church, Rev. E. Claude Smith pastor, last fall took the initial steps which have resulted in the establishment of a public reading room and library for the city, which is proving of inestimable value.

The brotherhood of Reedsburg, Wis., church recently entertained the women of the church at dinner, the men doing all the work themselves. There are sixty men in the organization, which is lightening the work of the pastor, Dr. Samuel N. Wilson.

One Church Every Two Years

Rapid Development About San Francisco—Calvary Church Will Entertain General Assembly if 1915 Bid Is Accepted.

SAN FRANCISCO—The advance of Presbyterianism in and around this city was shown recently at a conference of Oakland Presbytery in St. John's church, Berkeley, Rev. George G. Eldredge pastor. In the discussion following papers given by Rev. Herbert E. Hayes, Rev. C. C. Herriott and Rev. R. S. Eastman, Dr. James Curry related some history. When be began work in West Berkeley and San Pablo almost forty years ago First church of Oakland had a membership of 300 or 400. There was no other Presbyterian church north to San Pablo and beyond. Now First church has over 1,000 members and twenty other Presbyterian churches have since been organized in this territory. This is at the rate of one every two years.

Calvary church is the strongest Presbyterian church in San Francisco and has the largest and best equipped house of worship. Should General Assembly accept the invitation given one year ago to meet in San Francisco in 1915 the meeting place would be Calvary church. The work of this church is prosperous under the leadership of Dr. William Rader, its pastor. At a recent gathering of the men's Berean Society over 500 were present.

First church is doing good work in its new house of worship. A remarkable record among the workers of this church is that of Professor Otto Fliessner, who has been its organist for twenty-five years. In honor of this a reception was held Feb. 7, when a beautiful silver service was presented to Professor and Mrs. Fliessner in commemoration of this anniversary. Rev. W. K. Guthrie is pastor.

The Occidental Board, with headquarters at 920 Sacramento street, has for its special object the rescue of Chinese girls from slavery. On Friday evening, Feb. 14, Rev. Ernest F. Hall gave an illustrated lecture on Korea. It was the first of several planned for the girls in the home.

JAMES CURRY.

Rural Men in Convention

Ewing Presbytery held its second annual brotherhood convention at Albion, Ill., Feb. 27-28 with marked success. This is one of the few presbyteries following closely the ideas of the national brotherhood in organizing men. Rev. W. V. McAdoo of Mount Vernon was in charge of the convention. There was a large attendance, some of the men walking many miles for the two days' meeting. The relation of men to the Bible school, to missions and to boys and other men was discussed by speakers, among whom were Walter Getty, national secretary; Dr. W. J. Darby, Evansville, Ind.; Rev. J. R. E. Craighead, Carbondale, Ill., and Rev. R. F. Cressey, state secretary, El Paso, Ill.

Christian Training for Leaders of Men

Very little organized effort is being made to educate recent immigrants for American citizenship except in night schools. Dubuque College and Seminary is dedicated to the education of foreign speaking people in this country. Men from a score of European countries study here, most of them planning to be ministers of the gospel, preaching in their native tongue. All of them, by virtue of their better training, will be leaders among their fellow countrymen.

A large number of these students are earning their way through the institution. The difference between the cost of operation, and income from endowment and fees is furnished by large-hearted Presbyterians interested in Christian education. We will be glad to tell you more of the very interesting work of this institution. Drop a card to President C. M. Steffens, D.D., Dubuque, Iowa.

Postal Life, N.Y.

Insurance Economy

Non-agency savings Interstate savings
Health-conservation

WHAT was sought for at the time of the Hughes Insurance Investigation in 1905 has come to pass, namely, a decisive reduction in the cost of life insurance.

Anyone now desiring sound protection can walk into the office of the Postal Life Insurance Company, or write a letter to it and deal direct, thus becoming his own agent and saving for himself the agent's commission each year.

For more than seven years the doors of the Company have now been open for personal applications, and the Government postal facilities have been employed by the public to cut out agency expense.

As a matter of fact, it is this same agency expense that has burdened and weakened more than one company.

The Postal Life has, indeed, absorbed two such companies and saved their policyholders from serious loss.

MORE than 1,600 new applicants were accepted last year for insurance in the Postal—without agents.

The first year, Postal policyholders receive a guaranteed commission-dividend corresponding to what other companies pay their agents, less the moderate advertising charge.

In subsequent years policyholders can deduct the entire agent's renewal commission of 7½% and an office-expense saving of 2%, making up the Annual Dividend of 9½%

Guaranteed in the Policy

And in addition, the Postal pays, every year after the first, contingent dividends that are earned by the policy.

THE Company receives applications from citizens of every State. It is, in truth, an interstate institution, but it is not subject to the expensive exactions of the various States.

To these exactions agency companies are properly subject because they establish branch-offices throughout the country, thus making themselves liable to taxes, licenses and fees imposed by all the different States.

But any citizen wherever located, who deals with the Postal Life, exempts his premium, from such onerous State requirements.

The Company's Health Bureau also brings about an important insurance economy through the distribution of helpful printed matter on health preservation. Policyholders may also have one free medical examination each year, so as to detect incipient disease in time to check or cure it, thus reducing mortality and increasing the Company's savings.

First: Old-line legal-reserve insurance — not fraternal or assessment.

Second: Standard policy reserves, now $10,000,000. Insurance in force $50,000,000.

Third: Standard policy provisions, approved by the New York State Insurance Department.

Fourth: Operates under strict State requirements and subject to the United States postal authorities.

Fifth: High medical standards in the selection of risks.

Sixth: Policyholders' Health Bureau arranges one free medical examination each year, if desired.

W. T. GRENFELL

OUT of the far north where his life is spent, comes the story which "Grenfell, disciple of the Christ," relates in this issue of The Continent. Six men in a boat put out to sea; the wind changes and they attempt to run for port between jagged rocks. In time of need their appeal, like that of people further south, is to their God. In this Easter issue of The Continent is also a poem by Tertius van Dyke, son of Dr. Henry van Dyke, the well known poet and preacher. He writes of Dr. Grenfell in "The Welcome Ship." This poem will be appreciated by Continent readers not alone for the sake of the place that the father of the poet has in the hearts of Presbyterians, but for the production itself. These are only two of the good features of the Easter number. Mail your copy to someone who will be specially interested in it. In the next number George W. Coleman, president of the Associated Advertising Clubs of America, has a thoughtful article, "'The Tie That Binds' Democracy." He is well known as a former officer of the United Society of Christian Endeavor. What more appropriate Easter greeting for a friend than a year's subscription to The Continent?

Around the Shop

If the Around-the-Shop Man ever commits a crime—oh, yes, thanks for the amendment—if his numerour sins are ever discovered, he will have a parlous time trying to get away from Presbyterians. Presbyterians, you know, have a reputation for believing in the inexorability of punishment. They can't profess to regulate the hereafter, but they seldom countenance escape in this world.

Not a few persons have told us of seeing The Continent in the most out-of-the-way places—in Europe, Asia, Africa—anywhere that Presbyterians go, and that's nearly everywhere.

Just the other day the Around-the-Shop Man, accompanied by a chaplain and the customary entourage of a distinguished citizen, sought relief from care at the charming little resort of Tryon, on the Southern railway in North Carolina. When he walked into the hotel office he found a copy of The Continent on the top of the pile on the table—and without any dust on it. Four days later, just as he was preparing to depart, a prominent western minister, with his family, greeted him; and between his going and coming the Around-the-Shop Man discovered no fewer than eighteen other Presbyterians among the two score guests of this one high-priced hotel, besides a few who had strayed to near-by boarding places.

The Around-the-Shop Man hopes that none of his crimes, past or future, will deprive him of the pleasure such as these meetings afford. Talk about your secret orders! BY PROFESSOR IN WALDENSIAN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, FLORENCE, ITALY

The Struggle for Christian Truth in Italy
By Prof. GIOVANNI LUZZI, D.D.

Professor Luzzi's lectures, delivered at Princeton, and subsequently throughout various American cities, are the basis of this volume. Coming as a deep inspiration from the Old World to the New, it traces the history of Christianity through the Protestant development, giving a concise history of the Bible in Italy, the founding of the Waldensian Mission, and a study of the present "Modernism" movement. Net $1.50

CAMPBELL MORGAN'S LATEST

The Teaching of Christ
A Companion Volume to "The Crises of the Christ"

Dr. Morgan's "Crises of the Christ" was an interpretation of the vital events in Jesus' life. This complementary work is an interpretation of Jesus' oral teachings. What Jesus declared as to his own Person, concerning God and Man, Sin and Salvation, and concerning the various phases of the Kingdom of God, are delineated with the vital glow which characterizes Dr. Morgan's writings. Net $1.50

ART IN THE DINING ROOM

The primary principle of home-building is — harmonious appointments.

The dining-room may be distinctively Florentine, it may be planned in the fashion of either Louis XIV, XV or XVI, it may be Jacobean, Early, Middle or Late Georgian, or Colonial—but, whatever the home-maker may have in mind, the table furnishings may strike a jarring note.

When a question of taste arises, The Gorham Company can always provide the answer. Our resources of design, established during more than eighty years of leadership enable us to meet any need with silverware of choicest quality that bears this Gorham trade-mark.

The Light of the World

"Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall shine upon thee."

A SUNNY EASTER is the hope in mind to even the least sentimental of us as that Sunday approaches which is kept in memory of the Lord's resurrection. And this desire for light and brightness on the Easter day is more than a natural wish for physical delights; consciously or unconsciously, it is also a latent sense of symbolism which feels by instinct how a dismal Easter outwardly contradicts the inner meaning of the festival.

For amid all the days which religion devotes to special observances Easter is the one all-sunshine day. On other days the sins, trials, sufferings and defeats of humanity must be acknowledged by those who would keep square with the reality of things; but Easter justifies, at least in its own passing moment, the forgetfulness of all these, since it heralds so confidently God's own promise of joy beyond every sorrow, solace after all hardship and pain.

"The last enemy that shall be abolished is death." And the day which pledges—even celebrates—the sure destruction of that last enemy, is a day not to be clouded with any other dread. If the grave is not invincible, there is nothing at which the soul of man need cow down.

Easter then may speak to men a message more manifold than its promises of immortality—vast and preeminent as that significance is. The day has also meaning for the present world. It is sunny Easter breaking through the sky of trouble, difficulty and evil now.

For the Jesus with power to burst the sealed tomb is the same Jesus with power to break the habit chains of temptation, the fetters of fleshly coveting and debased motive, the bonds of despair and the prison bars of adverse circumstance.

Enshrouded in spiritual senselessness, multitudes live on unthankfully, devouring the world's creature comforts and insatiably grasping for more of its trifling pleasures, all without thought of duty or dream of God. It is a clouded world overhead to them.

Other multitudes, having countless times fallen before enticements to evil stronger than their weak wills, lie buried in the discouraging persuasion that effort for right living is in them but mockery and false pretense. It is a clouded world overhead to them.

Hosts of others in different case, in conflict less with sin than with misfortune, feel life and hope worn out by the endless struggle to hold their feet in the rush of the world. They drop to the roadside weary enough to die. It is a clouded world overhead for them.

And many besides, eaten with sorrow and suffering, long to have the exchange of life's pain for death's ease come quickly. It is a clouded sky overhead for them.

But Easter day, bright with the rising of Jesus Christ, speaks to all of these and each: "Awake, arise, and Christ shall shine upon thee."

He has light for all.

To him the suffering may turn as to One who, himself "acquainted with grief," yet never doubted the Father's love and won through to joys that fade not away. That is their sunshine.

To him the misfortunate may look as to One who had not where to lay his head, yet knew the universe as his own Father's house. That is their sunshine.

To him the sinning may look as to One ever a friend of sinners, who by his very touch gave power to go and sin no more. That is their sunshine.

As for the gross and worldly—they are dead and blind and sleeping indeed. But perhaps Easter may bring even them a ray of light to awake their stupor—a ray of light from the Sun of righteousness to revive a care for things spiritual and eternal.

For all the world, may Jesus Christ be awakening, cheering Easter sunshine.

China's Final Struggle Against the Opium Evil

"Thirty Thousand Chests" is the striking title of an editorial in The Chicago Tribune recently, summing up the crucial moral and international problem which faces the republic of China in dealing with the opium question. These 30,000 chests of opium, valued at over $50,000,000, were imported from India into Chinese ports at a time when the importers and the banks did not take seriously the Chinese government's promises to suppress the opium traffic and opium consumption. The importers paid good money for the disreputable commodity, and the banks loaned millions of dollars with the same questionable merchandise as security. But there has been no market since June; consequently British merchants and bankers at Shanghai and Hongkong stand to lose the whole of their heavy investment, and naturally they made frantic appeals to their legation and to the home government to step in and force China to allow the drug to be distributed or else compensate them for their losses.

The British-Chinese treaty provides that the importation of opium is to be reduced in proportion to the limitation of poppy culture in China, the trade to end in 1917. The Chinese contend that the treaty does not guarantee the sale of Indian opium, while it gives China the right to repress opium smoking—which has been done with an undeniably strong hand. It is both affirmed and denied that the domestic cultivation of the plant was suppressed with the same vigor as that used against the imported article.

Along with the general awakening of the Chinese came an arousing to the dangers of the opium traffic, and therefore the recent British proposal that China make the retailing of opium a government monopoly, after buying the heavy stocks on hand, did not meet with favor—in fact it would be absurd for the Chinese government, after trying to stop the growing of opium at home and punishing habitual opium users, to turn around and sell foreign opium to its own citizens. Such a course would nullify the entire anti-opium crusade, which is one of the most important achievements of the new regime, though initiated by the old dynasty. But Sir John Jordan, the British representative in China, is reported to have officially informed China that recognition of the republic will be postponed pending a settlement of the issue satisfactory to Britain.

As an alternative solution it has been proposed that the opium stocks be purchased by public and private contributions and then burned. One suggestion was that this be done by or through the Young Men's Christian Association or the Red Cross societies.

At a conference held in Peking some ten days ago, composed of delegates appointed by the provincial governors, the government monopoly idea was strongly condemned, and the delegates resolved to appeal to all nations for an international subscription for the purpose of buying and burning the accumulated drug. Dr. Sun Yat Sen's assertion is quoted that opium has caused more ruin in China than flood or famine. A great and perhaps the final struggle with the evil is now in progress.

Incidentally the question is asked why the United States has so long delayed recognition of the Chinese republic, inasmuch as this country is in no way entangled with the opium traffic nor engaged in land grabbing in Tibet or Mongolia. The "six power loan" of $125,000,000—now said to be finally dropped—may have had an indirect bearing on the delay.

Germany's Intentions Said to Be Pacific

Advocates of international peace are pleased but not wholly reassured by an official rebuke by the Berlin government a few days ago to that section of the German press which has been printing alarming stories about Germany being on the brink of war. In particular there was a verbal assault on France which was charged, because of larger army plans, with plotting to revive the old Alsace-Lorraine controversy. The protest, which is said to have been authorized by Emperor William, declares Germany's intentions to be pacific, and denies that the present and contemplated great increase in the German military establishment means war.

The explanation advanced is that the balance of power has been disturbed by developments incident to the Balkan war, and Germany must be prepared. That word "prepared" covers boundless extravagance for Europe's armies and navies. All the nations seek to be prepared, but Germany is not content unless she is better prepared—on land at least—that anyone else. And Great Britain thinks she must be better prepared than any other power on the water. The only limit in sight seems to be a loose agreement recently announced by the German Admiral von Tirpitz and by Winston Churchill, the British naval secretary, that hereafter in the naval program of the two countries the ratio of battleships should be sixteen to ten—that Germany would build ten ships to Britain's sixteen. The recent comparative failure of a $100,000,000 government loan in Germany may have had considerable effect on the situation. Nor has a proposal of the emperor to lay a war tax on all private fortunes of more than $5,000—a tax on principal, not on income—met with a cordial reception from the already well taxed German people.

Canberra, Australia's New Capital, Begun

Australia is now embarked upon the enterprise of making a great city to order for the future capital of the island-continent. It will be located on two commanding hills separated by the Molomglo river in the Canberra district of New South Wales. Last week it was announced that its name will be Canberra, a question which has been bothering Australians. The foundation stone was laid by Baron Denman, governor general of the commonwealth of Australia. The new city is to have twenty-five square miles and the plans provide for an immediate population of 75,000.

A young American architect, Walter Burley Griffin of Chicago, made the plans for the capital city, his design being successful in a worldwide competition last year. His victory brought with it a prize of $8,750. Broadly speaking, the city will be laid out on the American plan, with streets radiating from a principal center to subordinate centers. Industrial and residential districts are provided, but the chief features will be the government and parliament buildings, courts, barracks, railroad station and parks.

Mediators Object to Balkan Allies' Peace Terms

European ambassadors in London lately offered to mediate in an effort to settle the Turkish war, but the conditions laid down by the Balkan allies in their reply were regarded as too extravagant for approval. The ambassadors considered, however, that the demands of the allies might be moderated, and another session will be held this week. German dispatches declare that the powers will reserve to themselves the settlement of the boundaries of the new state of Albania, including the city of Scutari, whose final disposition troubles Austria-Hungary. It was hinted on Monday that Adrianople might be able to hold out only a few days longer, and its fall will either hasten peace or precipitate further and more extensive war between the allies themselves and possibly involving some of the great armed spectators.

A foretaste of what the end of Turkish resistance may entail was indicated by dispatches from Athens and Sofia a few days ago. In Greece hostile feeling is said to be spreading rapidly against the Bulgarians, because Bulgaria claims stretches of erstwhile Turkish territory which Greece thinks she is entitled to by right of conquest. And at the same time in the Bulgarian capital the Greeks and Servians were being denounced for occupying and denationalizing parts of Macedonia and driving out Bulgarian schools and churches. The Bulgars are not prepared to allow Greece and Servia to extend their boundaries to the mouth of the Danube.

Labor Union Stands by Convicted Official

Sincere friends of the cause of organized labor must regret the recent reelection of Frank M. Ryan as president of the iron workers' international organization. Mr. Ryan is one of the lately convicted dynamiters and is now under seven years' prison sentence, at liberty on $150,000 bail. A mass of evidence was brought out at Indianapolis tending to connect him and his fellow officers and agents with the murderous dynamite explosion at Los Angeles and other numerous though not fatal explosions in various parts of the country. As president of the organization he was one of the most conspicuous figures, and his being now publicly recognized and honored by his union will not help to encourage the belief that his association as a body was opposed to violence.

First Two Weeks of the New President

President Wilson has been in office a little over two weeks and has given the country evidence of his individuality and caliber. Washington observers report that he is not neglecting the proprieties while disregarding traditions and precedents such as the inaugural ball. He objects to superfluous gold lace, and he has plainly stated that he does not intend to allow his chief energies to be devoted to filling political offices with new partisan occupants, and the office seekers have been referred to members of the cabinet. He has shown a grasp of Latin-American and foreign affairs, but has yet to wrestle with Congress over the great domestic question of the protective tariff.

Although Mr. Wilson in his campaign did not make a special appeal to temperance people as such, one of his first acts was quietly to banish intoxicants from the White House table—the first time it has been done since the administration of President Hayes. The effect of this action will probably be widely felt. As a minor matter he has declined honorary club membership, and announces that when he joins clubs it will be in the usual way, paying the dues of an ordinary member and not desiring any special footing. At the theater he wants to pay his way and he objects to the specially decorated presidential box, nor does he wish the audience to rise nor the orchestra to play the national anthem when he enters, as has been the custom.

President's Policy Toward Latin America

A series of prospective revolutions in Central America and northern South America are believed to have been nipped in the bud by a vigorous pronouncement by President Wilson and his cabinet last week. Castro, late of Venezuela and Ellis island, and several Central American firebugs and adventurers have been in conference in Cuba, and the Washington government had information of ominous unrest along the borders of the Caribbean. The government's official statement may operate to check the outbreaks which have been plotted, and will also warn the Huerta administration in Mexico against further assassinations.

In general, the statement makes it plain that mere personal intrigues will not be tolerated, and that peace and amity will be maintained. The President states that he desires to promote the friendship and common interest of the peoples of the two continents, but he points out that cooperation is possible only when just governments are based upon law and not upon arbitrary force. The United States, he says, has nothing to seek in Central and South America except the lasting good of the peoples and the development of personal and trade relationships which shall redound to mutual profit and advantage and shall interfere with the rights and liberties of none.

Wholesale Jail Delivery in Cuba Frustrated

Cuba furnished the new secretary of state an unwelcome problem, which he promptly grappled with and settled. Near the end of the Taft administration the Cuban congress passed a general amnesty bill to free from prison more than 3,000 convicts, including vicious criminals and known crooks and a few political offenders. The excuse was made that the prisons were overcrowded, but this did not cover the wholesale jail delivery, which amounted to a travesty on justice and a menace to law and order. Under the terms of the Platt amendment which followed the close of the Spanish-American war the United States may again intervene in Cuba if that country fails in the protection of life, liberty and property. Therefore President Taft protested to President Gomez against the danger attending the amnesty bill and asked him not to sign the measure. But Gomez, who retires in favor of President-Elect Menocal on May 20, had, it is rumored, some ulterior end to serve by this bill, which had been put through by his friends, and he scorned the protests of both Mr. Taft and the American minister. Secretary Bryan sent Gomez a sharp message whose contents have not been disclosed, but it had the effect of changing the Cuban executive's mind and it is now announced that the bill has been vetoed. If this incident is a criterion, the external policies of the outgoing and the incoming Washington administrations are to be similar and continuous.

New Tuberculosis Remedy Is Under Trial

General interest and hope have been aroused by the announcement of Dr. Frederick Franz Friedmann of Berlin that he had brought with him to the United States and Canada a cure for tuberculosis. The young German physician inoculated with his serum a considerable number of selected patients in New York and in three Canadian cities, and the reports last week were to the effect that at least some of the New York cases treated showed unmistakable signs of improvement. Further time and experimentation will be necessary to determine whether the remedy is actually more efficacious than those already in use.

In a public address at Ottawa, Ontario, before the Canadian antituberculosis organization and the Duke of Connaught last week Dr. Friedmann explained that he obtained vaccine or bacilli from the turtle, a cold blooded animal, which was harmless and at the same time effective where the disease was not hopelessly advanced. He asserted that he had vaccinated 350 children living in tubercular environments within the last seventeen months and he hoped to render future generations immune from consumption just as Jenner's vaccine discovery helped to eradicate smallpox.

Mining Frauds Proved Against Hawthorne

Julian Hawthorne, the writer and son of the famous American author, Nathaniel Hawthorne, was last Friday convicted of fraudulent use of the mails in selling Canadian mining stock and sentenced to one year in prison in Atlanta. The same fate befell Dr. William J. Morton, son of the surgeon who first made use of ether, and Albert Freeman, a well known New York business man. Josiah Quincy, twice mayor of Boston and assistant secretary of state under President Cleveland, was acquitted on the same charge, which was tried before a jury in a federal court in New York City. Two indictments are still pending against Mr. Quincy. "Fault of judgment rather than intent" was vainly advanced as a plea in Mr. Hawthorne's defense. His facile pen produced much of the promotion literature which, together with his own standing and that of his codefendants, drew many dollars into their worthless investments.

Million Cigars a Day in One City

An idea of the immensity of the tobacco trade and its attendant economic waste is shown by a report issued last week by a committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce estimating that the men of Chicago alone smoke 1,000,000 cigars a day, and that the cost per man averages $22 a year. Although the city has not been recognized as a tobacco center, over $10,000,000 is invested in the industry in Chicago, entirely apart from the rest of the country. Rents, salaries and other expense items of the Chicago tobacco trade have not been calculated, but are necessarily large, as is the number of workers and the amount of energy thereby withdrawn from productive channels and devoted to this nonproductive and deleterious business.

All that can be said of the economic aspects of the tobacco trade may be said with tenfold force of the liquor traffic. Small wonder that the cost of living increases when statistics show annually increasing sums burned up and swallowed up in the form of poisons and semipoisons.

—Plans for the celebration of 100 years of peace between Great Britain and the United States are moving on apace. The treaty of Ghent, which ended the war of 1812, was signed December 24, 1814, and a series of commemorative events are now being projected on both sides the Atlantic, climaxing in 1915. A Chicago organization was formed last week, with the mayor of the city as honorary chairman. Invitations are to be extended to Earl Grey and a distinguished party of English, Canadian and Australian statesmen who are expected to visit this country about May 1 to make arrangements for the celebration.

Religious World

Religious Education Association Expanding

The Religious Education Association in its tenth convention at Cleveland last week gave new evidence, in a rich and diversified program, of the varied functions which it is coming to fulfill in the religious life of the country. Accumulating interests continually enlarge its scope. Last year departments of social service and lay training schools were added to the array of sectional conferences, and this year the number was increased by special conferences on eugenics and on religious education in prisons and reformatories. Along with this diversification, however, goes a steady deepening in the spirituality of the association's aim.

Cleveland showed unusual appreciation of the importance of the convention. The local committee advertised the meetings throughout the city with generous persistence, paralleling theater advertising on the billboards and in the street cars. The three night meetings in the Grays' Armory were attended by audiences of several thousand, in which large delegations of students from Western Reserve University and Lake Erie College were prominent. On the first evening the introductory addresses were by President Thwing of Western Reserve and President Judson of the University of Chicago, and the principal address was made by President

Robert A. Falconer of the University of Toronto, who stressed the absolute necessity of the religious motive behind any enduring civic progress.

The second evening the speakers were Professor Hall of Union Seminary, New York; Dr. Bitting of St. Louis and Dean Sumner of Chicago. On the third evening Rabbi Hirsch of Chicago, President King of Oberlin and President Mullins of Louisville gave the addresses, while the indefatigable general secretary of the association, Dr. Henry F. Cope, made the appeal for the annual sustaining offering.

Making High Schools Count for Morals

Of the more than thirty sectional conferences in connection with the Religious Education Association convention it is quite beyond possibility to give any detailed account within newspaper limits. And among them all it is somewhat hazardous to attempt to select any as the most important. However, none developed more intense interest than the very significant conference with high school teachers on "social education" in the high school. This term was adopted to cover everything in school training which aims at the creation of character. Of course, these high school teachers begin with ethical considerations, but a most noticeable element of the whole discussion was their almost invariable recognition that some religious influence must be availed of in order to reach any satisfactory results.

The two addresses which made the deepest impression were those of Professor F. C. Sharp of the University of Wisconsin and Principal Jesse B. Davis of the Central High School of Grand Rapids. Both spoke from experience—Dr. Sharp from a course of moral training which he has put in force in the high school of Madison, and Mr. Davis from his own work in his own school. In Professor Sharp's system the main point of aim is the development of "moral thoughtfulness," a phrase which he adopts from Thomas Hughes. His method consists very largely in proposing to high school boys and girls hypothetical questions of conduct which they are asked to work out in their own thinking and afterwards give opinions on "What is right?"

The system of Mr. Davis, as now in force in Grand Rapids, grew out of the Men and Religion Movement there. It was suggested to him by the fact that all the boys who took leading parts in the boys' division of this movement were officers of important high school societies. This led to the organization of a leadership club, to which any boy holding office in any high school society is eligible. The club now has twenty members, including not Protestants alone but also Catholics and Jews. It meets every alternate Monday evening at the home of the principal and discusses there the conditions of character and endeavor which will prepare an ambitious boy for usefulness as man and citizen. The problems of school life are also discussed, and the influence of the boys enlisted on the side of good standards in the school. Of the present membership, one half are teaching Bible classes either in the Young Men's Christian Association or in their home church Sunday schools.

During the past winter this club entertained 750 boys from 110 Michigan high schools at a three days' convention in Grand Rapids which was of the most inspiring Christian character. They also recently arranged a supper attended by 240 high school boys, where three boys spoke on what the boy has a right to expect of school, community and home, and two prominent Grand Rapids citizens responded. These dinners are hereafter to be held at regular intervals during the school year.

This work is matched by a similar work among the girls, conducted by the vice-principal.

A Moral Vocational Study in High School

Meanwhile, under the department of English within the Grand Rapids school itself, a course of character building is carried on, beginning with the seventh grade in the grammar schools. In the first year the object is to awaken a "vocational ambition"—the desire to be something worth while in the world. In the eighth grade the discussion runs on the value of an education, and high school students who have dropped out of school to go to work at the end of their grammar courses, but have later returned for fuller education, are much relied upon to inspire in the younger boys the determination to get more than common schooling.

In the first year of high school, the elements of character that make for success are studied; in the second year the call of the world to service. In the last half of the latter the pupil is encouraged to choose a vocation on the basis of what he has learned of his own adaptations and of society's current needs. In the third year each student is guided to gather information in regard to the calling he has chosen, and in the last half of the year the ethical demands of his selected business, profession or industry are put before him. The last year in high school is half taken up with study of social ethics, while the final months are spent upon civic ethics.

In regard to sexual hygiene, the consensus of opinion appeared to run in the line of the recommendation of Professor Chadsey of Columbia, who urged that the study of biology was the natural entrance for high school students into this subject. He insisted that it was shameful dereliction for any teacher to try to teach biology to young people without a moral aim in view.

Harmonizing in Local Congregations

A very high degree of interest also attached to the section of Sunday schools at the Religious Education Convention. A year ago a special commission was appointed, under chairmanship of Professor Walter S. Athearn of Drake University, Des Moines, to consider the conflict of functions between Sunday schools, young people's societies, missionary organizations and brotherhoods in the typical American congregation. An intolerable confusion is confessed in most churches, where these various agencies are going each its own gait. The commission was asked to report a program for harmonizing all such activities.

The main suggestion of Professor Athearn's report was that every congregation should maintain a live educational committee comprising representatives from every organization that attempts anything of an educational or training function. Instances of the success of the plan, where already tried, were cited. The report was ordered printed, and a wide circulation was predicted for it.

After this subject was disposed of the department of Sunday schools met with the department of churches and pastors to consider the theme "Children and Worship." The commission reporting on this subject was headed by Dr. B. S. Winchester of the Congregational Sunday School Society. The discussion revealed no consensus of opinion as to the best method, but clearly showed that the necessity for bringing children more generally from Christian homes to church is felt everywhere. The arrangement which seemed to have the most favor would provide for a brief sermon for children in the early part of the church hour, after which the children may be allowed to withdraw from the auditorium, preferably to spend the remainder of the service time with some wise teacher or story teller in a different room of the church.

Denominations Joining Hands for Education

The days of the Religious Education Association in Cleveland were occasions likewise of certain gatherings of related, though independent, interest. One of these was the meeting of denominational secretaries of education, for whom Dr. Thomas Nicholson of the Methodist Episcopal Church serves as president and Dr. Joseph W. Cochran of the Presbyterian Church as secretary. This is one of the youngest of the joint board organizations of the evangelical churches, but one of the most active, interesting and comprehensive. For Presbyterians, both the College Board and the Board of Education take part.

A vigorous discussion of beneficiary aid for ministerial students was a principal feature of this gathering. It was manifest that sentiment in favor of such aid is not declining among those who are called upon to administer it. But there is a disposition to extend its benefits to persons preparing for any definite vocation concerned with church and religious life, whether looking to ordination or not. Secretary Cochran also expressed the positive opinion that Christian colleges should be no longer expected to give free tuition to ministerial students. This policy, he said, in effect penalizes a college for using its influence to increase the supply of the ministry. Overlapping of different denominations with colleges in identical fields is to be discussed.

A conference running parallel to this brought together representatives of denominational commissions on religious education. Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists and Disciples were prominent in the consideration of cooperation between these organizations There were also held two sessions of directors of religious education —men salaried by local congregations for the conduct of Sunday school work and similar activities. This is a class rapidly increasing in numbers and strength of personnel.

The Religious Education Association elected the following general officers for the coming year: President, Dr. Charles W. Thwing, Cleveland; first vice-president, Dr. Henry S. Pritchett, New York; treasurer, Charles L. Hutchinson, Chicago; executive board chairman, Dr. Abram W. Harris, Chicago; recording secretary, Dr. Charles M. Stuart, Evanston, Illinois; general secretary, Dr. Henry F. Cope, Chicago. New Haven, Connecticut, will be next year's meeting place.

Anywhere, Only Forward!

IT IS A PHRASE of David Livingstone. He had been sent by the London Missionary Society to the Bechuanas, but the field was smaller than the force at hand, and he set out for another place, hoping for the approval of the directors of the society, but telling them that he was at their disposal "to go anywhere, provided it be forward." That was one of his natural traits. The venerable Dr. Isaac Taylor, of Ongar, who knew him in youth, said, "Now, after nearly forty years, I remember his step, the characteristic forward tread, firm, simple, resolute, neither fast nor slow, no hurry and no dawdle, but which evidently meant—getting there." The characteristic forward tread! That is the mark of such a man as Livingstone.

The largest distress in life for thoughtful men is to be shut in from any advance. In Dickens's "Hard Times" he makes one of his characters declare that life is only a muddle; the town is rich, there are numbers of people who are brought there to weave and to card and to piece out a living; the mills are always going; yet the workers never come nearer to any distant object, except always death. The town has grown, but life has not grown, and though men are laboring hard, they are not getting anywhere. They are stepping, but not forward. They are going at breakneck speed, but they are not going anywhere. That is one of the indictments of our civilization. There are so many men whom it does not carry forward. It keeps them going at breakneck speed, but when the end comes they have not reached anything.

Does it get anywhere? That is the question to put about any plan or any work. Is it just a round that does not fit into any plan of progress? The real question is not regarding the size of the task. Even a small task, if it is fitting into an on-going plan, is worthier than a larger task, which does nothing after all. Your church, for example. Is it going backward? Is it holding its own? Or is it going forward? Are your methods with it, your policies in it, your plans for it, getting it forward at all? Or have you settled down to the feeling that just holding your own is enough?

You are a layman, let us say. What is your attitude toward proposals for work? Are you eager for them? Or are you always tired and afraid to see any big things attempted? There are men who approve of nothing that does not look backward. They want the thing if their fathers did it. There are men who want no new plans introduced into church life. They are content to work in the Bechuana field. They would let well enough alone. There is tremendous need for men who have a characteristic forward tread, who are willing to set out on anything, providing it leads them forward, and who cannot abide in conditions which do not lead the church out into larger and worthier fields.

Why Not Have Home Mission Volunteers?

The Continent is heartily delighted with the proposal of the Presbytery of Ogden, in the Synod of Utah, for what amounts to a student volunteer movement for home missions. The Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions has almost monopolized the appeal of the heroic to the young Christians of the times, but not through any fault of its own. It has been sheer lack of imagination on the part of the church which has failed to discover and exhibit the same appeal in the hard missionary tasks of the homeland. As Mr. Crothers, originator of this proposal, justly observes, young men going into home mission work have been permitted to feel themselves exposed to the suspicion of not being able to do anything better; whereas they should be credited with every whit as high honor as the men who voluntarily devote themselves to the labor of the church in non-Christian countries.

The proposition of Ogden Presbytery is that the General Assembly shall instruct the Home Mission Board to offer to students in colleges and seminaries, by special visitation if necessary, the opportunity of signing the following declaration:

"Unless God in his providence should otherwise direct, it is my hope and purpose, when my preparation is completed, to spend at least three years in some form of Christian mission service under the American flag."

Such a challenge would certainly turn the attention of the very choicest young men and women to the opportunities for heroic self-sacrifice within the bounds of their own nation. And their response would in turn, just as happened in foreign missions, challenge the church at large to far more generous giving toward the support of a work for which such lives were ready for consecration. The Utah ministers who have adopted this overture to the Assembly are asking other presbyteries to concur in it, and The Continent trusts that the evident wisdom, and indeed, inspiration, of the idea will secure enthusiastic seconding from every section of the church.

Fewer Stars, Please!

The next Assembly Minutes ought to show fewer starred churches. That will surprise a few of our laymen who always think of a star as a mark of honor. It has quite another meaning in the Minutes. A church is marked with a star when it has made no report to the presbytery during the entire year. In that case the only figures given for it are the last year's figures of membership. Whether it has gained or lost, whether it has given anything or done anything for the Lord's work, the record does not show.

There are quite too many such blank records. One church in every twelve failed last year! Manifestly, that is absurdly too many. Imagine a business enterprise whose central office received no reports from one twelfth of its branches in a year! It would either revise its system or work it more faithfully. Presbyteries will soon be meeting and this is the time for them to make a vigorous demand upon all churches that they report their year's work. It really is a presbyterial matter, and while the stated clerks carry the visible responsibility, they are only representing the presbyteries when they do it.

Only one synod, East Tennessee, got reports from all its thirty-nine churches. Several presbyteries did so. It will be easy for any minister to see whether his is one of them. The most marked is that of the Synod of Missouri, where 111 of the 487 churches are starred. Texas stars seventy-nine of its 428 churches. Both of those synods have had their work much complicated by the Cumberland reunion, in which a large number of churches came into the synod not accustomed to such definite reports as are required of them now. Illinois and Pennsylvania starred fifty-five churches each. Indiana starred two more still. The others range up to New Jersey, which has a very effective synodical organization and received reports last year from all but three of its 389 churches. Canadian, which has only forty-five churches, starred only one.

Of course it is to be said that many of these churches are very small, though there are enough exceptions to bring the average well up. That fact is not the less but the more reason for vigor in getting their reports. The smaller the church the more it deserves and demands the care of the presbytery. Let every presbytery this spring reenforce its stated clerk, if necessary, by making some neighbor minister responsible for getting a report from the churches, so that for one year we may actually know what is being done by our churches. Let us have fewer stars.

"Investigation" Neither Judicial nor Unfriendly

In regard to what has been rather unfortunately called the "investigation" of the Board of Home Missions by the Assembly's Executive Commission, The Continent is happy to have the very best of authority for saying that the action of the commission is in spirit and fact a movement altogether friendly to the board. The commission does not at all believe that the board has been extravagant. But when charges of extravagance are so widely bruited abroad by men of important standing in the church, the commission thought advisable to invite the board to make known through it to the church a detailed account of how it spends the money that the church contributes for home missions—also something about the why of the how. This is the nature of the "investigation," which is in no sense a judicial process, and for that reason is more appropriately to be styled an inquiry.

It is important, too, for the church to bear in mind that, taken at the worst possible valuation, the charges made against the board are not charges of any malfeasance. Ordinarily the complaint that a board is spending too much in administration would seem to signify some misappropriation of funds; but in this case, to anyone who has examined the complaints of Dr. Weaver and his friends, it is apparent that the whole question at issue is a question of judgment between men of variant opinions and no question whatever of fidelity. As such it ought to be discussed in the calm temper appropriate to those who agree in aim and differ only in method. As The Continent has said before, it is a clear issue between binding the board to old methods suitable for a past day on the one hand, and encouraging it on the other hand to go forward with adaptation of its plans to a new day and new duties.

Of course, in any such crisis, many good men by temperament are sure to stick to the old fashions. But in a country like America and a church like the Presbyterian Church, there is no serious question as to where the majority will stand. The majority will be for progress, and for that reason on this issue the majority of Presbyterian sentiment is today and will continue to be with the Board of Home Missions as against critics to whom advancement in efficiency spells extravagance.

Ten Years of Stelzle and His Work

When April 1 comes it will be just ten years since Charles Stelzle, until then pastor over a city mission church in St. Louis, opened an office at the expense of the Board of Home Missions in the Association building in Chicago and began trying what he could do to make the workingmen of America think better of the church and help the church to understand the workingmen. It was, The Continent supposes, the very first time that the Board of Home Missions had ever spent money on a proposition not designed to build up Presbyterian congregations—the first time it had ever taken hold of a question bigger than its own denomination. From that standpoint alone the event deserves to be celebrated, for it marks the beginning of the bigger policy which has elevated the board from the function of denominational contractor to the function of Christian engineer. That has been in truth a saving and exalting change.

But Mr. Stelzle's experiment of 1903, transferred a few years later from Chicago to New York for headquarters, need not resort to incidental significances to find a ground of remembrance. Its direct results have been larger and weightier than have ensued upon any other one undertaking set afoot in the Christian world thus far in the current century. In 1903 the cleft between the church and the workingmen was universally lamented as a characteristic phenomenon of the times. Many were pessimistic enough to talk of it as a hopeless phenomenon. But today nobody thinks of any settled antipathy between church and labor. Of course there is not as much lively mutual interest as there ought to be, but neither side now scorns the other. Workingmen pay the church today at least an appreciative respect in place of the supercilious contempt which many of them formerly affected. And more of them than ten years ago are working in and with the church. On the other hand, the church is pervaded with a sympathy not felt ten years ago for the workingman's moral title to progressively better living and labor conditions.

All in all the change wrought is, next to the moral revival in politics, the greatest making over of sentiment that America has experienced in this generation. It has touched all evangelical churches equally with the Presbyterian. But the Presbyterian Church covered the origin of it, and the human factor from whom by writing, speech and conciliatory counsel these efficient influences radiated was Charles Stelzle, to whom the Presbyterian Home Board gave an enabling capital of opportunity.

And the story of the decade is not complete without noting besides that Stelzle has accomplished a surprising number of good things subsidiary to his main purpose. He has been a teacher to the church in all manner of social service responsibilities. His brave work in Labor temple, New York, has helped the whole denomination to set its heels more doggedly against the everlasting slip, slip, slip back from the downtown problem of the cities. The Home Board's bolder attack on specialized tasks in late years owes much to his encouragement. The immigration and country life departments of the board are indirect outcomes of Stelzle initiative. Altogether in contemporary Christian history, it counts a big red letter credit for Presbyterianism that it set Stelzle going.

Indiana Synod's Home Mission Half-Million

Certainly the Synod of Indiana has a splendid Godsend in the George Yandes bequest. This is the third gift which has come from the Yandes family to Indiana Presbyterian home mission work, and it is far the most generous of all. A round half million of dollars to spend on spreading the gospel among all sorts and conditions of men in Indiana puts on the synod a tremendous responsibility for making good. There will be no more chance to plead lack of money for lack of results. The only explanation of failing success now will be failure to lay hold on the mighty power of God. And certainly Indiana Synod will realize today as never before that it dare not come short in religious intensity, now that God's providence has given it such a vast advantage in material resources.

—The Sunday schools and Christian Endeavor movement vie with each other in appointing world's conventions in remote cities of other continents, and then organizing great parties of Americans to travel over seas to attend their meetings. But Christian Endeavor now has the palm for daring distance; it is laying plans to have a world's convention at Sydney, Australia—in March a year hence Meanwhile the Sunday school folks, because their great convocation is the nearer, are working just now much harder than the Endeavorers to get ready. The lure of the Swiss lake-and-mountain city, Zurich, is a spell under which hundreds of eager American Sunday school people are dreaming of a delightful June journey across the Atlantic. Over 700 have already registered for the trip with Mr. Hartshorn in Boston. It is a bit of sidelight on the ubiquity of the American in this round world to learn that the local committee on arrangements in Zurich has an American secretary—Rev. William Esslinger, who was sent from Milwaukee to be pastor of the Methodist church in that place.

—Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin's recent reiteration of Presbyterian reverence for the ancient custom of infant baptism has seriously offended some Baptist brethren, because Dr. Coffin was talking church union when he mentioned the subject and intimated strongly that Presbyterians would want to retain this rite in any union adjustment. This seems to the Baptists to be equivalent to discouraging union altogether But certainly the Baptists do not think that children born into Christian homes have no nearer relation to the church than children born of non-Christian parents. And if such children have in infancy a Christian status, certainly the church ought to have some way of according them recognition at its altars long before they are able to request it themselves. If the Baptists know some other way as good as infant baptism to make all this plain, let them tell us about it. That is really the only effectual way to argue against infant baptism.

—A correspondent writing to The Catholic News from Rome predicts that when the present commission at work on the Vulgate Bible has settled what it thinks to be the real text translated by St. Jerome, another commission will be appointed to discover how accurately Jerome followed the Greek and Hebrew originals of the Scriptures. This prophecy hardly seems within the range of possibility, but the very suggestion of it from a Catholic source in Rome is proof enough that Rome does change, despite boasts of immutability. For nothing has been more definitely settled in Roman theology than the proposition that the Vulgate itself is inspired as a translation. Not for centuries has the Papal church admitted that there could be any question of its being in error in any point.

—Some folks who have heard that the Episcopalian commission on faith and order means to hold a conference in New York in May or June have jumped too soon at the conclusion that this is to be that wonderful worldwide conclave of all sorts and conditions of Christians contemplated in the commission's general plan. But they mistake the size of the commission's task and its present preparedness. Only a preliminary gathering of a few invited conferees is now in view. The commission will have to work on a good many years yet before the official world conference of denominational commissioners becomes possible.

—The Continent lately was compelled to allude to the ungentlemanly coarseness with which many Roman Catholic editors write of Protestants. The worst offender in this line in the United States has been Thomas O'Hagan, editor of Archbishop Quigley's official organ, The New World, at Chicago. The language in Mr. O'Hagan's editorial columns has at times run close to indecency—especially in referring to prominent Protestant women. It is much satisfaction therefore to observe that he is out of the position at length, and has been succeeded by James Conwell, who, we trust, will be an improvement. He could not possibly be worse.

—The Presbyterian Advance understands The Continent to have advocated Northern and Southern sectional Assemblies, with a geographic line drawn between. But The Continent is not an advocate of any sectionalism. We only specified that arrangement as the sole form in which the proposition of provincial Assemblies should be entertained at all, since only in that form would it plainly signify a step forward from present conditions toward union. And it would be tolerable only on an understanding promising complete union within a reasonable space of time. Union as broad and as solid as the nation is the only acceptable goal.

—Warner N. Van Norden, who has traveled widely in China—the son, by the way, of one of the most efficient lay members of the Presbyterian Foreign Board—says there is no other common story about the Chinese quite so absurd as the frequently repeated statement that physicians in China are paid fees only while their patients stay well, but not when the patients get sick. Mr. Van Norden says that in point of fact the Chinese, like Americans and other honest people, pay their doctors when they ask service of them.

DR. JOWETT'S MESSAGE

Powers of an Apostle

THE APOSTOLIC LIFE abounds in suggestions of power. It is not only that there is power in some particular direction; there is basal executive force which gives impetus to everything. The life is filled with "go" and "drive" and strength of character and conduct. Power resides behind every faculty, and every disposition, and every form of service. The apostolic life is efficient and effective. It is as though a man had a fine equipment of tools, but his hand is weak and trembling; and suddenly there is given to him a mighty strength of grip, and he is able to seize upon every tool and make it accomplish its appointed purpose. "Ye shall receive power when the Holy Ghost is come upon you." And that energy empowered everything, and gave intensity and strength in every exercise of the apostles' life. Let us look at one or two directions in which this holy power was revealed.

Faith That Lays Unshaken Hold on God

The apostolic life was distinguished by the strength of its relationship to God. It was powerful in its ability to believe. We can do nothing more vital to any man than to encourage and strengthen his finest faith. When our faith in the Highest is limp and uncertain everything lacks assurance. When there is lameness in the movements of the spirit our conduct can never be firm. And therefore did the Holy Spirit energize the early apostles in their supreme relationships and steadied them in their faith.

Now, faith is first of all an attitude and then an act. It is primarily a spiritual posture which reveals itself in moral obedience. And to be rich in faith is to possess a poise of soul which steadily contemplates and rests in the love of God, in sunshine and in shower and through all the changing seasons and temperatures of our years. When the soul is thus quietly steadied in this spiritual assurance, its faith is expressed in manifold holy ministries of hope and love. This ability of faith is one of the radiant characteristics of the early church, and it was the creation of the Holy Ghost.

But just as apostolic life was empowered in its relationship to God, so was it quietly empowered in its resistances to the enemy of God. There are two phrases used by the apostle Paul, in which this sovereign ability is described: "Able to resist the wiles," "Able to quench the darts." I do not know any third way in which the enemy of God approaches the souls of men. He draws near to us in wiles, he dresses himself in all kinds of flattering guises, he exercises himself in deceitful mimicries, he uses glosses innumerable. He disguises the ugly by throwing about it a seductive limelight. He hides his destructiveness in bowers of roses.

And so, all through the generations, this wily antagonist has been seeking to ensnare the children of God. He uses attractive euphemisms. He deceives us by grand speech. He makes us think we are striding out in glorious liberty, when we are really moving in servitude. Now one of the great distinctions of apostolic life was the power to discern and resist the insidiousness of the foe. The apostles' eyes were anointed with grace, and they were able to pierce the mere appearance of things and to discriminate between the holy and the profane. They could distinguish mere ease from holy peace, and all transient flimsiness from the things that abide. And this vigilance and strength were the equipment of the Holy Ghost. He kept the soul awake and vigorous, and they were not taken by surprise.

Peace That Satan's Assaults Cannot Ruffle

But another apostolic ability is expressed in the kindred phrase, "Able to quench the darts of the evil one." For sometimes the enemy comes to us in sudden flame, and not in seductive light. He leaps upon us in an irritation, rather than steals upon us in some soothing consolation. Some inflammatory suggestion is flung across the threshold of the mind, and our life is all ablaze. The fiery dart finds congenial material and life is consumed with unholy passion. A spark from a passing engine can kindle a fire which can destroy a countryside. And the spark of an infernal suggestion, or the merest hint of criticism, or some transient incident, can convert the soul of the unwary into a house of unclean fire.

Now these early apostles had a power to quench these darts. It is a wonderful equipment to be kept so cool and quiet in disposition, that when the inflammatory thing is thrown it finds nothing congenial, and speedily dies out. This is the ministry of the Comforter.

"Breathe through the pulses of desire Thy cooling and thy balm."

And this "cooling" is the blessed service which the Holy One fulfills in the souls who entertain him as their guest.

But there is still a third kind of power distinguished in apostolic life in relation to the evil one. It is "mighty to the pulling down of strongholds." Every generation is face to face with established deviltry. Castellated wrong rears itself on every side. There are great vested interests built upon iniquity. Vice lifts itself in very proud mien. Wickedness builds itself a lofty palace. Injustice girds itself with legality. Mischief is framed by a law. There are strongholds of iniquity. Every great reformer has leveled his attack upon a stronghold. There were many in the days of the early church, and a great many still remain. And our power of assault, definite in aim and invincible in attack, is to be found in the indwelling and fellowship of that mighty Advocate, who is himself also the minister of our peace.

Power to Bear Witness and Speak Comfort

There is a fourth great relationship in which the New Testament describes the power of those who are in communion with the Holy Ghost. And that is their power in their relationship to the children of men. "With great power gave the apostles witness." That is an ability which distinguished the early church—the power to arrest the indifferent by the proclamation of spiritual truth and by the confession of spiritual experience. Their words were weighted with the significance which crashed through opposition. How empty our words can be! The Turks have been deceived into using empty cartridges, and the ministers of the kingdom are often victims of a like deception. We indulge in empty words and the men on the strongholds laugh at our impotence.

There is nothing more tragical than the employment of forceless speech. But when there is life in the word, how tremendous is its passage! "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." They do not drop like dead lead, or like dead feathers; they go forth like living ministers endowed with the terrific life of God. The Holy Spirit is the indwelling Partner who fills our cartridges, who endows our speech and makes our words the very vehicles of heavenly power and grace.

There is one other power which I should like to name, which is mentioned in the apostolic record: "Able to comfort." Is there any gift more gracious than this—to have a wallet filled with oil and wine, that when we meet the bruised and the fainting we can minister healing and inspiration? Is there any more beautiful ministry to which any child of man can be called? To be able to speak words that console, to have a presence that heartens and cheers, to give a witness that lifts the despondent into the light of hope; this may be the privilege of all the friends of Christ Jesus.

They may have a ministry in time of sorrow like that of sunlight falling upon dark clouds. They may go down the gloomy ways of man, lighting lamps of encouragement and hope. "Able to comfort!" They have the power to apprehend the ailment and the sorrow, and they have the equipment to soothe and to bless. "Ye shall receive such power when the Holy Ghost is come upon you."

J. H. JOWETT.

THE EASTER WINDS

By Ethel M. Colson

The little winds around the world
Blow sweet and soft and free,
For joy that winter's flag is furled,
That spring has come to be—
And how they soothe, though tear-empearled,
The tired, sad soul of me!

They sing of treetops waving green,
Of wild flowers springing free,
Of gracious anthem-scents that mean
New life has come to be—
And how they thrill to rapture clean
The sin-scarred soul of me!

Oh, little winds that round the world
Blow sweet and soft and free,
For joy that death's dark flag is furled,
Blow back, if this may be,
To radiant faith with hope empearled
The strayed child-soul of me!

In the Icy Sea—with God Near

BY WILFRED T. GRENFELL

This is a true story, says Dr. Grenfell. It was told him a short time ago by one of his hardy fisherman friends of the Labrador

Dr. Grenfell in Winter Dress

OUR northern hospital has a mission room attached to it—a most humble affair with a plain board interior. The innumerable knots in the bare wood show clearly that the timber has been cut from the gnarled spruces of our north country.

One Sunday afternoon when the service was over and the little congregation was straggling out, one of the men stopped behind to talk to me. He was a born sailor, quiet, self-confident and with no end of initiative. He was carrying on a fishery near by, which, when we first built the hospital, had been his father's, who also in his day was a brave and successful fisherman.

During the twenty years past when any help had been needed in that district, it had always been to their house that we had first gone to seek it, and it was invariably rendered without charge or delay. The best of neighbors and a trusted friend, he had been through deep waters since we parted in the fall of last year; and we were anxious to hear the story of it, though we feared to recall it unnecessarily to his mind.

With the energy characteristic of the man, when the fall of winter had driven him forth from his Labrador station, he had speedily settled up his accounts and gone on freighting trips on the north coast long after most of the schooners had retired to winter quarters. The long dark nights and heavy ground seas that characterize the last months of the year, and the bitter cold which freezes the running rigging stiff, and makes the sails like wooden boards, had at length convinced him that even he could no longer venture to keep the seas. So when he got a fair wind, with a free sheet and an extra large load of lumber, they went spinning homeward with glad hearts. His crew were his two brothers, a brother-in-law and two hired men, making a total of six. Loaded as they were it was not wise at any time, and at this season of year it would have been criminal folly, to risk a bad night at sea. So when suddenly, just at nightfall, the wind veered to dead ahead and the barometer made a sharp corresponding drop, as the vessel was then many miles from any shelter, it was decided to run back for the port which they had left, a matter of some thirty miles. Many islands and sunken rocks lie off that section of coast, and the water runs off everywhere shallow for many miles, so that heavy seas make quickly with the least bit of wind. To find any anchorage it was essential to run in between some large reefs, which, like most of our dangers, are neither lighted nor buoyed.

WIND A HOWLING GALE O' WINTER

It was dark when the first group was reached, but they were soon safely passed. With a lookout man on the bow, and himself astride the main crosstrees, the skipper had managed to make out bearings sufficiently well to avoid the rocks on one side without running into those on the other. For a brief moment there was comparative safety, and then again another set of ugly dangers had to be passed close by. It was now pitch dark and snowing heavily, and the wind had risen to a howling gale o' winter. With mainsail doused and reefed foresail, the schooner drove before it. The master, as before, placed himself on the crosstrees, in the vain hope that he might thence possibly get a glimpse of something to guide him on his course, especially as he neared the narrows. At length the log showed that their distance was run down; also, judging by the time when they had started to run, they must be past the last danger and safe to make the harbor light within a few minutes, anyhow.

Except for the hoarse roar of the storm no sound was heard—it was far too exciting a moment for conversation. Suddenly from his perch aloft the skipper's horrified gaze fell on a long line of rocks and breakers right below him, looking almost as if he could jump directly down onto them. With every ounce of strength in him he shouted to the helmsman, "Hard up! Hard up, or she's ashore!" There was still then probably just time to save her. But the shrieking of the wind through the cordage made his voice inaudible; the helmsman put the helm the wrong way, and with a frightful concussion the heavily loaded vessel crashed into those adamantine rocks. Instantly she was overwhelmed by heavy seas. Mountainous breakers poured over her doomed bulwark from all sides at once. It was only a few moments before the mainmast had gone by the board with a crash and the stern of the vessel, battered by the thundering surf, soon broke up to matchwood and went after it.

All six men had, however, succeeded in getting to the foremast rigging, and soon were clinging for dear life to the shrouds. The fore part of the wreck, still surging as the gigantic breakers struck her, threatened every moment to go to pieces, and all hands knew that that would spell immediate death. The mast rolled and swayed to and fro before the force of the seas. The snow and spray drove through their clothing just as if they had been naked. It froze in icicles on their faces, and at times made their clothes as stiff as boards. So miserable was their plight that they hardly knew whether to pray that the mast might soon go, and mercifully end their misery quickly, or that it might stand long enough, that after hours of agony they might have a chance of being seen from the land, which was about two miles away. All anticipated the worst, and each bade farewell to the others. One of the men, older than the rest, soon began to show signs of giving out, and so to encourage and keep the others in heart, the skipper proposed that they should sing a hymn.

SIX MEN AND THE REMNANT OF A VESSEL

The whole scene was to me the more realistic from the quiet way in which he pictured it. Think of that long winter night, six men clinging to the sorry remnant of a vessel, in the boiling surf of a reef far out in the ocean. They were buried in snow and sea and darkness, with death looming ahead any moment. Yet in spite of the war of surf and tempest they were calmly singing the old familiar strains of "Rock of Ages, cleft for me, let me hide myself in thee"; and then when that had died away,

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
  Let me to thy bosom fly;
While the nearer waters roll,
  While the tempest still is high."

Surely there, if anywhere, the Almighty was in touch with the souls of men.

"You prayed also, I suppose, skipper, did you not?" I interposed.

"No, doctor, I'm not a Christian, you know," was his amazing reply.

"Whatever do you mean by that?" I asked.

"Why, I can never testify in the meeting, or even pray," he answered.

"But it gave you comfort to sing, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes, it cheered us a lot, and we began to hope and even think that the mast might hold on till daylight."

"The vessel's bow," continued the skipper, "must have evidently been jammed in between bowlders. Perhaps the seas had driven her up farther among the cliffs. Anyhow, the waves now swept over her somewhat less. Perhaps the wind was going down—we couldn't tell. It seemed ages since we had struck, when suddenly I noticed that a large part of our deck load of lumber had been washed forward by the seas and was jammed in one huge pile between the rigging and the mast. It struck me at once that if only we could get some rope to lash it together, we might yet have another chance for our lives, even if the mast should go before daylight. I was able, by clinging to the spars, to crawl out on what was left of the boom and catch hold of a line which proved to be one of the reef lacings. The outer end had come loose when the canvas went, so I hauled it in and cut it off as low as I could reach. Everything else had gone. When I came to look for'ard of the mast I caught hold of a jib stopper and managed to haul it up and cut off a long piece of it as well. Yet, after all, in the darkness and cold, we could do nothing worth while with such short pieces; though a little later I did manage to get one of the lanyards.

"It must have been about 4 o'clock, anyhow it was a long while before the day broke, that the mast began gradually to cant over more and more; and then suddenly it snapped off close to the gammon and went over the side. The sea had meanwhile grown a little quieter and the wind had veered to the westward. This enabled us to cling better to the mass of lumber which was tangled with the rigging. But to our dismay we found that now the wind was off from the island on the end of which we had struck, and onto which we had hoped to escape at daylight. We could see that there was no longer any chance whatever of our getting onto that, although it seemed only a few yards from us. Plainly there was no chance for any swimmer to get through the surf alive.

MAST BECOMES A BATTERING RAM

"We just lay there waiting events, stretched out on the lumber, with first one piece and then another washing away from us. Every now and again the mast, which was still fast by the wire shrouds of the rigging, would rush into the raft on a sea like a huge battering ram, almost knocking it to pieces. Though we badly wanted to keep the spar to float us as our last chance, if the worst came to the worst, there was no hope of holding the lumber together if we did. So I made up my mind to cut her away if I could and let her go. It was still inky dark and bitterly cold, and it was no easy task to get down to the lanyards without being washed away. To cut the wire shrouds was out of the question. We had neither ax nor chisel, only our small jackknives. Yet to get free from that mast was our only chance.

"Once more I crawled along, half under water this time, and somehow managed to get at the ropes long enough to cut them one by one from the deadeyes. Tangled as the rigging was, with the lumber washed criss-cross and every way, as the sea drove the spar to leeward, it seemed as if the raft must still, in a few moments at best, go to pieces. But somehow through God's providence the whole mass of it worked loose together, was lifted by a big sea right clear of the wreck and we shortly found ourselves, all six of us, lying out on loose boards and driving in the darkness toward the open ocean, with neither the schooner nor anything else visible any longer.

"No, we didn't speak much, only just enough to make sure every now and again that we were all there. Each man who could was fully occupied trying to catch and haul back and push under the rest again the pieces of loose plank as the sea kept tearing them from the raft. Ages seemed to go by. But at last daylight began to come, and we could see the mainland and houses almost three miles away, looming up large every time we rose on a wave. Also out to seaward we could make out a low island on which we knew a lighthouse had recently been built.

HOPE REVIVES WITH THE DAYLIGHT

"Hope revived with the daylight, and finding that we could stand on the raft, we piled several boards on end and hoisted, first a piece of canvas that had been torn from the foresail and got tangled in the lumber, and then articles of our own saturated clothing—though we could ill afford to spare it even for that purpose. We all felt now that anyone looking out would be sure to see us. It was Sunday morning and bright and clear overhead; certainly the men would not be working, but would be about their houses outside. For a time we felt as if we were actually safe. The houses, which were entirely clear to view now, were all those of fishermen. Without a shadow of doubt they would notice such a strange looking object as we were. But we forgot, I suppose, how low we were in the water, and how much smaller one or two floating boards are than a house raised on the beach above the landwash.

"As the day wore on, hope once more began to fail us. No sign of help showed from the shore, and though we only drifted slowly, every hour drove us farther and farther off. And then all of a sudden we became aware of a new danger—a line of breakers lay dead to leeward, in the very direction in which we were driving, and warned us that if help did not come soon it would be too late. Mustering all our strength, we tried all we could to change the

THE WELCOME SHIP By Tertius van Dyke

Mr. van Dyke is the talented son of Dr. Henry van Dyke of Princeton, the famous preacher, educator and author. He is now preparing for the ministry

Clear-eyed and fearless, full of quiet faith
And love that seeks to meet a brother's need,
Glad with the joy of service that palls not
And happy in a bold adventure like
A boy, Grenfell, disciple of the Christ
And lover of the sea, rejoicing steers
His sturdy craft along a cheerless coast.

* * * * *

One glint of gold in the sullen west, and then
The evening settles down with lowering clouds.
The wind roars round the cape from the open sea
Whirling the stinging rain and sleet. Along
The rock-strewn harbor clustered houses lean,
Rough-hewn and weather-beaten like the rocks
To which they cling. In window panes made dim
With rain the lamplight gleams; the evening meal
Is ready. In one house alone no sounds
Of evening cheer arise; the heavy air
Seems heavier for the weight of a woman's sobs;
And the harsh sound of broken breathing hangs
Above a tiny cot. There helpless lies
A big-limbed fisherman, his bronze cheeks sunk,
His eyes wide open, sightless, blurred with pain.
Beside him burns the lamp, a little spot
Of faltering light amid the gloom.

Outside
On the cliff's edge a group of rough-clad men
With troubled faces turn their roving gaze
Across the sea—only the gusty wind
Swooping tears up great flakes of spume; only
The black waves leap and break in dirty foam
Along the black cliff's base. Hope fails; 'tis late;
The storm grows more and more. They turn to face
The brave man's horror of a helpless night;
With hopeless steps they go; one lags behind
For one last look—his keen eyes rove the sea;
He pauses; whirls the rain drops from his eyes
And looks again; then wheels: "The ship! The ship!"
He shouts with eager quavering voice.

Within
The house the cry comes to the listening ears
Faint but most joyous—"Oh, thank God! Thank God!"
The woman slips to her knees in grateful prayer!
The sick man lifts his head, a flickering smile
On his thin lips . . . A moment . . . then the sound
Of the eager voices and the tramp of boots;
The bringers of good news come trooping back
With kindly words of cheer.

* * * * *

And now across
A tossing sea beyond the harbor bar,
Out of the blinding fog and rain, and safe
From glittering icebergs and uncharted rocks,
Fearlessly plunging on, they come! they come!
The dauntless doctor and his dauntless crew
With hope and faith and life.

A SUNRISE EASTER SERVICE ON

BY GUSSIE PACKARD DU BOIS

ASIDE FROM her New Year's tournament of roses, southern California has two unique annual events, unparalleled elsewhere. Both events had their origin here, and both are of widespread interest because of their significance. The first in the year's activities is the sunrise Easter service held on Mount Rubidoux, which I attended for the first time last year. "Now, upon the first day of the week, very early in the morning, they came unto the sepulcher. They found the stone rolled away and found not the body of the Lord Christ."

This miracle of the ages was commemorated throughout the earth in reverent service and ringing anthem; in the glad pæan of a thousand silver-throated bells, and the exquisite symbols from a million blossoms wrought, making the day a golden one in the story of Christianity. But none of these services could be more impressive, more inspiring than that held in our beautiful, mountain-belted Riverside, sentineled on the west by Mount Rubidoux, brown robed, like a Franciscan friar, and crowned with a great cross.

The Cross on the Mountain Top, Near Riverside, California

A few days before Easter I went on a pilgrimage to this mountain, and this was the way of my going. Since the days have less of leisure than in Chaucer's time, sunrise and sunset coming nearer together, I pilgrimed in a motor car, with goodly wallet well filled, with pewter plate and black bread strapped on behind. When April dawn shattered the dark, we took flight due east into the pale gray, opalescent fog. The grass jostled against the flame of the poppies in the swift breeze of our going; the meadowlark rose, a flash of mottled brown and white, and, midair, dropped down on our heads his delicious, liquid notes. The foothills crouched in a dim circle, like half reclining guards, while the sainted peaks were still at matin, their curtains of turquoise closely drawn, blue incense smoke rising here and there from their hidden altars. The air was saturated with the perfume of spring—orange blossoms, roses, the odor of fields brown from the plow, and a breeze, stealing in from the sea, added its tang.

On and on we fared over smooth roads, and along the way nature spread her richest carpets, vivid with color; gold of the poppy; red of the cactus, of every shade from the flare of flame to dull pomegranate; purple shadows and the whole scale of blues, palest sapphire, indigo and delft. Mountain sage greeted our nostrils, its pungent odor, a playful, tricksy sprite of perfume, running after us as we went. Bird song, color, perfume, swift motion—rare companions on a pilgrimage.

As the sun climbed higher the great mountain peaks, their orisons over, parted their curtains and stood forth, solemn and full of grandeur, with cloud hangings of turquoise shot with crocus tints and opaline red and tremulous sapphire, until the very colors seemed to sing. Shining white against the sky's blue stood the crowned heads, while along the horizon ran the familiar line of the Sierra range.

End of the First Stage of the Pilgrimage

My pilgrimage was to a mountain top, but I ended the first half of the journey among the palm trees, at a long, low-cloistered building, from whose windows shone welcoming light, for it was now evening. I rode into a court, and from the arches overhead sounded the evening chimes from old mission bells, and the old familiar hymn, "Abide with Me." I entered to find blazing fires in the great fireplaces and went to my room to discover that the door opened with an iron latch, and through its portal I stepped into the yesterdays—a high four-poster bedstead, heavy beamed ceiling, a candle and a fireplace.

Later I found electric lights and telephone, but there was an abiding spirit of peace. So I rested until the morrow.

* * * * *

In the hush before daybreak, when wonderful colors began to tremble in the east, came the summons to continue my pilgrimage, and I descended to join the company in the court. In the olden days pilgrims were often footsore and weary; now the motor car makes the journey light. Everywhere was the gray, opalescent fog. Nestled in a corner of the big car, I was soon out in a world that was weird and dim, climbing toward the mountain top. Crowds were about us, many people on foot, all ascending.

On the "Mount of Transfiguration"

Up and up we went, winding around and around; down precipices we looked; great rocks loomed before us and were gone. At last the top was reached. All the valley was hidden from view. We were on the Mount of Transfiguration. We were at the beginning of the world. Earth and earthly things were gone.

Then, from the very summit, came the clear notes of a cornet, followed by a few moments of silence and the Lord's prayer by all that multitude. Responsive reading and again the many voices and then, to the old tune, the hymn, "In the Cross of Christ I Glory."

A CALIFORNIA MOUNTAIN TOP

I caught my breath to hear that volume of song rising from 2,000 voices; it seemed like "the great voice of a great multitude" that we read about in Revelation. A single voice followed, clear, strong, vibrant, in Henry van Dyke's "God of the Open Air," then again the sound of singing and, as it died away and tremulous color of dawn shot through the mist, I came back to earth and down to the mountain's foot and back to the court, the arches and the open fires.

Like a Benediction Upon All the Year

In all the Easter customs of many lands I can think of nothing more impressive than this service on Mount Rubidoux. It is the growth of an inspiration of Jacob Riis, and this was the fourth commemoration of the service, which is now a yearly event, and a contribution of permanent value to the religious institutions of the world. People come from a great distance to attend, and in years to come this unique service will become worldwide. For me, for many, it will rest like a benediction upon all the year.

* * * * *

It is on Memorial Day that the other mentioned event takes place, the ceremony of strewing the water with flowers in memory of our sailor dead of the civil war. It is a beautiful and imposing sight when, with ritual and bugle call, literally tons of flowers are strewn on an outgoing tide. They are dropped from piers and from boats that have put out from shore—wreaths, set designs, loose blossoms, fragrant lilies, velvet-leaved roses, violets, carnations—and slowly drift out to sea.

The thought of it all was planted in the heart of a California woman, Mrs. A. S. C. Forbes, and each succeeding year sees it more widely observed. It seems as if the very sea must rejoice to take these beautiful tokens in memory of the resting place of our sailor heroes over whose unknown graves the waters of ocean, gulf and river flow.

Filipino Flagellantes of Passion Week

BY WILLIAM B. COOKE

PASSION WEEK makes different impressions on different persons. To some here in Manila it means mainly a four days' holiday, a lark to the irresponsible, a serious interruption in routine to the anxious moneymakers. To others it means a special period of rest and meditation and worship. To the bulk of the population, Roman Catholic Filipinos, it means the great fiesta of the year. Milton's pen could have done it justice.

We had heard that here and there the practice of the flagellantes of self-inflicted torture by flogging was kept up. On inquiry we learned that it might be witnessed near La Loma church on Thursday morning. Accordingly, after breakfast a little party, including four round-the-world visitors from near Philadelphia, drove over to the northern edge of the city, through the parked grounds of Cemetario del Norte, to La Loma, the church on the hill. Its heavy stone walls were said to have sheltered fighters as well as worshipers. From here we went down to a little brook winding between hillocks. We see a group up stream and make our way toward them along the path. What are these dozen people watching? Ah, that figure lying prone in the path! Has he fainted? No, as we draw nearer he slowly rises to his feet. A black bag is drawn down over his head, his brown body is bare to the waist, trousers extend to the knees, his feet are bare. In his hand he carries the flog, a bamboo handle half a yard long, with some seven cords, each ending in a six-inch bamboo stick. With his right hand he deliberately whips the flog over his left shoulder, bringing the sticks down firmly but not violently on his inflamed and bleeding back; then slowly with his left hand. Two red and angry six-inch circles under each shoulder blade show where the flog hits. With every stroke he steps forward a pace. After some ten ceremonial paces he falls to his knees. A moment's pause, as in prayer, and another Filipino in ordinary dress who walks beside him steps behind him, lifts his foot, and with it pushes him forward on his face along the path. Then standing beside him again the helper bends down and gently whips the prostrate back with a handful of twigs, steps on his hips to the other side and whips him again with the twigs or with a strap. In a moment the victim arises, takes some ten paces and ten strokes along the path and sinks. All this in silence, slowly, ceremonially. So along the uneven path for 200 yards until it meets the stream again the two make their painful way. The blood does not run profusely, but the sight of raw flesh makes one faint.

The first fellow has come to the water and the end of his via dolorosa. He takes off his cap, steps waist deep into a pool and a friend pours buckets of water over him. He is not faint and we see that his back is not badly hurt, though pricked in a dozen places. We interview his helper, who has a paddle in his hand. This paddle has a cake of wax attached to the end and stuck edgewise in the wax are seven splinters of thick glass. With this the helper patted the victim under each shoulder blade, cutting the skin and starting the blood at the beginning of the journey. The helper explained that his friend was not a lawbreaker but had offended against heaven.

We drove home with a sense of sadness and of relief. How futile and mistaken and insufficient it all was! But how real and significant was the suffering of the first passion week, that suffering which is not to be repeated but appropriated, sufficient for the world.

BRADFORD HORTON, MAN

BY RICHARD S. HOLMES

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS—Bradford Horton, working his way through Prestonbury Theological Seminary, becomes entangled in a money theft which not only threatens his reputation but also puts him in a false position with regard to his parentage. Two friends remain openly loyal during his trouble. A third, Miss Elmore, though less outspoken in her championship, displays sufficient loyalty to give her father considerable uneasiness. He is, therefore, relieved in mind when, at the beginning of a long foreign tour, he sees that she has won the love of a young Scotchman. His relief is short-lived, however. A hot defense of Horton in a discussion results in an open breach with her father. Mr. Elmore, resenting her defiance of his wishes, collapses under the strain, but after several months' illness he forgives her and reconciliation follows. In the meantime Horton is called to his home to straighten out affairs in the bank founded by his adopted father, which has been wrecked by ventures in Wall street. To aid him in this work, and in a spirit of noblesse oblige, Horton sends for Oren-Toole, through whose jealous machinations his fair name had been smirched. Friendship between the two men results. A sheriff's sale is arranged to satisfy a judgment decree against the Horton estate. Bradford plans to bid in the old home for his mother, from whom he has been estranged because of his determination to enter the ministry. Oren-Toole's services are enlisted in the scheme.

CHAPTER XIX.—Continued

AN AUCTION of farm property was always an event to bring into town farmers from all directions, and such a sale as this of the Horton estate was most unusual. Glencoe was crowded with those who wished to watch the bidding.

No one ever knew what started Donald Cameron, proprietor of the Inwood inn, bidding on the farm. No sooner had Alanson Williams made the first bid of $5,000 than Cameron cried, before the auctioneer could repeat the offer, "Six thousand." There was an astonished buzzing in the crowd, while the auctioneer rattled on, and after three minutes, which seemed many times longer, a third bid was heard. "Eight thousand dollars!" called Williams.

"Nine," said Cameron.

"What's that Scotchman got into his head?" asked Williams of a neighbor.

"Trying to bother you for a Welshman, probably."

"I'd let him have it if it didn't join my farm. Anyhow, he'd put it on the market by and by and make a lot of money on it, and by gracious he shan't do it. I'll beat him out—I want it myself. Eleven thousand!" he called, and as that bid was raised another thousand, ventured a sum that he thought would end the bidding. "Fifteen thousand!" he said with an air of finality. The move was rash. "Sixteen thousand," said Donald Cameron quietly.

Pale under his tan and with grim determination in his voice, Williams raised the price by $500. Then, "Seventeen thousand," said Cameron, still quietly.

Williams almost lost his nerve. He hesitated. But the thought, "Shall I let that whisky-selling Scotchman beat me?" turned the scale, and unflinching he cried, "Seventeen thousand five hundred!"

"Raise him, Donald, raise him!" came the cry from the crowd as a pause followed. But Donald Cameron had fulfilled his mission, and the farm was knocked down to the last bidder. Ansley Jickers had won the first move in the game.

The big house was next put up. "I'm offered $5,000," called the auctioneer, "for the Henry Horton home and five acres of land. That offer is absurd. It cost $40,000 to build, and I'm offered $5,000. Five thousand, five——"

"Fifteen thousand!" called Ansley Jickers.

"Fifteen thousand," echoed the auctioneer. "Now you're coming to your senses, gentlemen. That sounds like business. Who's the bidder?"

Ansley raised his hand. Cathcart, who stood by the auctioneer, spoke to him in a tone not heard by the crowd.

"All right," said the auctioneer. "A responsible man bids $15,000. Fifteen thousand, fifteen thousand, fifteen, fifteen, going at fifteen——"

"One hundred!" cried a bidder.

"Fifteen one, fifteen one, going at fifteen one——"

"Two hundred!" called the New York man.

"Sixteen thousand!" cried Ansley Jickers in a high voice, and apparently much excited. "Sixteen thousand, I say!"

Steadily the song of the auctioneer went on. "Sixteen thousand, sixteen thousand; no more bids? Where's your sand, gentlemen? Going at sixteen thousand one; going at sixteen thousand two——"

"Sixteen thousand one hundred!" cried a voice. Ansley Jickers paid no heed to that. But the New Yorker did. He was growing excited and weary, and he thought one more bid might end it. "Seventeen thousand!" he called.

But no sooner were the words repeated by the auctioneer than Ansley Jickers rushed wildly up to the stand, and shaking his fist in the seller's face yelled, "Nineteen thousand, do you hear? Nineteen thousand!"

There was a hum in the throng and then a cheer. The move had the effect Ansley anticipated. The New Yorker lost his head. He wanted the matter ended. Striding out into the little open space before the auctioneer's stand, he stood glaring at his opponent for a moment, then roared out, "Twenty thousand, twenty thousand; I tell you, twenty thousand!"

The auctioneer was happy. He had not been a party to such lively work for a long time. He rattled off his calls with great volubility, expecting to hear the competitor call $21,000. But no; there was no response to his vociferous appeals. "Once, gentlemen, twice, and—sold for $20,000," and the hammer fell.

Cathcart spoke to the auctioneer. "These two sales make $37,500. The whole claim is less than $41,000. If that other house brings $4,000 it will cover all costs. Knock it down at $4,000." At which price it went to Barney O'Toole.

That night Donald Cameron gave his wife $25.

"That's pin money for you. I earned that today at the auction by singing."

"Singing?"

"Yes. I bid a little on the farm. A man called Jickers said a man who sang as well as I did ought to have encouragement."

CHAPTER XX.

HORSEMAN AND LOVER

AUSTIN SLEIGHTON returned to the seminary in September a changed man. He had spent his vacation preaching to a mission congregation in the town of Fairthorne, Minnesota. He had accomplished three things that satisfied him well—proved to himself that he really had power as a preacher; become devoted as never before to out-of-door life; and lost all the "old young man" manner which had heretofore been his characteristic. Horton hardly knew him when they met, so erect, so alert, so tanned by the weather was he. He would have passed very well for a civilized Indian.

His first move after getting settled into work was to join the city's athletic club. At sight of him one day on horseback, Joe Jickers was convulsed, and when he appeared in a finely fitting custom made suit, Horton remonstrated. "You're getting reckless with your money, A. S.," said he.

"Well, it's my money, isn't it?" was the answer. "I've never had much to be reckless with before; I have now, a little. Those Fairthorne men were mighty good to me."

"Just where is Fairthorne?"

"On the southern edge of the lumber region in northern Minnesota. Great country up there! A man could go into the lumber camps and no person on earth could find him, unless by accident." It was a random remark, but there came a time when Bradford Horton remembered it.

It was toward the last of September when Joe Jickers one day poured out his soul to Bradford in regard to Sleighton's transformation. "Brad," he said, "that organist man is a teetotal surprise to this court. Yes, sir, tee; yes, sir, total; that's what he is. Court never thought him anything but a do-re-mi man; a ten-finger-on-the-keys man; and here he turns out to be a good red-blooded fellow; a regular out-of-doors fellow; a horseback fellow. But say, Brad, tell him to stop. Court will have to adjourn if he doesn't."

"Stop what, J. J.?"

"Making athletic exhibitions with the back of a horse for his campus."

"What do you mean, J. J.?"

"Haven't you seen the organist on horseback? Then you have missed the best circus of the century. On the organ stool he's all right. But on a horse! Tell him to get himself strapped on next time he rides. It'll be better for him to sit on his horse strapped fast than to have the coroner sit on him. Organists can't play much after coroners sit on 'em."

"Your honor, the defense rests," laughed Bradford.

It was that very afternoon when Bradford, dropping in at Sleighton's room, found him in a short coat, with a riding whip in his hand. "Where are you going, A. S.?" he inquired guilelessly.

"Off horsebacking, that's all."

"A. S., I don't think it's a bit social for you to go off riding all alone. I'd like to go with you if I could ride, but I could never do it as you do. I don't believe there's another man in Prestonbury

He Was a Secular Editor, of Course

"Daddy," piped mother's little darling, "is the sea a mile deep?"

Daddy, who was also an editor, glanced up crossly from a huge pile of manuscripts. "I don't know!" he snapped.

Mother's little darling looked disappointed, says The New York Journal. A little while later he asked:

"Is the moon really made of cheese, daddy?"

Again came the response:

"I don't know!"

Another look of disappointment, another silence, and another question:

"Do cannibals use postage stamps?"

No less savage than the cannibals themselves was the distracted manuscript hunter as he roared, for the third time:

"I don't know!"

"Well, I say, daddy," exclaimed the youthful inquirer very seriously, "who made you an editor?"

THE WAYFARER

At the Theater Sunday

IF A MAN'S RELIGION has run too much to head—become speculative rather than experimental, bookish rather than vital —the Wayfarer prescribes for him a course in "the tenderloin"! Occasional visits to the rescue missions which dot the congested portion of every large city, the section where cheap lodging houses, vaudeville theaters, shooting galleries and Chinese restaurants abound, will do more to quicken one's faith in the present-day reality of the gospel than a course in Christian apologetics at a theological seminary.

* * * * *

To lift the "down and outs" up and in requires a force which cannot be produced in any of the machine shops or laboratories of science.

There are more men "on the beach," as the far eastern phrase has it, in every metropolis at any given time than the well housed, well fed community of respectables ever dreams. These men who have reached the end of their rope naturally gravitate to that section of the city where they can find the most congenial company. The "floating population" concentrates in the "tenderloin."

Cosmopolitanism is not confined to the avenues. At a recent midnight theater service in Philadelphia's "tenderloin" one speaker was introduced as having traveled twice around the world. He instantly utilized the point to get on talking terms with the crowd of several hundred men, remarking that to go around the world is a common experience, and calling for a show of hands from the men present who had shared it. About a dozen hands arose! Most of the men were stokers and sailors, and they had seen the life of foreign ports from another angle than the speaker; and with perhaps a closer intimacy. Some of the visitors from the churches were surprised at the showing of world wanderers, which was doubtless greater than could be made in an equally large crowd of college graduates; but the experiment could be repeated with practically the same results at any seaport city.

* * * * *

The incident contains an admonition for all well meaning folk who would address rescue mission crowds. These men are worldly wise; they are broken to life, as well as broken by life. They have a knowledge of the ways of mankind, and of the human heart in all its ranges. To address them as children or ignoramuses is but to betray one's own unfitness for the speaker's task.

* * * * *

That Sunday night theater meeting is an experience not to be regarded lightly. And the Wayfarer needs scarcely to remark that it is assuredly not for those who go seeking a spectacle or a new sensation; for those who want to "go slumming," or who feel themselves as other than brothers of the unfortunate. To make a show of another's misery or sin is pharisaism. They who go from a yearning to serve and to save their fellows find themselves sounding the elemental deeps of life. The best seats are not sought by this crowd, and that gallery full of faces, unshaven and unwashed, rising above characterless, threadbare coats and surmounted by uncombed hair; the burning eyes; the indifference to conventional politeness toward a speaker; the plainly writ story of lives burnt out in an unsatisfied search—all this makes a scene for a Dante's brush. There is more of tragedy and romance in a single rescue mission audience than in all the novels of a year.

* * * * *

The mission workers are an undeluded folk; they know that only a comparatively few of these men have come in search of religious comfort. Most of them, homeless, are seeking a temporary shelter from the cold. Scores have come to the only warm place they know to await the opening of the saloons at midnight. Many, footsore and weary, are eager for a place to rest and, if may be, to snatch a little sleep when the usher or the policeman is not looking; for the rescue mission must have its equivalent for the "tithing man" of Puritan days. On this particular occasion one poor fellow, to a speaker's discomfiture, got in a minute or two of steam-whistle snoring before he could be reached.

* * * * *

The best addresses that are made to a crowd of men who are submerged beneath the poverty and homelessness and actual suffering which accompany the baser forms of sin are not made by distinguished preachers. Some men's self-complacency in the pulpit would be severely jarred by a night in a rescue mission. The speeches that make bull's-eyes are the testimonies of redeemed men. Often there is little of grammar and less of rhetoric in these appeals —but they are thrillingly eloquent. They are life speaking to life. They are the redeemed of the Lord saying so. They testify to what they have seen, and declare what they know. Out of the depths they have been lifted by the miracle of grace—to those still in the depths they send a hail of hope and help. There is no preaching like unto witness bearing.

* * * * *

The whole business of religion may be vitalized by being kept at close grip with the present problem of redeeming men who are visibly sunk in the blackest mires of sin. Since the gospel can redeem the outcast, it can save the world. THE WAYFARER.

THE HOME COUNCIL

"The Stone Is Rolled Back"

BY GRACE BRUTON

THE HEART of a devoted Christian woman was heavy and sad. Cherished hopes had been blasted, hard-earned success swept into unexpected failure, obstacles seemingly unsurmountable pushed the culmination of a long desired and worthy object into the dim distance. This woman, disappointed and dejected, beginning her daily Bible reading, opened the book by apparent accident at the coming of the three mourning women to the Saviour's tomb.

"Who shall roll the stone away?" Her own soul, still bowed down with its troubles, echoed the cry of the women.

Like a flash of light from the printed page the answering words seemed to spring at her: "The stone is rolled back."

And like a flash of light, also, from her sick spirit was rolled the cloud and from her heart the load that burdened it. Could not the Power that had rolled away the stone imprisoning a dead Christ, that had set free to free the world a risen Saviour, remove every stone that hindered the progress, hampered the career of one of Christ's children?

The weary woman read no more. Her eyes filled with tears, her head sank to her folded arms and presently she dropped to her knees. There she remained a long time in silence, sending up a wordless pæan of praise and humble thanksgiving. Comforting, stimulating, reproving Scripture texts passed through her mind like healing rivers.

"Fear not, only believe."

"Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace."

"Sit still, my daughter, till thou know how the matter will fall."

When she arose life had changed its aspect. She knew she had only to do her best bravely, leaving to God all that might come from her efforts, content to serve him as he decreed. Since the difficult task was a just one, planned for the betterment of his children, lovingly performed in his name, its ultimate success was certain, even though a thousand tombing stones seemingly intervened. How and when the obstacles were to be removed was his business. There was little hope, perhaps less faith in the souls of the sorrowing women who sought Christ's tomb on the first great Easter morning.

"Who shall roll us away the stone?" they asked one another, sadly concerned as to how they were to obtain access to a dead body. But, instead, angels announced to them the glad tidings of their Lord's resurrection, and lo! the stone was already rolled away.

Offensive Table Manners

There is no royal road to proper behavior at table. Good table manners are the result of unremitting direction and correction during childhood. It is a safe conclusion that the majority of men and women who eat noisily and ungracefully, gurgling soup from the tip of the spoon, clutching fork and knife to their hilts and committing other offenses against good breeding were allowed to eat any way they chose when they were children. Consequently as grown-ups they are criticised and blamed for faults which should in all fairness be laid at the doors of their parents.

That bad table behavior is by no means confined to what we are pleased somewhat patronizingly to call the "lower classes" was discovered, to her surprise, by a summer guest of an eastern hotel at a fashionable resort where board comes high. After commenting in The New York Tribune on the hardly believable fact that boisterous eaters can see others taking their food as well bred people should, and still not learn their tardy lesson, she goes on to say:

"Hurry is responsible for a good many table misdemeanors, but isn't it strange that at a summer resort, where there is plenty of time for everything, so many people will rush through their meals as if their lives depended on getting to the end!

"There was a man at the hotel whom I quite wanted to know until I saw him eat lettuce. He would take a large head in his hand and start at one corner and actually chew it in like a rabbit. There was a beautiful woman, an exquisite looking ceature, who used to talk incessantly at meals with her mouth full.

"Lettuce, by the way, is a thing few people seem to know how to manage. Near the nice man who ate his lettuce like a rabbit was one who cut his up into unnecessarily fine shreds—sawing away at it until it seemed as if he were going to cut the plate up, too.

"One handsome athletic girl of the social register class always had two eggs for her breakfast, and the chopping and stirring of those eggs was the noisiest thing I ever heard. New guests would look up in astonishment, but the girl's family didn't seem to notice it.

"Then there were the people who buttered large slices of bread and bit into them; the people who smacked; the people who hung over their plates as if they had no backbone.

"I hope I am not hypercritical. I didn't try to see these things; they were obvious. I wouldn't criticise elderly people whose age might perhaps make them careless. These guests of whom I speak were young or middle aged. They had money and leisure, they had had the advantages of travel."

The writer might well have added to her list of offenders the one who indulges in mouth gymnastics to cleanse the teeth from food, and that disgusting person, the toothpick user.

"She Never Pushed Him"

A gentle and unconscious rebuke to impatience at the hour when the Sandman makes the putting to bed slow work is administered in this little story told by a writer who watched an elephant mother get her baby ready for the night.

This huge mother had carefully trodden down the hay in their inclosure at the zoo, and when the bed thus made was ready the little fellow dropped to his knees on the flattened hay.

After a few soft grunts from the mother, says the writer, he lay as a well trained child of the elephant family should. The mother's work, however, was not yet done. She took up delicately the hay from the edge of the bed and began tossing it lightly along his sides and up toward his back until its ridges no longer showed.

When all was done, a small girl, who had warned me not to disturb the proceeding, heaved a great sigh and, turning to me, said: "I would just like to know what they do it for."

So I told her, explaining the habit wild animals have of treading their beds to make sure that there are no snakes in the grass; the necessity of dust-powdering the young, whose skin is tender in the folds, and who are troubled by insects; the piling up of dry grass around them to conceal them from the hunter.

"My! Don't they know a lot? More than some folks, I fancy," said the little girl. "And she never punched nor pushed him, either, though he wasn't very quick," she added, speaking to a tired-looking woman who stood by smiling.

"No, dear," she said; "she has but one child to put to bed."

No Germs for Doggy

An amusing story is told of a recent experience, at a Washington railway station, of the wife of a federal official.

She is extremely fond of dogs, and was pleased, therefore, when she took a seat in the waiting room to find in the seat next to her a small dog. The dog was a friendly little beast, and the violent wagging of his tail showed that he wanted to get acquainted with his neighbor.

As she leaned over to pat him her small neighbor jumped up eagerly to lick her face. Suddenly a showily dressed woman in the seat just beyond reached out in dismay and drew the dog away.

"Excuse me," she said stiffly, "but I never allow my dog to kiss strangers!"

What the Lilies Told Me

BY KATHRYN C. WHEELER

Daffy-down-dillies, daffy-down-dillies,
Nodding your heads in that very wise way,
What is your secret, sweet daffy-down-dillies?
"After the winter comes springtime," they say.

Snowy white lilies, snowy white lilies,
Calling the little flower children to pray,
Out in the wind where the sunny green hill is,
Why are they glad it is spring, lilies, say?

"All through the wintertime," answered the lilies,
"Down in the frozen earth, ever so deep,
This is the secret they learn," said the lilies,
"Nothing is dead; it is only asleep."

Dear Easter lilies, dear Easter lilies,
Sometimes a baby lies under the snow,
Will he come back to the spring, Easter lilies?
Is he just sleeping there under the snow?
"Death is not death, it is sleep," said the lilies;
"We have arisen with Christ, and we know."

Benjy and Betty's Easter Plan

The Prize-Winning Endings

[Synopsis of First Part: Benjy and Betty and Baby Margery loved Valentine's Day. Their mother, however, did not. She grew very tired of picking up the valentines which the children scattered from one end of the house to the other. Finally she suggested that Benjy and Betty think up some plan for taking care of the valentines. Benjy's plan proved to be a good one.]

FIRST PRIZE

BETTY AND BENJY were busy cutting the pictures out of the valentines and pasting them in books when the doorbell rang and in walked their Uncle Ben from Seattle.

"Oh, we had forgotten all about Uncle Ben coming!" cried the twins.

"I came pretty near not getting here," said Uncle Ben. "My train was delayed about twenty-four hours. We were stuck in a snowdrift about nine hours in Montana, near a little station called Wolf Point."

"Oh, Uncle Ben, tell us about it!" cried Betty.

"The snow had been drifting badly all day. About 3 o'clock the train stopped and we found we were stuck in a snowdrift almost as high as the engine.

"A few of us thought we would walk to a station about half a mile ahead while the train crew shoveled the snow off the track. It was bitter cold and pretty hard to get through the snowdrifts.

"After we had gone about half way an Indian came along with a sleigh and gave us a ride."

"What did he look like?" asked Benjy.

"He was dressed about like a white man, only he had long hair, a red handkerchief around his neck and a wide-brimmed light hat.

"He was going to see his little girl Annie at the Presbyterian mission school for Indians located there. He seemed very proud that she 'had name like white girl' and that she was learning to cook and sew like white folks.

"We took a look through the school and found it had about fifty pupils. One little girl I noticed had a dress much too big for her, and the superintendent explained that people sent in clothing and they often needed it so badly that they had to put it right on the children without making it over."

"Oh, Uncle Ben, we're making scrapbooks, and we hadn't decided just where to send them; but now we'll send them to the little Indians for Easter," cried Betty.

"Yes, let's," Benjy agreed.

Two weeks later they received twelve letters, signed with twelve Indian names, thanking them for the books they sent.

"I'm 'most glad Uncle Ben's train did get stuck in the snow, for we wouldn't have known about the Indian school if it hadn't," said Betty. HELEN G. MORE (age 14).

Hood River, Ore.

SECOND PRIZE

"IT'S ABOUT Easter," Benjy went on. "There's a picture in Margery's book that made me think of Easter. I'm going to take all my valentines, if Betty will, too, and put them in envelopes, with a little story in each about Easter Day—how Jesus was crucified and rose again on that bright Easter morning—and send these to the Chinese children. Our Sunday school teacher said that the Chinese children like pictures. Oh, won't they be glad to get them? Will you send yours, too, Betty?"

"You can think of the most nice things, Benjy Bradford. I don't know what I'd do if I didn't have you for a brother. Of course I'll help if mother will let us do it. But just think how many stamps it would take, and we've spent all of our money for valentines. Oh, my! Oh, my!"

"I think it's a good idea, Benjy. Perhaps you could send the valentines in one package to some missionary and explain in a letter what you want done with them," said Mrs. Bradford.

"Let us ask papa for some missionary's address. Where is he, mother?"

"In his study," was the reply.

The twins obtained the bit of information, then scampered away to try to find some way of earning enough money to pay the postage, for they insisted on doing everything themselves.

In a week's time news of the plan had spread through all the school. The other children in Benjy and Betty's class caught their enthusiasm and sent packages to the hospitals and to other mission fields. More than one mother heaved a sigh of relief as the children took their packages to the post office.

Two weeks before Easter the children counted the pennies which had slipped one by one into the apple bank and found that they could pay the postage. They had been tempted many times to take a few cents out of their hard earned savings to purchase taffy or peppermints, but they would think of the poor heathen children who were to receive the valentines and messages, and again the pennies would find a place in the bank.

"The missionary will get them on—on—Good Friday," said Benjy, counting the days on the calendar, as Betty addressed the package.

"We shall mail it our very own selves, Benjy. We've done lots of things together, but this is the very nicest of all. And the boys and girls agreed to send theirs, too, every year," cried Betty. MARY C. BROADY (age 11).

Watertown, Ohio.

Benjy's "Rabbits-Kitties"

When Benjy and Betty were wee things like Baby Margery they were given a pair of gray rabbits for Easter—a mamma rabbit and her baby. Mrs. Bradford explained to Benjy and Betty that though these bunnies looked like kittens, they really were not at all like them; but the children never could see that they were very much different from their pet Tabby. That's why Benjy always called them his "rabbits-kitties." When he was out in their pen feeding them lettuce one morning his father took a picture of them, and here they are!

THIRD PRIZES

BENJY AND BETTY loved Easter. They always had such a good time then, that it was no wonder Benjy thought of Easter. "You know, mother," said Benjy, "that Baby Margery loves to look at picture books. Well, today we had a story in our reader about Dora, who had too many dolls. She took one of them to a hospital and gave it to a sick little girl. We could take our valentines and make a pretty scrapbook and send it to the hospital Easter morning."

"Yes!" cried Betty, clapping her hands. "And we can hunt up all of our old Easter cards, too."

"That is a fine plan," said Mother Bradford. "Some of your playmates might like to help you make scrapbooks. You may have a scrapbook party."

"Won't that be nice!" cried the twins, dancing around the room.

"Mother, may we take our money to buy postcard books to paste the valentines and Easter cards in?" asked Benjy.

"And some little Easter rabbits for prizes for the boy and girl who make the prettiest scrapbooks?" asked Betty.

Mother said they might and the next day they wrote their invitations.

"Benjy," said Betty, "let's cut out Easter eggs to write our invitations on."

Benjy agreed, and when they had cut the eggs from mother's note paper they wrote: "You are invited to a scrapbook party at Betty Bradford's home March 22, 2 o'clock. Please bring all the valentines and Easter cards you would like to give away."

The Saturday afternoon before Easter found twelve boys and girls at the Bradford home. My, how the valentines and Easter cards poured in! The twins had little tables ready with the postcard books and bottles of paste. All the children had lots of fun and they made such nice books that Betty wished she could give a rabbit to each one. But Jimmie Brown and Daisy Hardy won the prizes. When the children were through Mrs. Bradford said, "Now you may hunt your eggs."

"Oh, mother," cried Betty, "I didn't know we were going to have an egg hunt!"

"That is my surprise for you," said her mother, smiling.

On Easter morning Benjy and Betty took twelve lovely picture books to the hospital. They saw how pleased the little sick children were with their presents. And the twins declared it was the happiest Easter they had ever had. GENEVIEVE MAUST (age 10).

Little Rock, Ark.

"I'M GOING to take all my valentines, if Betty will, too, and I'm going to make a book for little Cousin Harold." Now Harold had got hurt. He was out playing in a snowdrift and had sprained his leg, so that he could not walk into the house. He had been lying in bed for more than two weeks and could not walk a step.

Harold had a sister whose name was Susie, who was a little older than Harold. They lived with their mother in a large private school for children. Their mamma was one of the teachers in the school.

"That is a fine plan, but how are you going to arrange the valentines?" asked Betty.

"Why, I'm going to cut all kinds of pictures out of my valentines and paste them in the book. Then I'm going to write a verse under each picture, and I'm going to draw some pictures, too."

Their mother was becoming much interested. She said: "I'll buy a scrapbook for you."

"Oh, goody!" exclaimed Betty. "Buy a great big one, for I'm going to cut out all of my valentines, too."

So mother bought a large scrapbook for them. They cut out ever so many pictures from their prettiest valentines and pasted them in the book. On the front page they pasted a picture of themselves.

When Harold's mother brought a big box into his room the night before Easter Harold stared in wonder.

"Why, mother, what is it?" he asked.

"It is something for you and Susie," she replied.

Susie came into the room just then.

"Oh, Susie, mother has something for us!" exclaimed Harold eagerly.

"Oh, oh, it's a book!" said Susie with delight when her mother had opened the box.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

March 30, 1913—Review

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Golden Text, Psalm 22:4: Our fathers trusted in thee: they trusted, and thou didst deliver them.

A review is simply a sum in addition. The result depends on the accuracy with which we recall the details. For three months we have been studying Genesis. Some have gone over it, some through it, and possibly a few at a safe distance about it. In each instance we saw as we looked. That word "look," as it occurs in Scripture, has one special purpose. A procession is going by, and the mind is called to the window to "look," and looking, to observe, and observing, to remember. The gospels are a wonderful illustration of the power of memory. They record nothing more marvelous than themselves. The were written long after the Master's death, and still every detail stands out with the freshness of yesterday. The sermon on the mount, so far as we know, the disciples heard but once, but the very words seem to have been retained. Those men were capable of attention. Great men always are.

The lessons for this last quarter should have made a lasting impression upon those who studied them. They belong to the beginning, which in itself makes them attractive. For this reason Genesis should be among the best known books of Scripture. The "creation" was a fitting subject with which to begin, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." That one shelf holds the libraries of time. All else is incidental to it. Every theory as to the creation must finally pass through that gate. "Man the crown of creation" naturally completes the work. Three times God stepped within the creative circle—at the creation of matter, life and spirit.

Man Becomes Supreme Through His Power to Choose

Man's supremacy lay in his power of choice. His position he must confirm. No one is ever his real self until he has had a chance to be someone else. Is man strong enough to stand the test? Adam and Eve seek out the trees of life and death. The fruit hangs low and man's first sin has been committed. The curtain has gone up and the tragedy begun. The actors are driven from the garden. The first to greet them are Cain and Abel, their own sons—one stained with blood, the other dead. The parting of the ways has been reached, and the world turns to the left.

The race becomes worse from age to age. One of two things was inevitable—either God must destroy the race or the race would destroy itself. The wages of sin is death, and man was reaching the harvest. Then came the flood, bringing a more merciful end than man had chosen for himself. But the memory of that judgment would deter the generations from all enterprise and effort, and so God's covenant with Noah, that never again would he destroy the earth, was set like a bow in the heavens.

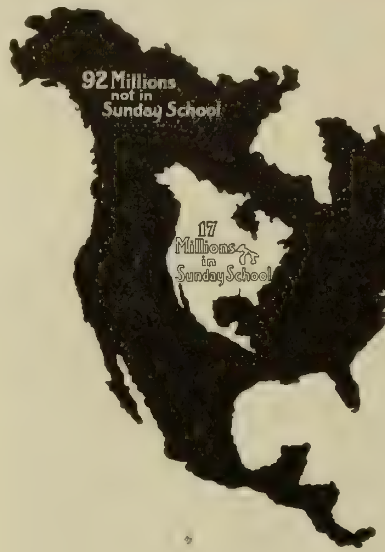
Someone to Lead the Way Necessary to Reformation of Men

Noah became a second Adam and his descendants sought to rebuild on lines better than before. But someone must help them. Someone endowed of God must lead the way. God never consults others in his selection of men. Down in the old city of Ur there lived one destined to this work. But little is known of his youth. He is said to have been a prince, but a higher distinction awaited him farther on.

Then came the call of Abram, who opened the gates of a new era. His mightiest achievement was the discovery of the truth about the one God. To this end he addressed his life. But first he must migrate to Haran, a city 500 miles distant, and there lay the foundations of a kingdom lasting as time. With him was associated his nephew Lot, not so much for mutual strength as that Abram and Lot were essential to God's purposes for the future.

God's covenant with Abraham was but a new chapter added to the book of his decrees. In the far distance was a people numerous as the stars, whose life was to be lived in faith and whose history was to illustrate God's supervision over the world. But Lot refused to dwell in the land of promise, and the destruction of Sodom came as a terrible answer to his choice.

We saw at the beginning of our lessons that no character is ever established without its temptations. The test of Abraham's faith only gives emphasis to this truth. His faith was thrown into the furnace, and whether it proved to be gold or dross remained to be determined. In this the patriarch was strong. God had promised him descendants numerous as the sands upon the shore. As yet Isaac was his only legitimate son. Who of all the daughters of the earth was worthy to carry the strain down through the centuries? His own kin were back in Haran, where lived the beautiful Rebekah, who, with Isaac, afforded the final response to his faith.



92 Millions not in Sunday School
17 Millions in Sunday School

In and Out of Sunday Schools

This chart, issued by the American Christian Missionary Society, Cincinnati, shows the large number of people in America not in any Sunday school. Other figures from the same source show that the average Sunday school has nine teachers and eighty-two pupils.

These are a few of the fathers who walked with God. At this distance they seem as celestial giants, far removed from the frailty and weakness that beset men of today. But the world in which they lived was the same as ours. The streams of humanity run in unchanging channels, and we are all borne outward toward the one sea that rolls all round the world. Nothing is permanent but God. Abraham died, but his faith lived. From the heights of promise he saw the day of Christ and rejoiced in the vision. In faith alone he was strong.

Review Lesson by Lesson

By Hermon D. Jenkins

1. Whence has come "this universal frame"? Science is dumb before that question. It can only witness to things as they are. But the spirit of man insists upon an answer to the question, and no answer satisfies it but that of the Bible: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth" (Gen. 1:2-3). In our own day science has revealed a universe of such extent and order and beauty that only the monotheism of the Bible can stand. Science has rendered atheism absurd, impossible.

2. Whence comes man? The Bible says, by the will and power of the Almighty. Sometimes the wanderer along a mountain stream picks up a worn stone whose form suggests art, but which might possibly be ascribed to chance. But nobody ever ascribed the Apollo of the Vatican to chance. The crown of creation was not an accident. God designed man, and in his mind, conscience, speech and emotions he exhibits a divine image. Creation alone explains him (Gen. 2:4-25).

3. The Bible does not profess to account for the existence of sin but only for the existence of man's sin. It does not deny the existence of sin but asserts that it entered at the fountain head. Observation shows sin to be universal. Revelation affirms it to have entered Eden. Its essential factor is unbelief in the word of God. Sin maintains the same character to this day (Gen. 3).

4. But early as was the fall, redemption for the individual followed close behind. Cain was a murderer, but Abel was a child of God. The contending tendencies of which we are all conscious, one toward the higher life and one toward the pit, come to light in the first two biographies we have. No other facts of life have such importance or significance or persistence as these—a proneness to sin and a possibility of escape by grace (Gen. 4:1-15).

5. "The flood came, and destroyed them all" (Luke 17:27). The traditions of all nations present the flood as a fact never to be forgotten. The Bible presents it as a lesson never to be ignored. The Bible teaches forgiveness for sin, atonement for sin, but it never encourages indifference to sin. The flood was a divine surgery which removed sin (Gen. 6:9-22).

Rainbow Reminder of God's Patient Love Toward His World

6. God's judgments are followed close by God's consolations. The first thing after the flood is the rainbow. If we know God as the Bible reveals him, fear of God is never despair. That law, we have learned, is imperfect which does not provide a penalty for transgression and forgiveness following contrition. The most beautiful object in nature is chosen to remind us of God's patient love toward a sinful world (Gen. 8:1-9, 17).

7. But in the fullness of time God selected one man to stand for a new redemptive order and force. Religion, including both faith and morals, was on the down grade. No one can walk through a museum in which are stored the results of excavations among the ruins of ancient cities without wondering that a second flood was withheld. One strong character, not without its faults but rich in good qualities, among them the indispensable one of teachableness, was chosen to be "the father of all them that believe" (Rom. 4:11).

8. A study of Abraham's career helps us to understand true religion in patriarchal days. His faults are not disguised or condoned, but his life is upon an infinitely higher plane than that of even his own kinsmen. During a long life full of many disappointments he held fast his trust in God; he treated even selfish men with magnanimity and he prayed for sinners who never prayed for themselves. In war he had the courage of a soldier and in private life the humility of a child.

Abraham Promised That He Shall Found New Life Among Men

9. With this great soul God entered into an alliance. Abraham was originally rich and by the blessing of God become still more affluent. He was powerful as the leader of a tribe, and by the directing wisdom of God he was never defeated in the field. But God promised him neither riches nor victory. What he did promise was that he should become the founder and father of a new life among men, a life leading upward as well as onward, and that eventually all the nations of mankind should be "blessed in faithful Abraham" Gen. 15; 17:1-8).

10. But while no universal flood is ever to sweep the earth, isolated cities and races as well as individuals may bring down upon themselves condign punishment (Gen. 19). So did Sodom. Thus did Rome, in the judgment of the historian Gibbon. Napoleon did the same in the judgment of Victor Hugo.

11. That Abraham might be forever immune from the worst of the practices which environed him he was taught God's repudiation of sacrifices which had cost the life of others (Gen. 22:1-19).

12. The son thus rescued from pagan rites was in the last lesson of the quarter happily married to a maiden of the same family and faith, and the fire which had seemed to burn low upon the solitary altar was rekindled and perpetuated and the future of religion was assured.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning March 23, 1913

Topic—The great supper. Luke 14:16-24.

The kingdom of heaven is a feast. Eternal life is a banquet. When that other guest who sat at meat with Jesus in the house of the ruler of the Pharisees exclaimed, "Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God," he gave utterance to one of the most certain convictions of his religion (compare Is. 25:6). The kingdom of heaven would be eating and drinking; it would be an era of unparalleled prosperity; and all righteous people would surely enjoy their portion.

"The resurrection of the just" had suggested the thought of the kingdom, and evidently this guest complacently assumed that he was one of those who would enjoy the feast. He had already accepted an invitation to it; for was he not of the elect sons of Israel? Standing in its connection, this remark was merely a pious platitude, intended to interrupt Jesus and divert him from his rebukes of their spurious religion. But no man ever moved Jesus aside from the way in which he purposed to go.

The parable of the great supper is the Master's rebuke of this superciliousness. There are multitudes of men, who think that they are already assured of a high place at the supper, who will never enter there.

And the reason why they cannot enter is that they are not detached from worldly interests and material advantages. For the feast of the kingdom is of such a nature that only those whose affections are set on spiritual things can ever truly enjoy it.

All the conditions of the parable are true to the customs of the Oriental feast.

When a gentleman of Jerusalem was about to give a supper he first sent forth his servants some days in advance to invite all his guests and obtain their acceptances. Then when the day of the feast had arrived he sent out his servants a second time to announce that the feast was prepared and, in case of distinguished guests, to escort them to the supper. And, lastly, when the feast was under way, he sent servants to call the poor and afflicted to come in and partake of the remnants of the banquet.

The first invitation had been given and accepted. The day of the feast has come, and the master of the house has sent forth his servants with the ringing, hospitable summons: "Come, for all things are now ready." Of course they will all come, for they have all already agreed to come; and they all enjoy a banquet, with its abundance of good cheer, its geniality and its full flow of sprightly conversation. If they must stay away, they will give no reasons for their absence except an unequivocal necessity.

But the unprecedented happened. The ancient Semitic customs of hospitality were violated. The guests with one consent began to make excuse. One man had bought a piece of ground and wanted to go out and see it. He had doubtless seen it many times before he bought it; but now he would like to go out and stand and look at it and say: "It is mine. I am a landed proprietor." He also had to make some immediate plans for its improvement, which were too interesting to be deferred. His self-congratulation in the possession of his real estate was a greater satisfaction to his soul than his participation in the coming feast. So he said to the servant of his host: "I must really ask to be excused."

The second man had bought five yoke of oxen and must go to prove them. He is not even concerned to put on the face of a good excuse; as though any man would buy five yoke of oxen without first proving them. He publicly despises his host. His delight in seeing five yoke of fine oxen moving steadily across the field is greater than his fondness for social pleasure or his respect for his entertainer.

The last man doubtless thought that he had a good excuse, for the law of Deuteronomy said: "When a man taketh a new wife, he shall not go out in the host, neither shall he be charged with any business: he shall be free at home one year" (24:5). Therefore he said confidently, "I cannot come." According to the Jewish law, which exempted the young husband from military service and public business, this excuse is more intelligible than either of the others. But Christ would here teach that the pleasant dalliance at home is no sufficient excuse for failure to heed the call of the kingdom.

These are not all the excuses; they are samples of many (v. 16). They are the answers of men who contemn their host, violate the sacred laws of hospitality and refuse the obligations of society. And they have refused because they are immersed in the gains and pleasures of this world and thus made indifferent to every higher call.

But the banquet will by no means be lost. If the supercilious devotees of this world will not enter the kingdom, there are other men that will. And the new society will be gathered from the streets and lanes of the city, where the homeless outcasts dwell. Here are the maimed; they will have no newly married wives to keep them at home. There are the blind; they will have no newly purchased fields to go to see. There are the lame; they will have no oxen to tramp after in the furrow. These will come with humility and joy. They had perhaps hoped to get the leavings of the feast, but to take the chief seats, to receive the choicest bounties—this was beyond their furthest expectation.

It was a great banquet. After the hopeless poor from the city streets had been gathered into the ample space there was still room. "Go out into the highways and hedges, and constrain them to come in, that my house may be filled." Beyond the chosen race of Israel lay the wandering tribes of the gentiles. There is a place for them, too, at the Master's feast. Oh, the constraint of the love of Christ!

It is hard for men who have everything they desire in this world to make themselves ready for a world to come. It is easier to become absorbed in present possessions than to hold them in honor simply because they enable us to prepare the better for an entrance into the kingdom.

The proud, and the hard, and the luxurious, who would almost patronize God himself, and congratulate heaven upon the luster that their presence would shed upon its society—these men can have no part in the deep joy of the kingdom. But for those poor ones, who are bowed with the sense of their own failure, and crushed beneath the indifference and scorn of the world, the invitation into the kingdom comes with a glad amazement, and is accepted with exultation. The poor and the suffering are very close to God's heart.

"Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." A true humility ever leads to action; it disposes the soul to respond to the loving call of Jesus.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

March 30, 1913

THE RELIGION OF A BOOK

Topic—Mission work at home and abroad. III. Education. Acts 18:7-11.

The needs of the day demand a method of education that will develop power and personality. The minister of the gospel claims for vital religion a sheer educational power beyond that of the schools. His reasoning is that Christianity floods a soul with new purposes, new ideals, new life. He quotes to strengthen his position an expert from India, who has declared that the revival in the Kassia hills had done more for the intellectual stimulus of the people than all the mission and government schools combined. In this contention the psychologist would support the missionary as against the machine-made pedagogue. It is impulse, purpose, vision that young and old need, before facts or methods. Education is for life and it should be by life. There is profound philosophy in the truth that the gospel has been the greatest educational force in human history.

Christianity has been peculiarly a religion to stimulate thought. It teaches men a "divine discontent."

President Wilson was the first layman to be head of Princeton University. President Hadley is the only lay president in Yale's long history of ministerial executives. Until recent times it has been the practice for most of the leading universities and colleges of North America to be presided over by ministers of the gospel. The usage reveals the general belief that the interests of education are conserved and directed by religion. The planting of home mission colleges has been one of the formative factors in the life of America. The church and the schoolhouse have been the twin landmarks of new communities since the foundation of this western empire.

A fundamental difference between Christianity and the non-Christian faiths—Judaism and Islam excepted—is that this is the religion of a book. To all its converts it gives the Bible. The intellectual cultivation of the people has been a goal. The Scriptures have been made the foundation of character and conduct. The result has followed, as effect follows cause, that the Christian nations have led the world. There is warrant for the bitter plaint of the young Turk, "Christians have all the power in the world."

A thorough knowledge of the English Bible is a real education.

Captain Burton, the famous British traveler, whose knowledge of the Arabic language and life was so complete that he penetrated even to Mecca, spent his last years in translating into English famous Arabic poetry. He looked upon this as his great work. But when he died his wife, after reading his manuscript, threw it into the fire. Arabic poetry is not fit to print. The masterpieces of Moslem literature are so erotic that, translated, they would be denied transmission through the marts of any Christian government. It is a singular fact that the sort of thinking which may be found in Moslem and other non-Christian lands today is quite the same as the state of mind into which the Christian church was born. The apostle Paul's letters give us glimpses of it. Historians have marveled at the sweetness and purity of the lives of the early Christians amid such foulness. Steadfastly the gospel has trained its adherents and the world at large into a state of mind pure and gentle and brotherly.

The international marvel of the decade is the creation of the Chinese republic. What is the explanation? The answer is clear and unanimous—the mission schools. If Christian schools had not been taken to China, that nation would still be a mediæval monarchy, tied hand and foot to the Confucian classics. A world service of first magnitude has been done by the missionaries in transforming old China.

NEW BOOKS

Old Testament Poetry

The Poets of the Old Testament, by Alexander R. Gordon. This book is a substantial addition to our commentary literature. Dr. Gordon is the well-known professor of Old Testament literature in the Presbyterian College in Montreal, and his former book on "The Early Tradition of Genesis" has proved of permanent value. He attempts here to bring home to English readers the results of a vast deal of important work on the poetry of the Old Testament. It constitutes a happy blending of the technical and the popular, and men who mean to give serious attention to Old Testament poetry will find the book a mine of treasure.

Little attention is paid to the history of the Old Testament which has assumed poetic form. There is an interesting chapter on the folk-poetry of Israel which takes up the snatches of song from the historical books. Ecclesiastes also is included because of its proverbial character, and its occasional poetical form. Dr. Gordon dates it about 200 B. C., and finds it strongly impressed with the Greek spirit. While the section on the psalms is suggestive, the introductory chapter on the psalter seems least satisfactory. Dr. Gordon agrees in general to the assignment of the psalms to the middle period, withdrawing a large number from the earlier period. There are only the familiar grounds for his conclusions. Certainly the last verse of the twenty-third psalm does not necessarily imply that the temple was standing and the rest of the psalm is so appropriate to David's life that taking it from that period seems unwarranted, though it is common enough. It is difficult to see why the eighty-fourth psalm requires assignment to the period of the "renovated temple." Why not to the original temple? We believe the tendency should be to push the psalms into earlier dates. We are glad to find Dr. Gordon opposing the extreme view of Kennett, that the whole psalter is Maccabean, agreeing instead to Dr. Briggs's suggestion that the apparent Maccabean influences may be editorial rather than original. The chapter on "The Psalmists' Thoughts of God" is most stimulating. Christian experience will bear out Dr. Gordon in saying that "there is no vital contrast between gospel and psalter."

The section on Job follows very much the familiar critical lines, with not much more satisfactory results. It is interesting to find the Song of Songs treated as a "repertoire of wedding songs, covering the seven days of festivity, and having no other connection but their praise of wedded life." This, of course, does away with the long standing dramatic theory, but seems nearer to the facts. Dr. Gordon locates it in the earlier half of the third century. [George H. Of Public Interest

The Man Farthest Down, by Booker T. Washington. In 1910 the foremost representative of the Ethiopian race in America visited England, Scotland, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Sicily, Poland and Denmark for the express purpose of studying the "man farthest down" in the scale of economic and social life. The result is a book that is altogether notable for its keen observations, deep insight and serene temper. To the commanding personality of the author the work owes much of its intense appeal to popular interest; for Dr. Washington writes himself unegotistically into every page. As to the man farthest down, the author's investigations convinced him that "we are not worse off in America in this respect than other peoples," and he does not believe that "the southern people, white or black, would be willing to exchange their own troubles, such as they are, for those of any nation or group of people in Europe or elsewhere." The most significant statements in the book are to the effect that women suffer more from evil influences of slum life than men, and that the man farthest down in Europe is woman. The relation of the lowly peoples of Europe to agriculture is discussed at length, and the observations made throw a brilliant sidelight upon the eternal land problem. Dr. Washington's traveling companion was his friend Dr. Robert E. Park, who collaborated with him in the authorship of the book. [Doubleday, Page and Company, New York. $1.50 net.

The Government of American Cities, by William Bennett Munro. This work deserves a place besides Bryce's "American Commonwealth." Not since the publication of that great work has there been a more valuable contribution to the literature of American government. To be sure, this volume deals with only one department of the machinery of public affairs, but that is an increasingly important department, one but little understood, and up to the present moment it is certainly the most conspicuous field in American democracy. America will stand or fall with its cities; and they, with their enormous increase in population and the chaos of their government, offer an almost desperate challenge to democracy. Professor Munro, whose chair in Harvard University is that of municipal government, has wrought thoughtfully the underlying principles and practical workings of American municipal life. He shows how from the beginning the incorporated city has been with us. New York had its first city charter in 1686; and there were twenty boroughs or cities incorporated at the time of the revolution. It is noted that the charters were issued by the governors and not by legislatures. The successful outcome of the revolution and the adoption of the new state constitutions brought great changes in the form and spirit of municipal government, and the changes have been continuous down to the present time. No book treating of this subject at the present stage can have any approach to finality. Conditions shift in the very process of writing, but this, if we mistake not, is a monograph of very large value to present discussion, and may even prove of considerable permanent worth. Women and Religion in China

Notable Women of Modern China, by Margaret E. Burton, is one of the inspiring books in modern missionary literature. It tells the story of six Chinese women, three of whom became expert physicians and rendered wide service. They were converts in the Methodist mission and most of them studied for a time in America; but all of them were native Chinese women, who showed in their own lives not only the power of the gospel but the power of the Chinese character as well. One would like to hope that such a book would be read by anyone who raises a question about the missionary movement. One such group of women is sufficient and final argument in behalf of missions. The book is admirably written and well illustrated. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Religion in China, by J. J. M. de Groot. The eight lectures in this volume constitute the 1910-11 series of the American course on the history of religions. The author maintains that the three religions of China—Taoism, Confucianism and Buddhism—are essentially one, in that they all have their roots in what may be call "universism." The natural universe has been from remotest times the inspiration of China's religious thought, and the foundation of its religious beliefs and worship. The way of perfection for man—"Tao"—lies in making his life correspond to the universe of which he is a part. Confucianism is grounded in Taoism, and is in fact an offshoot from it. About the time of Christ Buddhism found its way into China in a universistic form, called Mahayana, and because of its affinity was able to live in company with the other two Taoistic beliefs. The representation of various natural forces by different deities has caused Chinese religion to develop into a complicated polytheism. That the lecturer has made a most careful study of his difficult subject is evidenced on every page of the book, which will afford accurate and varied information to the student of Chinese religion. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

Religious Books

The Psychology of Religious Sects, by Henry C. McComas. This book may fairly be called an investigation into the natural history of denominationalism. Or, to borrow the terms of medical science, a treatise on the cause and cure of sectarianism in religion. The author is a psychologist; but he has given the subject of theology, and especially the department of church history, some careful study. He looks upon the divisions of present-day Christendom as the natural result of temperamental differences in those who constitute the membership of the different denominations. He does not deny the supernatural element in Christianity, nor does he reduce religion to the terms of mere "nerve action." He believes in the divine principle as an actual working reality in the world of man; but as he is carrying on a scientific investigation in the world of outward phenomena, he naturally leaves out of the discussion this side of religious life. If denominational development is the result of factors in the soul life of Christians, it may be controlled indirectly through the modification of those underlying factors. Proceeding from this assumption, the author further shows some practical ways in which it may be so controlled as to eliminate many unnecessary lines of division. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Intellectual Religion, by Thomas Curran Ryan. Mr. Ryan is a member of the Wisconsin bar, but evidently the technicalities of the law have not interfered with his devoting a considerable amount of energy to the more subtle forms of thought presented in the fields of philosophy and religion. Questions of the finite and infinite, of the temporal and eternal, of the persistent and evanescent neither arrest him nor allure him to a hard and fast traditional explanation of the constitution of the universe. Without being a rationalist, he works out from the point of view of reason a systematic exposition and defense of religion. The book is addressed particularly to those who in these latter days have come to entertain doubts as to the validity of cardinal points of all religion. Any open-minded person belonging to this class will here find help in solving his doubts. [Sherman, French and Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

The High Road to Christ, by Richard Roberts. This series of nine addresses, delivered to Mr. Roberts's Crouch Hill congregation, form a clean-cut and satisfying Christian apologetic, presented in language suited to give it a popular appeal. The author's standpoint is that of a moderate progressive. He is open-minded in his approach to the great questions of the Christian religion, and candid in his treatment, seeking to evade no difficulty. On questions of criticism he is fair and sane, and where he touches upon them his reader will find him clear and helpful. It would have been well if miracle and prayer had been treated in separate addresses, instead of in one, that each subject might have had fuller consideration. The book will assist the Christian to give a reason for the hope that is in him. [Cassell and Company, New York. $1 net.

MISSIONARY WORK

Penalized Industry in Africa

Although the missionaries of the Presbyterian Church in West Africa regard the German colony of Kamerun, in which they are at work, as a well governed colony, some criticism has lately arisen in regard to the system by which the government obtains men to do carrier work or to keep up repairs on the government roads and railroads. Ordinarily notice is sent to the "headman" of the given town requiring him to furnish a certain number of men at a specified time. If the men do not present themselves for duty, a squad of soldiers is sent out to arrest the required number. Whether these workers are gathered, however, by one process or the other, it is most usual for the headman, or the sergeant commanding a squad, to pick up the men easiest in reach—that is, those who are at work in plantations near the roads. Idlers who have no property and no responsibilities easily escape to the bush and evade conscription; so it frequently happens that a whole community is swept clear of the only real workers in it, and prosperous plantations in that tropical climate soon are turned into a disorderly tangle of rank weeds.

The missionaries, seeing these results, are planning to make representations on the subject to the colonial authorities, and have no doubt that when the German governor understands the bad effects of the policy he will give orders, as the missionaries suggest, that persons who have planted crops on a certain considerable acreage shall be exempt from forced service on public works. In this way it is calculated that industrious homesteaders will be protected.

Military Faculty Requests Sermon

Rev. C. M. Eames, visiting the village of Fenghsien in China, was surprised to receive a request from the government military school in the town asking permission for a body of the students to attend church. They were, of course, gladly welcomed to reserved seats, and forty of the students attended, with all the members of the faculty save one. The order and attention were perfect. The next day the teachers invited the missionary to attend their school assembled in an old temple, from which the former idols had been pitched into a ditch outside. A teacher who doesn't call himself a Christian at all made a speech in warm commendation of Christianity, and Mr. Eames preached. The invitation was the more remarkable in that only one man in the faculty was a Christian, and there were only four Christians in the whole town. Mr. Eames says: "China is changing even faster than we here on the mission field can realize. Hostility to Christianity seems almost entirely to have disappeared and now witness for Christ is welcomed almost anywhere."

A Bible Class in India's Cotton Fields

Miss Margaret Morrow of Etah, who, while superintending a large boarding and industrial school, uses every opportunity to visit the village Christians within walking distance of that station, writes of one native evangelist:

"Dhandu has made 172 visits to these villages, besides the sixty-eight made with the school girls and myself, altogether, over 240 visits in nearly forty villages. These occasional visits are the only aid many of these poor, ignorant people have in their Christian life. It seems an evidence of real life that they are able to hold out at all with so little shepherding. Dhandu carries with him wherever he goes a Sunday school picture roll on the life of Christ, and is able to tell most of the stories. One day a group of women returning from the cotton fields asked what it was he had under his arm, so there in the field he opened his roll and let them see the pictures, telling them the Bible stories."

This picture shows the Presbyterian missionary force in Porto Rico, gathered for conference at the Polytechnic Institute at San Germon.

Board Notes and Announcements

—The Friday morning meeting at Room 48, Chicago, led by Mrs. Shaw, president, was more than usually prayerful. Among the voices heard were those of Mrs. F. M. Fox, at whose instance the Westminster Guild was organized seven years ago; Miss Forman of India and Mrs. William Allen of Cleveland. The last named hopes to visit Japan and the missionaries there next autumn. Japan was further brought to mind by letters, one from Miss Ward of Tokyo to the guild chapters. She suggests that "good old story books" would be a useful addition to the meager library of the Joshi Gakuin, where some of the schoolgirls read English easily; also that old leaflets with Christmas songs, or recitations and dialogues for anniversaries and a few sets of well preserved old song books, half a dozen alike, and one set of about forty Sunday school or Christian Endeavor songs would be very helpful.

—The annual meeting of Peoria Presbyterial Society, held March 12, besides two addresses from Mrs. Robert M. Ross of Lienchow, had the good report of $2,834 given during the year for foreign and about the same for home missions, the former including $813 in thank offerings and a $600 legacy.

Madagascar Christians Swept to Death in a Church

BY LOUISE SEYMOUR HOUGHTON

NONE WHO are in the least familiar with the devoted type of Christianity which has developed among the natives of Madagascar can be entirely without sympathy with the Christian people of the island in the overwhelming affliction which came upon a group of mountain villages about twenty miles from Diego Suarez in the latter part of last November.

Particulars were slow to reach even the capital of the island, for the tempest which overwhelmed these villages also cut off all telegraphic communication. Over two weeks elapsed before the intelligence reached Tananarivo, and not until the latter part of January were full particulars received by the French Protestant Society of Missions in Paris.

Hurricane Falls on Happy Festival

It was the village of Antetezana which felt the worst of the hurricane. This village, the name of which signifies "the bridge," lies—or rather lay—on a point of land at the confluence of two mountain torrents which came down from the Amber mountains. The valley is narrow and closely shut in by high mountain walls.

On Saturday, Nov. 23, all the Christian people of the region had met in Antetezana to celebrate at once their "feast of ingatherings" and the dedication of the new church which at considerable self-sacrifice they had been building. It was a little church—only 45 by 23 feet in dimensions, built of wood with concrete floor and tile roof, and costing hardly $500, but representing all the love and service of humble, Christian hearts.

Dedication Service Amid Frightful Storm

Two days had been allotted to the joyful festival of dedication. The whole of Sunday had been appropriated to religious services. From all the mountain villages came the Christian people, the members of each church having prepared songs and choruses, which they sang in turn, to the glory of God. Then came a common meal, a true "thanksgiving dinner," of which each person present had a part, before assembling for the afternoon service.

During this latter service the storm came on, with furious wind and driving rain. By 4:30 it had become impossible for anyone to leave the church. Every house in the village was swept away. The two rivers, overflowing their banks, had surrounded the church. By 8 in the evening that devoted company saw death looking them in the face.

God's House Adrift on the Flood

All this time, in spite of the shrieking wind, the pelting rain and the roaring floods, the service had gone on—prayers, hymns and brief addresses following one another without intermission. At 8 o'clock a woman named Ravelonjanahary rose and said:

"It is for us to hold ourselves in readiness to accomplish the Lord's will. Already the ax is laid to the root of the tree—it only remains for the divine Woodsman to lift his arm and give the decisive blow."

She had hardly concluded when a rafter fell from the roof and struck her dead.

By this time the flood, undermining the concrete floor, was carrying the little building away bodily with all who were in it, while huge rocks from the mountain sides were bombarding it in all directions. The congregation began to sing the thirty-ninth hymn of the Malagasy humn book, and it was while this hymn was going up to God that the end came—the building toppled over and went to pieces.

The Entire Congregation Engulfed

A few were able to catch hold of the branches of half submerged trees. The majority were carried away by the torrent. Those who had been caught by the trees held on as long as they could in the frightful hurricane, then dropped off one by one. A Hova named Rabey and his wife swam, hand in hand, nearly four miles, and then were cast upon a point of land exhausted, terribly bruised, but living.

A remarkable rescue, or rather escape, was that of a baby of seven months, who had come to the meeting on his mother's back from the village of Anamakia. The mother was killed, but the next morning, when a rescue party came from the provincial capital, Anasirane, the baby was found safe and sound three miles below the scene of the accident, where he had been caught by a little dike. Of all the living and dead, his little body was the only one without so much as a bruise.

About 150 bodies were recovered and buried of the 300 assembled in the church. Whole families were swept out of existence.

Song of Faith in Hour of Death

The Malagasy hymn 39, sung by the doomed and drowning congregation, may be freely translated thus:

Come, O Spirit, Holy Spirit,
Descend upon us, to show us our road.

For our road is a bad one, and we are lost;
Our spirits are in darkness and our hearts are bad.

O thou Enlightener, descend!
Dissipate the shadows that are in us.

Come, O Comforter! be truly with us;
Bring to our remembrance the words of life.

O Teacher! Come to help us;
Give us to know the truth.

Remain here, within our hearts;
This, O Lord, we ask before all other things.

It was indeed a dark road which those devoted Malagasy were called to traverse. Can we doubt that their prayer was answered, and that the darkness was indeed made light to them in that fearful hour of death?

The Open Hearth

Suggests Dr. Hill for Moderator

Among the names most prominently mentioned in the Northwest and Middle West in connection with the highest honor to be conferred by the next General Assembly is that of Edgar P. Hill, D. D., of Chicago.

We are now attempting some very important adjustments as to our agencies, which will require the largest practical ability of the church. Dr. Hill has already become pretty widely known as superintendent of the Extension Board of Chicago Presbytery. He has been in demand in many parts of our country, especially in the large cities of the Middle West and Northwest, in the matter of making addresses along the line of the important work which, under his superintendency, has been accomplished in Chicago Presbytery; and he has done much, too, in the way of starting off extension organizations in a number of our cities.

I think the whole church will recognize the importance of having such a man follow up the advance made by our former moderators in the matter of adjusting our various agencies under the new methods already adopted. The important thing needed just now is the application of business methods to church affairs, together with an adequate solution of the city, the country and the immigrant problems. Therefore we need a strong, practical hand at the helm.
R. N. ADAMS.

Are Elders Eligible?

The recent references to the election of an elder as moderator of the General Assembly lead the writer to call attention again to the constitutional provision bearing on the eligibility of elders as moderators. He has no desire to question the ability of elders to serve in such offices, or to discuss the desirability of the choice of them, but merely wishes to cite the passages in our standards that bear on this subject.

The compilers of our standards seem to have taken it for granted that the judicatories above the session would not have an idea of such action, since it had been the invariable custom, I suppose, to regard ministers as the proper presiding officers in church gatherings. The provisions in Form of Government, 9:4, concerning the church session, which require that a minister shall preside, except when this would be very inconvenient, are exceptional, since there could be no such emergency in any of the higher judicatories, because the presence of a certain number of ministers is essential to a quorum. In the case of a synod or a General Assembly the moderator is to deliver a sermon (Form of Government 11:5; 12:7), the expression in the last case being "the moderator of the last Assembly," "or—some other minister." This clearly implies that the moderator is a minister. So in chapter 19:3 it is provided that "the moderator of the synod and of the General Assembly . . . shall open the next meeting with a sermon." Rule 43 of the Assembly says: "The moderator of every judicatory above the church session, in finally closing its sessions . . . shall pronounce the apostolic benediction." How can anyone but a minister meet these requirements? Then "the presiding minister" is mentioned in connection with the ordination of a minister in Form of Government 15:13, 14. The provisions in chapter 10:9 in reference to the calling of a special meeting of a presbytery evidently assume that the moderator is a minister, since two other ministers with him constitute a quorum of the presbytery.

It appears, then, that we have at present no constitutional warrant for the election of an elder as the moderator and that such action would be extraconstitutional, if not actually unconstitutional. If it is desirable to change the custom in this respect, it would be well to make amendments to the Form of Government and the rules for judicatories.

Would Not Limit Care to Pastors

I have been much interested in the articles on caring for our old pastors, but why stop there? Why not take in all of the old or disabled members? Let me give you two instances that came under my observation. There was a man about 70 years old, deaf and living all alone, a member of one of our churches. He was badly hurt a year ago and was taken to the hospital, where he was confined for a long time; in fact, he is not really over the injury yet. For the last year neither the pastor nor one of the members of the church has called upon him, and if it had not been for those outside of the church his life indeed would have been most miserable.

Another old man, a member of another denomination, was well to do and as far as I could see a fine Christian gentleman. He lost his wife and all his property. Result, the church let him go to the county home, which was too much for him and he went insane, and from the county home they took him to the state hospital. If the church members had each one paid one-half cent per week it would have kept him in fine shape. I can but think that this Scripture fits this case perfectly: I. Timothy 5:8. If either one of these men had belonged to some secret society they might have been taken care of.

Information on Mormonism

Will you kindly tell me where I may procure the pamphlet by Bishop F. S. Spalding entitled "Joseph Smith, Jr., as a Translator," referred to in an article which appeared in The Continent of Feb. 13?
MISS V. S. N.

[The pamphlet can be secured from Bishop Spalding, 444 East 1st South, Salt Lake City, Utah. A book prepared by ex-Senator Frank J. Cannon is one of the most authoritative publications on Mormonism that we know of. The Chicago Journal also publisned a pamphlet which may be secured singly or in quantities from the publisher of that paper. The Interdenominational Council of Women in New York City has a list of publications on this subject.]

"Joy-Spots" of the Nation

You never saw the word before—well, neither did I—it was born within the hour while I sat meditating upon that "task enormous but opportunity unmeasurable," of which Charles Stelzle tells us in his article in The Continent on "A Modern Church to Meet a Modern Situation." I never saw the word before, but I live in such a place and there are thousands of them scattered throughout the length and breadth of this great nation; they are the absolute hope as well as the joy of this nation and we ought to hear more about them.

The particular "joy spot" in which I have the pleasure of living (Salisbury, Md.) is within thirty miles of Francis Makemie's first meeting house and the congregation which I am privileged to serve is one of the five which he, the father of American Presbyterianism, organized between the years 1683 and 1690. We have a population of 7,000, and 65 per cent of our people live in houses of their own. There is not a single legalized saloon in our midst, there is not a house among us upon which we would dare to write the word disreputable and we have no slums.

In December last we took a religious census of our little city. A hundred church men volunteered for the work and on the day and at the hour appointed ninety-eight of that 100 presented themselves for the task. The work was completed in a little over two hours. And what did the returns show (we took a census of the white population only that day; a census of the colored people is now in progress)? Why, we found that we had a white population of 5,276 and that 4,911 of that number (all but 365, and of these 103 were children under 13 years of age) declared an affiliation with one branch or another of the Christian church. We have 2,287 church members in our town and 2,243 stated that they attend Sabbath school.

On a Monday morning recently, two months after the census had been taken, I called up every minister in our town except the Catholic priest, who is away from home, and asked them to give me the actual number present at their Sabbath schools on the preceding day. No Sabbath school knew that I was intending to ask for this information, not even our own, so that no special effort to have a large attendance was being made. Now how many scholars do you think were present at the sessions of our schools on that particular day? Guess—some of you who study so assiduously into the conditions of and write so learnedly about the "modern church." Guess! Why, 1,660, or more than 74 per cent of the total enrollment.

Consider your country problems. Consider your city problems. That is right. There is plenty in each to give you grief. But why not once in a while consider the small cities and towns of the nation and get a little joy?

"Great Patronage of Miss Ardis"

(Tribute of a Korean Boy in America to His Teacher)

Miss Ardis has been a Bible teacher for three years in the Northwest Collegiate Institute. She is an earnest Christian who puts her hand deep into her pocket and gives especially to poor children. Now she is very interested in a Swedish girl and Korean boy, supporting them while the study. Carl Y. Park is 11 years old and very intelligent in his studies. He has studied in his own language and Chinese for several years in his home in Russia, Siberia. He came here last September to study English one and a half years ago and he has studied in Hastings, Neb., where a number of Korean students are. He came here last September to study with his kinsmen in the Collegiate Institute. As he is very poor, his kinsmen can hardly help him enough. Miss Ardis is helping him. As her mercies came to me and impressed themselves on my mind, so I write a few words for her here.

Churchmen, Masons and the "Shrine"

May I add one more testimony to the high character of free Masonry, not only from a moral viewpoint but from the higher plane of Christian purpose and influence? During one of the great quadrennial conferences of the M. E. Church, held that time in Omaha, my wife and I gave a dinner to eight of the delegates at our home. Our mother, a devout Methodist, had conceived a strong prejudice against Masonry and regretted exceedingly my recent initiation into the order. When I assured her that many ministers and bishops in the church she loved so dearly were Masons she seemed sure I was mistaken. At a venture I inquired and it developed that a bishop, a presiding elder, two ministers and one layman present were Masons, all above the blue lodge. And I may add that, as a means of softening my mother's prejudice, I asked for expressions as to the character and influence of Masonry. The testimony of the church men present was that next to the church they considered Masonry the highest type of organized influence for moral and religious uplifting.

Possibly the one who wrote concerning "Lodges and Churches" had the "shrine" in mind, which, though composed only of Masons of high degree, is in no sense a part of Masonry but a sort of social offshoot, designed and maintained for less restricted fellowship than Masonic lodges can permit within their dignified and exalted order.

Tells the Editor to Edit

We are trying to build up the kingdom in this new country of Idaho. It is not always an easy task and progress is sometimes slow, but I believe we are keeping pace with the material development of the country.

I feel that it is an advantage to both ourselves and others to make known what we are doing. The Continent is an excellent medium of communication with the church at large. That is why I avail myself of the privilege of using its columns.

Do not hesitate, Mr. Editor, to blue pencil freely anything I send you. It is my business to send the news and yours to use just as much of it as you see fit.

Prayer for Liquor Dealers

Should not all Christians unite in praying fervently to our Heavenly Father to pour out his Spirit overwhelmingly upon all who are engaged in the liquor traffic or are profiting by it in any way, that they may see their great wickedness in destroying the bodies and souls of men, that they may be truly converted and work for the Lord instead of fighting against God. Surely "our God is able."

If missionaries, pastors, evangelists and consecrated laymen would pray in public for this, and others would unite with them, "nothing doubting," would not our Father hear us?

Ways of Working

The relation between children and the church is always important and sometimes vexing. Here are successful plans from four churches. They may be adapted to the particular need in your church.

Has Morning Worship Club

First church, Virden, Ill., is solving the problem of getting the Sunday school pupils to remain for church. The pastor, Rev. J. G. Reynolds, knows the children and they know him. There is only five minutes between the close of Sunday school and opening of church, and the service is just an hour long. It has been found that a half hour between services invites children to go home and a long formal service is wearisome.

The pastor and his wife have organized the Morning Worship Club. The names are enrolled and attendance recorded by captains appointed by the children. Those present ten Sundays in a quarter are given a dinner by the women of the church. The result has been that most of the children stay to church and the parents from non-Christian homes are coming with their children. The club has originated a yell for itself.

Prizes to High School Pupils

The men's Bible class union of Fort Morgan, Colo., this year offered to the students of the high school a prize of a picture, a study from the twenty-third psalm, to be won for the school by the class having the highest average of attendance upon the different Bible schools of the city for the school year. This has emphasized the fact that for education to be complete it must include religious instruction. It created a healthy rivalry between the different classes and has caused them to bring pressure upon their own class members to attend the Bible school of some church. It has also shown to the students that the Christian men of the community have a deep and abiding interest in the life and welfare of the school. The school authorities have cooperated heartily, a record of attendance being kept by the superintendent of schools, and all feel that this plan has proved to be a distinct success.

Keep Text of Sermon

In First church, Clyde, N. Y., a league for church attendance, organized by the pastor, Rev. Warren J. Johnson, five months ago, includes almost every member of the junior and intermediate departments of Sunday school. Each member is given, annually, a textbook, and notes the text of the sermon and record of attendance, indorsed by the teacher. The plan has stimulated interest in the services of the church and several members have not failed of attendance a single Sunday. Each member wears a blue button inscribed with L. C. A. in white monogram.

Special Seats for Children

First church, Auburn, N. Y., has set aside one of the galleries for the special use of children and all winter has been making a special campaign for the children of the church. The pastor, Rev. C. G. Richards, is assisted by O. C. Ruley, superintendent of the Sunday school, in addition to several members of the church who are deeply interested. Ushers are distributed through the gallery and confusion is avoided. A three minute message to children precedes the regular sermon. At a recent service 175 children were present.

Preparing for Assembly

The executive committee of Atlanta citizens which will have charge of the entertainment of the commissioners to the various Assemblies in May has opened headquarters in 513 Empire building, with Rev. J. A. Moore, pastor of Harris Street church, in charge. Meetings of the various committees will be held at headquarters and the organization in charge of local affairs is now complete. Announcement has been made that all of the railways have granted a flat rate of 1½ cents a mile to Atlanta and the same returning.

Progress in Vacancy and Supply

Indications That Nearly 900 More Pastors Are Needed to Carry On the Work of the Church —What Reports from Presbyteries Show.

The permanent committee on vacancy and supply entered upon its work about Dec. 1. In order to pave the way for future efficiency constant effort has been put forth to secure and organize for practical use the facts in regard to the work of every presbytery so far as these are related to the problem of vacancy and supply.

At present we have 296 presbyteries. Reports of some kind have been received from nearly all. We have selected 234 presbyteries in a general way similar in makeup, and from which full and carefully prepared reports have been received. Our first tabulation of results has dealt only with fields furnishing a financial support sufficient to give reasonable promise of being able to secure pastors as the men may be available.

Of these 234 presbyteries only twenty-two, or less than 10 per cent, report all fields supplied. Nine additional presbyteries, while furnishing lists of vacancies, do not indicate plans for grouping such as would seem to make possible a support adequate to secure and maintain pastors.

A careful examination of these reports reveals the fact that these 234 presbyteries in order to properly care for the work of the fields able to support ministers actually need a total of 706 pastors in addition to those already serving within their bounds. This does not mean that only 706 churches in these presbyteries are vacant. While many of these vacancies, of course, represent only a single church, yet it is equally true that a considerable number are double fields and a few have three or more preaching points under the care of a single minister. These combinations have been carefully noted, and after all of them have been properly classified it has been found that the present need in 234 presbyteries is a total of 706 pastors, or an average of three additional pastors to the presbytery.

The conclusion is therefore quite evident that, unless revised and more complete reports from the remaining presbyteries shall differ from these in a very remarkable degree, the church needs upwards of 900 additional pastors in order to properly man and carry on its regular work.

As already stated, in this first tabulation of reports we have purposely omitted the consideration of a very long list of small, and in some cases scattered, churches seemingly unable under present conditions to maintain regular pastors. These, if needed in their communities, present to each presbytery a problem of grouping or arranging in some manner whereby, in a limited measure at least, each shall enjoy the regular service of a minister. Whether this can be done effectively can only be wisely judged by those in charge of the work in the various presbyteries.

From the long list of such fields furnished by many of the presbyteries it does not seem too much to state that could these fields be grouped so that even several of them might share in the services of a single pastor we would in that case require at least an additional hundred men. If the discussion of these small and scattered fields seems to anyone to be unimportant, let it be remembered that there are branches of the church here in America that not only aim to but actually do provide regular pastoral service in some limited degree at least for practically every church upon their rolls regardless of the size of the church.

From all of this it seems quite evident that when, as a church, we undertake to actually care for and regularly minister to all of our fields we will need close to 1,000 pastors in addition to the force of men already serving.

Does the Presbyterian Church U. S. A. at the present time have a supply of available men equal to its need? This question will be discussed later. WALTER H. HOUSTON,
Corresponding Secretary Permanent Committee of Vacancy and Supply.

Putting New Heart in the Ministry

DO you wonder, sometimes, why the minister's enthusiasm seems to be spent? He lives in fair comfort and occupies a prominent and respected position in the community. Besides and above all this, he is the ambassador of Jesus Christ. Ought not this alone to keep him free from care and full of power?

UNFORTUNATELY, as the old colored preacher is reported to have said, "You can't preach here and board in heaven." The minister cannot help but think of the days of his age and disability, or of the days of the dependence of his loved ones. He knows that it is absolutely impossible for him to save enough out of his modest salary to make full provision for those dreaded days.

IF the church will endow Ministerial Relief and Sustentation it will put new heart in the ministry and will release untold spiritual energy that is now being sapped up by harassing care.

Does the church want a gospel ministry with new heart?

Does she deserve such a ministry?

Can she meet the pressing problems of today without such a ministry?

Mamma sat down beside Harold on the bed, with Susie on the other side, and they began to look at the book. "Why, it must be from Benjy and Betty," said Harold when he saw their pictures on the front page. Then they opened the book and found comic pictures to make them laugh, and there were beautiful pictures, serious pictures, and also some of all kinds of pictures. The page that Harold and Susie liked best was the one that had kodak pictures of Benjy and Betty and little Margery in their pony cart.

Benjy's idea was very good, for it had helped to make a happy Easter for their little cousins.

CORNELIA MARJORIE HARTSHORNE (age 9).
Center Point, Texas.

"OH, ISN'T that the mos' bestes' plan that ever was!" cried Betty, jumping up and down. Mother said that they would get everything ready and next rainy, sleety Saturday they would begin on Benjy's plan. Benjy was sent to the drug store for bottles of paste. Betty went to the dry goods shop for pink and blue paper cambric. For they were to make picture scrapbooks and take them to the little sick children at the hospital on Easter.

Benjy and Betty and all their playmates, who were to come to the "valentine bee," as Betty called it, waited impatiently for every Saturday, till at last a rainy one came.

The children were to come to Bradfords' immediately after noon lunch. Alas! many were the lunches left half finished while the children hustled into their coats, caps and boots.

What a merry crowd hurried through the slushy streets to Bradfords'.

They all rushed into the Fun Room. There was a pile of pink and blue cambric books, and bottles of paste. Each dropped his valentines into the pile. Then what a busy time they had! Children on the floor and children in the chairs, all busy cutting, pasting and talking. When mother peeped in to call them to supper what a happy, busy crowd of little people she saw!

On Easter Sunday, after church and dinner were over, Benjy and Betty's Sunday school teacher came to Bradfords'. Her surrey and Bradfords' held all the children by tight squeezing, and took them to the children's hospital.

Oh, how happy the strong children were when they each handed a book to a sick child! And oh, how many bright, smiling little faces and warm, brightened little hearts they left!

Everyone agreed with Betty that Benjy's Easter plan was "the mos' bestes' plan that ever was."

DEAR YOUNG AMERICA: Some of you who had very nice stories indeed are going to wonder why they are not among the prize winners. The reason is very quickly told—the stories were too long. "Four hundred words" does not mean 500, nor 600, nor even 450. It means 400, and no more.

Another thing. A few of the stories, though interesting, were quite impossible. This is especially true of those written by two of our boys. They will remember this next time and put into their stories only things that might really have happened to Benjy and Betty.

Some stories were carelessly written. That counts, too, you know.

And now for "the last, the best of all the game." More boys and girls wrote than have written in any previous contest; and the stories were so good that it has been hard to choose the prize winners. The editor wishes to say a hearty "Thank you" to you all.

Watch for another contest soon. Perhaps you'll win next time.

Andrew and Philip Anniversary

John Wanamaker is chairman of the committee of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip which has in charge arrangements for celebration of the quarter century anniversary of the brotherhood, which is May 4. There will be a celebration at Reading, Pa., May 5, in Second Reformed church, where the brotherhood had its birth. There will be special meetings in Philadelphia May 6.

HOT BISCUIT,

Dr. Thompson's Reply to Dr. Weaver

To the Editor: The attention of the Board of Home Missions has been called to a charge made by Joseph L. Weaver, D. D., of Colorado, and published in various secular newspapers. This charge had previously been published in certain religious papers, to which no attention was paid by the board, it believing that the absurdity of the charge would be its sufficient answer in the minds of people familiar with church organization. Now that the daily papers have given it currency the board desires to enter an emphatic denial.

The charge is that of extravagant administration. If the figures quoted had any truth in them they would call not for investigation but for a lunacy commission. That Christian men in their senses would expend 61 per cent on administration, as alleged, is so palpably ridiculous that the charge is as grotesque as it is malicious. And the twenty-six members of the board are both sane and Christian.

The way in which Dr. Weaver supports his charge is by counting field work as administration. Thus of the $13,325 charged to social service, nearly all is for actual work done in and for the field of social service. The $6,468 charged to the immigration department is for immigrant work pure and simple, and on an economical basis. The same is true of the Indian department and department of church and country life. Of the $17,076 used by the latter the salaries of two stenographers are all that could be properly counted administration. The $11,757 charged to Labor temple is absolutely all mission work.

The maximum of absurdity is reached when field work and field secretaries are charged as $30,117 of administrative expense, pastor-evangelists as $85,982 and synodical missionaries and evangelists as $21,113. No man knows better than he who makes this charge that pastor-evangelists are missionaries to vacant charges or engaged in doing evangelistic work in the presbyteries, and the judgment of the board and the General Assembly for many years has approved this most economical and evangelistic way of supplying smaller churches.

Concerning the item of "specials"—$12,449—it is sufficient to say that that money represents gifts for various special objects designated by the givers and passed through the treasury of the board, but not used in its service. This fact is not only stated in the treasurer's report but had been made clear to Dr. Weaver before he made his complaint to the Executive Commission.

The only item remaining is $51,649, charged to office expenses. As on this expense the board is administering over a million dollars annually it is apparent that the 61 per cent charged by Dr. Weaver drops down to about 5 per cent.

On the board are some of the most conservative business men of the city. On the finance committee are eminent financiers. Their careful scrutiny month by month indorses the statement that the Board of Home Missions is as economically managed as efficiency will permit, and much more economically than many other large corporations.

If anyone should inquire why anyone should desire to promulgate such a charge the board is obliged to say:

1. That a year ago the board declined to grant aid from its treasury, on a request indorsed by Dr. Weaver, to support a Presbyterian church in a community of 565 inhabitants, already occupied by three denominations, two of which presented urgent protest to the entrance of another denomination. Brought by Dr. Weaver to the attention of the Presbyterian General Assembly last May, the matter was referred to a committee which sustained the refusal to grant Presbyterian home mission money for the field.

2. That, notwithstanding the Assembly's unanimous decision, the request for this aid was repeatedly renewed during the recent months, accompanied by the threat from Dr. Weaver that if the board declined to do as he wished he would see that its work was discredited and its officers humiliated by the General Assembly next May.

CHARLES L. THOMPSON, Secretary.

The men of South Chicago church recently had Frank V. Dudley, an artist, speak at a meeting. He painted a picture, which was later sold at auction. It was a "different" entertainment, which appealed to the men.

Advertise Detroit Churches

At a banquet March 10 under the auspices of the church extension committee a committee was appointed to decide on the most efficient way in which to advertise local Presbyterian churches and their work. Another committee will try to provide some effective way by which the great army of newcomers to Detroit may be introduced to a church home in the city.

The case against Dr. Joseph A. Vance, pastor of First church of Detroit, in which a saloonkeeper accused him of libel, ended in complete vindication of Dr. Vance at the hands of a jury.

Rev. Charles E. Huffer, pastor of Albion church, has been giving a series of sermons on the life of Christ, illustrated with stereopticon.

Willard K. Spencer, D. D., who recently offered his resignation as pastor of Ionia church, has reconsidered and will remain with the church.

Northville church has been rebuilding and incurred a debt of about $5,000, but at the rededication services March 9 Dr. William T. Jaquess, a former pastor, preached morning and evening and the entire indebtedness was lifted. The new pastor, Rev. J. Earl Webber, was installed March 13.

Illinois

Marengo church is rejoicing over the liquidation of a debt of $2,800, most of which was left from the building of the manse some years since. The church is in a prosperóus condition.

Under the direction of Dr. Warren H. Wilson a country life institute was recently held in Broadway church, Rock Island. Among the speakers were Professor Benjamin H. Hibbard of the University of Wisconsin, Rev. Richmond A. Smith, Rev. M. B. McNutt and Dr. J. R. McGlade of Princeton, Ill.

Since Rev. Elisha Safford took up the work of Westminster church at Decatur in July the site for a new church has been purchased, while cash and subscriptions to the amount of $8,000, in addition to the present property, valued at $5,000, have been secured, with the expectation of erecting a $50,000 structure near the university.

Rev. Marion Humphreys, who has recently offered his resignation as pastor of Central church, Rock Island, is being assisted in a series of special meetings by Rev. J. C. Redding of Atchison, Kan. Mr. Humphreys expects that this series of meetings will close a pastorate of eight years in this church. Last fall the seventy-fifth anniversary of the church was celebrated in the new church, which was dedicated March 3, 1912.

New Jersey

The older boys of the Forest Hill church, Rev. Frederick W. Lewis pastor, conducted a service in the church Sunday afternoon, March 9. There were about 300 present. During the following week the boys reestablished their troop of Boy Scouts and formed a young men's club.

Rev. John E. Williams, vice-president of the University of Nanking, China, spoke March 11 at the fifth meeting of the mission study class at Drew Seminary, Madison. Mr. Williams has raised $400,000 for his university and he expects soon to return to China. He has been home over a year.

Thomas J. Thompson this month completed twenty-one years as superintendent of the East Newark mission of North Reformed church, Newark. At a social gathering he was presented with a diamond ring from the other officers and the teachers. A box containing silver spoons was presented to Mrs. Thompson.

A successful China campaign was recently carried out in Morris and Orange Presbytery, where twenty-two churches had special addresses. Arrangements were made under the direction of the chairman of the foreign mission committee, Rev. Minot C. Morgan of Summit. Among the speakers were Professor John E. Williams, Dr. W. M. Hayes, Dr. W. W. White, Dr. C. K. Roys and Rev. E. L. Johnson.

The new chapel of New Providence church, Rev. Reid S. Dickson pastor, was dedicated March 6. Dr. John F. Patterson, Central church, Orange, made the principal address. A community clubroom, with reading facilities and pool tables, is contributed by the church for the benefit of the young men of the neighborhood.

Rev. Benjamin J. Morgan, a retired Presbyterian minister, died at his home in Washington March 8 after two weeks' illness. Burial was in Washington cemetery March 11. Mr. Morgan was 44 years old. He was the son of Rev. William E. Morgan, a Welsh minister, and was educated at New Windsor College and Auburn Seminary.

The dedication of the manse of First church, Caldwell, by the Grover Cleveland Birthplace Memorial Association took place Sunday, March 16, in the church where Cleveland's father was pastor. The civic dedication was held at the home where Cleveland was born March 18. The association recently bought the parsonage and converted it into a public memorial headquarters.

Iowa

Maxwell church, Rev. A. P. Walton pastor, has decided to build a new brick edifice. The Sunday school and the evening congregation are taxing the capacity of the present church.

A large number of graduates of the pastor's catechumen class at Cherokee united with the church March 2. Rev. James W. Bean has been rather successful in reaching the young people of the Sunday school.

A three weeks' union meeting was conducted recently at West Liberty by the pastors of the Presbyterian and Methodist churches, with good results. The church has introduced the budget plan with great success.

North Dakota

The church at Park River was recently damaged $2,000 by fire.

Rev. O. B. Peters of Wesley, Iowa, began work as supply for the Fullerton-Merricourt field Jan. 1.

Rev. M. B. McNutt spent a few days in the Presbytery of Oakes—Feb. 24 to 28. His addresses were received with enthusiasm.

Streeter church, which has been vacant a year, at a recent meeting raised $1,300, which will be applied at once to the building of a new church.

Pennsylvania

Rev. H. W. Bloch of Fox Chase addressed the interdenominational women's missionary rally in Pottsdam March 1 on "The Mormon Menace." Mr. Bloch was formerly a missionary in Utah.

The celebration of the eightieth anniversary of the organization of First church, Williamsport, was held recently. A souvenir booklet showing the work of the church and a map of the field of First church was distributed at one of the special services. Rev. William C. Hogg is the present pastor. The celebration also served to mark the eighth anniversary of his pastorate there.

Delaware

The services in Olivet church of Wilmington Feb. 16 were of special interest as marking the forty-fifth anniversary of the church and the beginning of the eighth year of the present pastorate. Since Rev. John C. Lane took charge of the work in February, 1906, extensive improvements have been made to the Central Laymen in Anniversary Banquet

More than 300 men assembled in the banquet hall of the Auditorium hotel, Chicago, on the evening of March 11 to observe the third anniversary of the organization of the Laymen's Missionary Movement and to hear reports of progress in the central section of the country. Statements made by Field Secretary F. J. Michel, Judge McKenzie Cleland of the U. P. Church and W. R. Stirling of the Episcopal Church testified to large increases in gifts to missions following upon the campaigns conducted by the movement. The principal addresses of the evening were delivered by George Innes, Philadelphia, and J. Campbell White. Samuel L. Capen, LL. D., of Boston, chairman of the general council of the Laymen's Movement, was the guest of honor and spoke briefly but inspiringly.

IN A SHADOW

Inveterate Tea Drinker Feared Paralysis

Steady use of either tea or coffee often produces alarming symptoms, as the poison (caffeine) contained in these beverages acts with more potency in some persons than in others.

"I was never a coffee drinker," writes an Illinois woman, "but a tea drinker. I was very nervous, had frequent spells of sick headache and heart trouble, and was subject at times to severe attacks of bilious colic.

"No end of sleepless nights—would have spells at night when my right side would get numb and tingle like a thousand needles were pricking my flesh. At times I could hardly put my tongue out of my mouth and my right eye and ear were affected.

"The doctors told me I was liable to become paralyzed at any time, so I was in constant dread. I took no end of medicine—all to no good.

"The doctors told me to quit using tea, but I thought I could not live without it—that it was my only stay. I had been a tea drinker for twenty-five years; was under the doctor's care for fifteen.

"About six months ago I finally quit tea and commenced to drink Postum.

"I have never had one spell of sick headache since and only one light attack of bilious colic. Have quit having those numb spells at night, sleep well and my heart is getting stronger all the time." Name given upon request.

Postum now comes in concentrated, powder form, called Instant Postum. It is prepared by stirring a level teaspoonful in a cup of hot water, adding sugar to taste and enough cream to bring the color to golden brown.

Instant Postum is convenient; there's no waste; and the flavor is always uniform. Sold by grocers everywhere.

Use Fifty Autos in Calling

Members of New Club for Men Go to Homes After Other Men—Discourtesy to Chaplain of State Senate.

INDIANAPOLIS—The recently organized men's club of Tabernacle church adopted a practical idea in deciding to call on all men of the congregation not connected with the club. Fifty automobiles enabled the members to see the men in their homes Sunday afternoon.

The "largest women's Bible class in the states"—that of Ansel Matthews of Memorial church—held a "home coming" banquet at the Y. W. C. A. recently, which was largely attended. The class enrolls 185 members and is an important benevolent and missionary adjunct to the church.

Before the close of the legislature our commonwealth was surprised by an unusual incident in connection with the opening prayer in the senate, when the petition of Rev. J. R. Henry of the Baptist Church was interrupted by the fall of the gavel of Lieutenant Governor O'Neill. He said there had been an "insult" to the senate. His special objection was to the hope "that the partnership between state and criminals be dissolved," which he characterized as "a political speech." The local temperance organ, The Phalanx, however, has reproduced by way of comparison the words of Father James A. Coulter of the Catholic Church, to which sect the lieutenant governor belongs. It contained thanks for "the success of the Democratic party . . '. the election of the lieutenant governor," and was allowed to proceed to a dignified conclusion.

BOVEE FURNACES

At Manufacturers' Prices

THE BOVEE FURNACE HAS DOUBLE THE HEATING CAPACITY OF OTHER FURNACES FOR AMOUNT OF FUEL CONSUMED. They are made very heavy, of the best of material.

Measure the fire pots and combustion chamber and then note the long travel of heat through the compound radiator before reaching the chimney. Compare these measurements with those of all other first-class furnaces, and you will see WHY the Bovee Furnaces require so little fuel and last longer.

Send plans for our special winter prices. We save you about one-half on the price of a first-class heating plant.

pastor, spoke on "The Sabbath and the Sanctuary."

The brotherhood of Tyler Place church Friday night, March 7, listened to addresses by Dr. J. T. Henderson of Chicago and B. H. Charles, a local attorney. Mr. Charles, who is a son of a well known minister in this city, spoke on "What a College Education Means to a Boy."

Tuesday afternoon, March 11, the concluding address in the Lenten series on social problems was given in First church. Dr. George B. Mangold, director of the St. Louis School of Social Economy, spoke on "The Needs of Children in St. Louis." The lecture course was arranged by the women's societies of First church.

Dr. William Hiram Foulkes of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation addressed presbytery Monday morning, March 10. He preached for Dr. Niccolls in Second church Sunday morning and for Dr. Gregg in Washington and Compton Avenue church in the evening. E. W. McCluskey.

Wine to Be Banished at Capital

"White Ribbon" Administration Is Ushered In—Saloons in District Are to Be Reduced and Restricted by New Law.

WASHINGTON—The edict has gone forth that the Wilson-Marshall administration shall be a "white ribbon" affair, with no wines or liquors served at any entertainment, according to published reports. It is also stated that the Secretary of State and Mrs. Bryan, and nearly the entire cabinet, will observe the same rule in all social affairs. This is one of the most striking social changes under the new administration.

Almost in the closing minutes of the Congress just ended better temperance legislation for Washington was passed. This bill was "in committee" of the house almost nine months, with the evident intention of smothering it there. Finally, it came to the house a second time as a "rider" to a senate measure, thus forcing action. The house majority in favor of such legislation was known to be a large one, and it only required some way of bringing the bill on the floor for action. The new law is a long step forward for the national capital. Within eighteen months the number of saloons must be reduced to not more than 300. No saloon shall be maintained within 400 feet of a school or church now existing. There shall be no saloons in the residential sections of the city. No liquors are to be sold on Sundays or inauguration day. Barroom license will be $1,500 after Nov. 1, 1914.

A mammoth audience of men, taxing the capacity of the New National theater, listened to Dr. J. A. Macdonald recently, who spoke under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. This famous preacher-editor of Toronto was introduced by Secretary Bryan, who showed clearly his intention of being known as a Christian throughout his term of office. He said: "There is another reason why I am glad to make this my first appearance since the acceptance of the portfolio of state. It is because this is a religious occasion. And I know of no foundation upon which a moral code can be built except religion. Religion is defined as the relation that man fixes between himself and his God. So I know of no foundation upon which remaining international peace can be built except that spirit of brotherhood which the Founder of our religion taught us."

Moderator Mark A. Matthews spoke three times Sunday, March 2. In the morning he preached in Metropolitan church, Rev. Paul R. Hickok pastor. In the afternoon he spoke to the great vespers audience that gathers in the Church of the Covenant, Dr. Charles Wood pastor. In the evening he spoke from the pulpit of historic New York Avenue church, of which Dr. Wallace Radcliffe, a former moderator and now member of the Executive Commission, is pastor.

The brotherhood of Metropolitan church held its fifth annual banquet recently, with over 100 men at the tables. The speakers were E. B. Stillman of Iowa, F. B. Willis, representative from Ohio, and Charles Wood, D. D., of Washington.

Rev. T. E. Davis, pastor of Westminster-Church Memorial church, spent most of February among the southern pines in a much needed midwinter vacation.

Cleveland Churches Lose Elders

Two Prominent Laymen Die—James A. Robinson of Case Avenue Church and Reuben F. Smith of Old Stone Church.

CLEVELAND—Two very prominent laymen in Cleveland Presbytery have passed away—Elder James A. Robinson, in what seemed to be the very prime of life, and Elder Reuben F. Smith, who had reached the age of 83. Elder Robinson was the son of John Robinson, D. D., LL. D., for many years pastor of Ashland church, and one of the founders of Wooster University. The son came in early life to this city, where he entered the service of the William Bingham Company and rose to partnership. More recently he became identified with the Burrows Brothers Company, the leading book concern of Cleveland, but at 61 years of age he has suddenly been called away. For many years he was a faithful elder in Cass Avenue church and served as treasurer of the home missions and church extension committees of presbytery. At its last annual meeting Mr. Robinson was elevated to the presidency of the Presbyterian Union, and was planning vigorous work for the current year. Funeral services were conducted by Dr. J. D. Williamson, moderator of presbytery.

James A. Robinson

The day that Mr. Robinson was buried Elder Reuben F. Smith, senior elder in Old Stone church, passed away. Throughout his long life there has been the most devoted service to the Presbyterian Church, not only to Old Stone church, of which he was such a valued member, but to presbytery, synod and General Assembly. In the last court of the church he had served frequently. Mr. Smith was born at Windham, Conn., but came to this city when 10 years of age, and until 1855 was connected with commercial houses. The following year he became paymaster of the Cleveland and Pittsburg railway and six years later was auditor and vice-president. When the road, in 1871, became a leased part of the Pennsylvania Railway Company Mr. Smith was commissioned to organize the voluntary relief department west of Pittsburg, and successfully conducted that work for

Memorial by Bible School Pupils

New School Started by Those Who Have Been Taught by W. D. Barbour – Italian Church Is Dedicated.

NEW YORK—Christ church, Rev. Theodore F. Savage pastor, has rented quarters in 11th avenue and organized a new Sunday school, to be known as the Barbour Sunday school, after William D. Barbour, who recently completed fifty years as a teacher in Christ church Sunday school. All the teachers are to be former pupils of Mr. Barbour and all the expenses of the school are being borne by those he has trained in the last half century.

Rev. George W. Meury has completed ten years as minister of Knox Memorial chapel in West 48th street, a mission of Collegiate Reformed church.

Another Missionary to China

Central church, Dr. Wilton Merle-Smith pastor, has secured as a new missionary for its station at Hwaiyuen, China, Frank Sergeant Niles, at present supply at Park chapel, Newark. Mr. Niles graduates in May from Princeton Theological Seminary. He will be ordained at Newark chapel soon and leave for the Orient in October. He comes from a long line of clergymen and missionaries. His father is Rev. William Henry Niles of New Berlin, N. Y., who was long a home missionary in Texas. An uncle, Rev. John S. Niles, is pastor at Trumansburg, N. Y. An aunt is the famous Dr. Mary W. Niles, who is at the head of three schools for the blind in Canton, China, and is also a member of the faculty of the Woman's Medical College in Canton.

The Church of the Ascension, the second Presbyterian church for Italians in New York, was dedicated Palm Sunday.

First Union church, which for a long time it has been thought might better be sold because of debt and small attendance, is picking up considerably under Rev. Charles W. Welch. The attendance at midweek prayer service has risen to eighty and 106 members have joined in a year.

Frederick Maier of the senior class in Princeton Theological Seminary has been called as assistant to Dr. David G. Wylie at Scotch church. If he accepts he will have full charge from early in June until fall, as Dr. Wylie is going to Aberdeen, Scotland, to the meeting of the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance. Dr. Wylie will preach the sermon to the graduating class of Dubuque College and Seminary April 30.

Dr. Cornelius M. Steffens, president of Dubuque German College and Seminary, has been spending ten days in New York in the interest of his $500,000 endowment campaign, of which he has secured $300,000. He received some generous gifts from individuals. He has 174 students, of whom more than 150 will become ministers.

Dr. Jowett Slightly Ill

Dr. John Henry Jowett has been ill for a short time. He was unable to speak at the devotional meeting of New York Presbytery in Fourth church March 10. It was explained that he had a cold and a slight return of neuritis, from which he suffered last spring. Dr. Jowett has denied a rumor that he was to leave Fifth Avenue church to accept a call to Edinburgh.

Dr. G. Campbell Morgan of London addressed a great mass meeting in Carnegie hall the evening of March 18, which inaugurated the new season of the tent, open-air and shop campaign of the evangelistic committee of New York City. Other speakers were Dr. William P. Merrill of Brick church and Dr. Arthur J. Smith, superintendent of the committee.

Miss Anna E. Wing Dies After Long Service in Third Church – Women Talk of Missions – Prizes for Baths.

Anna E. Wing

CHICAGO—Miss Anna E. Wing, for thirty-nine years leader of Bible class D of Third church, died March 12 and was buried Sunday. In February, 1874, a class of five boys was put in charge of Miss Wing in Campbell Park Sunday school, then a part of Third church. Five years later it was transferred to the home school and in 1885 was given the name it still bears. Early in its career it elected a president and secretary, and so far as known was the first class thus to be organized. This practice is now almost universal. In 1896 the class was held in the auditorium of the church and soon the attendance increased to 215. In 1904 the alumni association was formed. This has 1,300 members in all parts of the world, many on the foreign mission field. The anniversary of the class Feb. 11 was attended by many men. The class conducted services in the Presbyterian hospital for sixteen years before a chaplain was appointed and has averaged 100 members all the years.

Dr. P. B. Fitzwater has been added to the faculty of Moody institute in the Bible course under Dr. William Evans. Miss Hannah May Thomas of the University of Nebraska has also joined the corps as instructor in English.

Dr. George B. Safford, assistant secretary of the Church Extension Board, is chairman of the board of managers of the new Chinese Evangelical church of Chicago recently organized for the Chinese of the city by the five denominations joining in the Cooperative Council of City Missions.

Directors of the thirty-eight social centers and mission stations under the extension board met Monday afternoon in Assembly hall for conference with Dr. Hill and other members of the board and to get acquainted with each other.

John Nelson Mills, D. D., of Evanston, who has recently returned from a two and a half years' tour of the world, has been spending the winter in the East in the interest of the China campaign, addressing mainly college and theological students. Among the institutions where he has spoken are Yale Divinity School, Columbia University, Princeton Theological Seminary, Union Seminary of New York and Richmond, Va.; the University of South Carolina and the Columbia (S. C.) Theological Seminary.

Women Hear Year's Report

The thirty-seventh annual meeting of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of Chicago Presbytery convened in First church March 13, the president, Mrs. Edgar P. Hill, presiding. The morning session was devoted to business, Mrs. A. S. Baldwin giving the Bible message and prayer, and Mrs. A. K. Steele a cordial welcome; Mrs. C. Albert Mead read the minutes. The record of the year was given by Mrs. William Q. Glass, Mrs. O. R. Williamson and Mrs. R. C. Taylor. The report of the committee on nominations, read by Mrs. L. Goodman, was accepted unanimously. Mrs. Coulter made a plea for gifts and workers for China. Mrs. Stevenson announced the program for the summer school of missions at Winona Lake, June 19-27. At the afternoon session many interesting suggestions were given at the roll call of churches in response to the question, "What has been most helpful in your society this year?" The speakers of the missionary hour were Messrs. Lair and Gauss and Mrs. R. M. Rose of China. Dr. W. C. Covert, Mrs. A. J. Montgomery of Oak Park, Mrs A. T. Schoolfield and Miss L. Cozzins also took part during the day.

A number of local churches are holding special services this week. Evanston First church will close a series with communion Friday evening. The Easter service will be largely of song. Oak Park First had a number of the more prominent men of presbytery as preachers during the week. Buena Memorial church, Rev. Henry Hepburn pastor, was another church with special services during this week. Second church will have twenty-one meetings during the week, Dr. Shaw preaching. In addition to evening services there are daily meetings at 9 a. m. and at noon.

Presbytery Will Ask Churches to Support Local Work – Fortieth Anniversary of Bethlehem Church Occurs Soon.

PHILADELPHIA—Philadelphia North Presbytery held its March meeting in Central church, Norristown. Rev. H. B. McCrone was elected moderator. The overtures proposing the union of churches of different denominations into one organization were answered in the negative. The call for missionary work among foreigners so extensively and successfully carried on in other presbyteries of synod is coming to be strongly felt in this presbytery also. The need of larger funds for the work than can be raised independently of the regular home mission offerings has led this presbytery to resolve to follow the example of other presbyteries and request churches to send all their home mission offerings to a presbyterial treasury, from whence they may be distributed according to the needs of the work in presbytery, synod and the field at large. Such action has the approval of the Board of Home Missions and it is felt will add greatly to the efficiency of the work.

John Wanamaker has been appointed to the city's board of public school education.

Dr. Eckels Is Gaining

Dr. J. Mervin Eckels, pastor of Arch Street church, has been for some weeks at Atlantic City and will remain there for an indefinite period. He reports himself as "gaining strength." The church is in charge of the assistant pastor, Dr. J. S. Roddy.

Bethlehem church, Dr. J. R. Davies pastor, will celebrate its fortieth anniversary communion April 6. The week preceding Secretary Mahy of the evangelistic committee will hold special services and for the week following plans are being arranged for a memorable celebration of the anniversary of church and Sunday school.

Market Square church of Germantown rejoices in the acceptance by Rev. H. M. Robinson of the call to its pastorate. He will enter upon it April 6. General Louis Wagner's Bible class will celebrate its twenty-ninth anniversary March 30.

Rev. C. A. R. Janvier has distributed to pastors copies of a brief catechism of the fundamentals of faith, with answers in the words of Scripture, such as he has used for some years in communicant classes. He is anxious to put in circulation the supply on hand before he leaves for India in September.

Old Church Has Life

First church, Camden, Dr. G. H. Hemingway pastor, has recently had large accessions to its membership. The communion and preparatory services were largely attended and shared the valuable services of Dr. W. C. Alexander, Rev. C. S. Stevens and Rev. W. S. Steckel of Philadelphia. Progressive methods are reenforcing the life of this old church. The ushers' association is an active men's organization. The Sunday school owes much of constant growth to the efficient leadership of Messrs. George Tyler and Samuel B. Miller.

Northminster church, Dr. W. C. Robinson pastor, rejoices in the recent large accession to its membership, the greater number on confession.

Dr. C. S. Richardson and people of the suburban church of Llanerch have been greatly encouraged by the additions of the year and the erection of a new church edifice.

W. P. WHITE.

The brotherhood of Maxwell, Iowa, church, organized in January, now numbers 157. It is divided into two Bible classes.

Utica, N. Y., recently had on the same evening banquets by two brotherhood organizations, First church and Bethany church. Both were well attended.

Explains Plans of Relief Board

Dr. Foulkes Is Given November in Which to Present Idea to the Pittsburg Churches–Dr. Alexander a Candidate for Moderator.

PITTSBURG—Dr. William Hiram Foulkes, secretary of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, was introduced to the ministers of Pittsburg and vicinity at a luncheon in the Fort Pitt hotel Wednesday, March 12. Doctors Maitland Alexander, W. L. McEwan and W. A. Jones acted as hosts, extended the invitations and made all arrangements for the meeting. Dr. Foulkes announced that the amount of money to all who were receiving support would be materially increased next year. The plan of the board is to visit all the large cities and Presbyterian centers during the next two or three years, present the cause and make an appeal for the $10,000,000 endowment fund. Dr. Foulkes and his assistants were asked to come to Pittsburg next November and present the whole subject to the churches.

Pittsburg will have a candidate for moderator at the General Assembly in the person of Dr. Maitland Alexander, pastor of First church. Dr. Alexander is eminently fitted for this position; he is a man of magnetic personality, is a successful leader of men, a great preacher and will receive the hearty support of his brethren in presbytery.

All of the ministerial associations of the city Monday, March 10, registered opposition to the Mailie bill which has been introduced into the state legislature to abolish the present city council of nine men and return to the old scheme of having one from each of the twenty-seven wards of the city. The Presbyterians elected a representative, Rev. Charles Zahnizer, to go with the party who protested against the bill at Harrisburg March 18.

Wellsville church, W. G. Reagle, D. D., pastor, held a men's banquet Friday evening, March 7, in the parlors of the church, with 208 men present. The principal address was delivered by Dr. Henry D. Lindsay, president of the Pennsylvania College for Women.

Rev. Charles Jordan was installed pastor of Second church, Wilkinsburg, Tuesday evening, March 11. An unusually large audience was present. Moderator of presbytery, J. E. Garvin, D. D., presided. Dr. Frank Sneed, Dr. David Breed and Dr. John Gaston took part.

First church, North side, Rev. Malcolm McPhail, Ph. D., pastor, has had a remarkable growth during the ten months of the present pastorate. Although the church is located in the downtown section the Sunday school has doubled. The duplex envelope system and every-member canvass has been adopted and is resulting in much larger gifts to benevolence.

On the occasion of the tenth anniversary of the pastorate of Dr. Sneed over East Liberty church about one year ago $10,000 was raised for Cebu mission in the Philippines for a dormitory for boys. Word has been received by the church that the dormitory has been completed and named the Sneed dormitory in honor of the pastor of the church which furnished the money.

Plan Latin-America Campaign

Special Conference of Various Mission Boards Results in Definite Program–Not Fanatical Toward Romish Church.

The special conference of evangelical mission boards on missions in Latin America held March 12 and 13 in the Presbyterian building, New York, was modeled on last winter's similar conference in regard to China and demonstrated the value of frank discussion of the problems which the various boards face in their common work. Missionaries were present from practically all of the countries of both South and Central America, Mexico and the Philippines. Prominent among them were Dr. W. E. Browning of Chile, Dr. James B. Rodgers of the Philippines and Rev. J. G. Meem of Brazil.

Secretary Robert E. Speer opened the conference with a survey of present missionary conditions; Dr. John Fox of the Bible society told of the circulation of the Bible in the Latin countries; Bishop E. R. Hendrix of the Methodist Church South discussed the right attitude of Protestant missions toward the Roman Catholic Church and Dr. E. F. Cooke of the same denomination pleaded for more cooperation and territorial division of fields. Dr. George L. Alexander, chairman of the conference, spoke of the lessons which Protestants should learn from the propaganda methods of the Romanist Church.

President of Hastings College, Hastings, Neb. 2-6-13

Dear Sir:—Some time ago our Secretary, Dr. A. J. Brown, D.D., 156 Fifth Ave., New York City, wrote the Korea Mission telling of the excellent work that your institution was doing for some Koreans in the U. S. I write to know what you may be able to do for a Korean boy now in Hawaii. His father was an earnest Christian, member of our first city congregation. He went with his family to Hawaii. . . . has written me several times with regard to educating his son in the U. S. He was a poor farmer . . . . he was determined to give his son every advantage . . . . should he be able to scrape up money to cover his passage to Hastings, would it be possible for him to put himself through school working part time daily and through his vacation? He is about 18 years of age. Very sincerely yours, (Rev.) Henry M. Bruen.

Do you realize that 90 per cent of our Christian workers are trained in Christian colleges like Hastings? If you will furnish the endowment, we will furnish the MEN and WOMEN.

The temper of the conference was the farthest possible from fanaticism. It was agreed that Protestant missions in Romanist countries are likely to accomplish greater results through injection of evangelical ideas into the Roman Church than through building up Protestant congregations, and the conference pledged itself not to urge Romanists to leave their churches if, after gospel enlightenment, they chose to continue in the old organization. But the formation of Protestant churches to receive believers dissatisfied with Catholic surroundings who voluntarily withdraw from the Roman communion was defended as legitimate missionary enterprise. It was noticeable that on this point Secretary Wood and Mr. Meem, representing the Episcopalian Church, expressed the fullest sympathy with their fellow members in the conference, although in the Philippines the Episcopalian missionaries are strictly pledged not to try to minister to anyone included in the Catholic parishes. The antagonism of the Roman Catholic priests to the distribution of the Bible was recognized as a prevailing factor in the Latin-American situation, although the fairness of the conference was shown in acknowledgment that a few Catholic prelates and priests do approve the circulation of the Scriptures among their people. The cardinal archbishop of Rio de Janeiro was mentioned as perhaps the most conspicuous among these creditable exceptions.

Home Board with Synodical Representatives Plans Extension of Work—Cooperate After Plan of Louisville General Assembly.

The Louisville Assembly submitted to the self-supporting synods and the Board of Home Missions for their approval a plan for closer affiliation. It was provided that the plan should go into operation upon the approval of two-thirds of the agencies involved. Only one synod voted in disapproval. It has already been put into partial operation and with gratifying success.

One feature is the federation of the synods in three groups, including with the synods now self-supporting two or three organized synodically which have not yet attained self-support. Each synod appoints two representatives to its group council, in which representatives of the board also sit as corresponding members. Two of these councils have met and organized. These are the western group, the synods bordering on the Missouri river, and the central group, synods whose territory is washed by the great lakes. The eastern group has not yet organized.

The other feature has just shown its value at a meeting of the Board of Home Missions. The Assembly's plan calls for the appointment by each of the synods of one representative who shall serve as a corresponding member of the board, who shall attend one meeting each year at the expense of the board and shall be welcomed at any other meeting. These corresponding members were in attendance March 13.

One of the most important results of the meeting was the approval of a plan looking to a rally of the churches and church members in the territory of these synods to meet their immense responsibility for their own communities and states. A concerted effort is planned for October and November for the enlistment of 1,000 men for home mission fields, in rural communities and in city and industrial centers, and at least a million dollars for pushing the work.

Three of the board's special departments have ever since their organization devoted much of their effort to cooperation with churches, presbyteries and synods in this region—social service, immigration and country life. Every one of them is far behind the demands now made. They must be more largely equipped for the larger service they ought to render.

Indiana Missions to Get Large Sum

George B. Yandes, a bachelor member of Second church, Indianapolis, who recently died at the age of 75 years, left $500,000 to home mission and Sunday school work in Indiana. The American Sunday School Union also receives $50,000 for work in the same state.

His father, Daniel Yandes, was a charter member of the church and was very generous in his gifts. The present endowment of home missions in Indiana was started by him with $10,000. This was increased to $60,000 by Simon Yandes, another son, whose fame as a church philanthropist is very great. The larger boards of the Presbyterian Church received most generous sums from him in his lifetime and at his death the whole of his estate was divided between home and foreign missions and Sunday school work. His gifts to education were concentrated in Wabash College.

George Yandes, the first child baptized by Henry Ward Beecher in his pastorate in Indianapolis, followed in the footsteps of the illustrious members of his family and consecrated his money to Christian enterprises. During his lifetime he gave liberally to all good causes. He was an unostentatious gentleman, of quiet manners, undemonstrative in his religious life, avoiding all prominence.

His estate is conservatively estimated at $900,000. After providing for his relatives and having made definite bequests ranging from $5,000 to $10,000 each to Christian and charitable institutions in his own city, he leaves the residue of his estate to home missions and Sunday school work in Indiana. This will amount to approximately $500,000. The late George Knox, synodical superintendent of home missions in Indiana, was a close personal friend of Mr. Yandes.

Easter has new meaning to unknown hundreds of foreign born people through the work of graduates of Dubuque German College and Seminary. Easter means more this year than a twelvemonth ago because they now have the spirit of the season interpreted by their own countrymen.

Hundreds of thousands of other men and women of foreign speech living in America would gladly welcome preachers in their own language. This institution is devoted to the training of young men for such work. There are now 174 studying for this life of service.

Their support during student days depends upon Presbyterians. We will gladly send full information of the work—a postal with your name and address will enable us to do our part. President C. M. Steffens, D.D , Dubuque, Iowa.

The Indiana Plan of Evangelism

THE SLOW numerical advance of our church is largely because synods and presbyteries have not done their duty in stimulating and directing sane evangelism within their bounds. But they can do little in that direction unless what they propose appeals to the people, both ministry and laity. To simple and definite methods our people will respond, as we in Indiana have found, and these methods will give permanent and constant fruitfulness to any church adopting and using them with vigor and wisdom.

The last meeting of the Synod of Indiana was marked by a distinct evangelistic uplift. Suggestions made by synod's committee on evangelistic work were enthusiastically received, and from all parts of the synod good reports and interested inquiries are coming to the chairman bearing on the plans there proposed.

If the session of any church will hold services for several days before communion, with definite effort to develop the spiritual life of the membership and to bring to confession those whom it would be natural to expect, good results will come, just as grain crops come. Many churches are neglecting the powerful leverage given them by the Master in the communion season. At that time the best that is in the church comes to the surface, and if pastor and elders will seize and direct that force they will win souls by it constantly.

This work ought to be attended all the time by the efforts of trained personal workers. The pastor can so instruct a chosen band of tactful men and women that they will become skilled in personal work; and when the secret of soul winning is learned, those who know it will use it, for it brings the joy of the Lord. If this band will keep a list of those for whom they will pray and work, adding from time to time those who come to view, the communion seasons will always be made happier by the appearing of new faces at the Lord's table.

No evangelism is worthy of the name that does not include the winning and training of children and youth. In spite of serious difficulties in the way of work with the young, some of which difficulties are as old as the race, and many of which are created and increased by modern conditions, the church has nevertheless a powerful appeal to the young and a strong hold on them. It is actually doing as well as the home and better than the school, against these odds. If that is true with the comparatively limited amount of positive and constructive work now being done for the young, what may not be done by proper methods persistently pursued?

Of all ways of winning and training children and youth, the communicant class is undoubtedly the most effective. This means the careful instruction in the fundamentals of Christian doctrine and personal experience. This last condition is the key to the effectiveness of such training. They will take instruction then that can never be carried to them as effectively afterwards; they will not merely receive it, but will reach out after it, if it is proffered. The offer of such instruction is, for many, the best way of winning. The first meeting of the first communicant class I ever conducted fell on an evening black with storm. To my astonishment the youngsters came running—"to beat the storm"—and the boys were first! In all the years succeeding I have never had that experience reversed.

The specific course of instruction used in such classes forms a bridge across which pastor and candidate may find each other. In the use of it individual difficulties come to light, and the pastor can dissipate what might otherwise hang over a life for years. Pastor and pupil come to know each other with an intimate understanding that becomes priceless as the years pass. No attachment springing up through the other incidents of church life will equal that which grows up between the minister and the communicant to whom he has carefully shown the way into a genuine Christian knowledge and experience.

There is no church where this method may not be used effectively. The church that uses it will raise up a generation that will better understand the necessity and the obligations of a genuine religious experience and of a definite church fidelity. There is absolutely no reason why the church should not be as successful in training the young of the church for membership as the state is in training the young of the state for citizenship.

If synods and presbyteries will admit the effectiveness of these simple and well tried methods, educate the churches in their bounds in the use of them, and keep at it, there will be no difficulty in maintaining a permanent and continual evangelism, rooted in the local church, using its forces and developing those forces in the use.

THOMAS B. TERHUNE,
Chairman of Evangelistic Committee, Synod of Indiana.

Evangelism in Rural Communities

Rock River Presbytery, conspicuously a village and country church presbytery, has been trying out presbyterial evangelism this winter with most encouraging results. The effort is the direct result of an all-day prepresbytery evangelistic conference in connection with the fall meeting. The evangelistic committee, of which Rev. W. C. Crofts is chairman, was authorized to hire at a stated salary "a proper and efficient evangelist." The only funds at the committee's disposal were a grant of $300 from the home mission committee, which might be used only for work done in "weak and home mission fields." This restricted the sphere of operations. Believing, however, that the fields thus classified were the ones needing help most, the committee on Nov. 17 placed Rev. H. P. Dunlop and Choir Director B. H. Redden in the field.

The first meeting cost the committee over $80. The chairman turned almost pale, but forged ahead. The evangelist has now closed the fifth series of meetings, two of which have been in home mission fields, and the other three among the weakest self-supporting churches. Two of the five churches stand at cross roads, in the country, while the other three are in villages ranging from 100 to 600 population. These five churches total a membership of 376, one of them being at present pastorless.

Meetings have been held for three months, resulting in a total of 242 professions, equal to 64 per cent of the total membership of these five churches.

The committee drew upon the home mission committee for $150 and now has in the bank $94.68, which means that they expended during the twelve weeks $55.32, an average of $4.61 per week, with an average of twenty professions per week—23 cents per soul for anyone wishing to figure souls in terms of dollars and cents. The personal expense account of members of the committee has not been reported as yet, but will not be much over $25.

On each field a free will offering was taken by envelopes, with no "high pressure" methods. The committee is now employing two evangelists in opposite ends of the presbytery and expects to place them side by side in a sort of simultaneous campaign soon.

Recent Evangelistic Activities

The revival meetings conducted by Rev. E. L. Buchanan in Denmark, Iowa, Congregational church resulted in much good.

A successful series of meetings has just closed at Coal Valley, Ill., under the auspices of Messrs. Dunlop and Sutherland.

Ladd, Ill., church closed a very successful series of evangelistic services March 2, assisted by Evangelist H. P. Dunlop and W. P. Sebern, singer.

St. Louis, Mo., Lee Avenue church closed a two weeks' series of meetings Feb. 28, during which Rev. J. B. Talbot of Ferguson, Mo., was the speaker.

Rev. H. M. Course has just concluded a series of meetings at Douglas, Wash. He assisted Rev. Robert Snowden at Lamoine earlier in the winter.

Evangelist W. C. Ross, assisted by John H. Stout, has just closed a successful work in Lineville, Iowa. There were 200 conversions. Many of these will go to the Methodist church, in which the meetings were held, but the pastors and people of all the churches were in cooperation and the Presbyterian church will share liberally in the results.

Evangelistic meetings have been held for a month at Euphrata and Quincy, Wash., by the pastor, Rev. A. R. Griggs, assisted a few evenings by Rev. J. A. Laurie.

The church at Savannah, Mo., Rev. H. A. Sawyers pastor, is engaged in a union meeting with the four other churches of the town. Rev. Mr. Pratt is the evangelist.

At Earl Park, Ind., the pastor, Rev. Peter McEwen, with the assistance of George "Irish" McGowan and Rev. J. S. Burns of South Bend, has just closed a most successful revival meeting.

Revival meetings at Delmar, Iowa, began the third week March 9. Cottage meetings in the forenoon one week and afternoon studies in Ephesians the next week have proved very helpful.

Five weeks of meetings closed last Sunday at Harvey, Ill. Results have been excellent, with more than 700 conversions. Mr. Hart, assisted by Mr. Magann as singer, conducted the campaign.

Rev. J. M. Walton, who has recently taken charge of the work at Trenton, Mo., has just closed a successful series of meetings at Rosendale, Mo., in which he was assisted by the pastor of that church.

Evangelist Rev. Elmer P. Loose and party have just closed meetings at Hoopeston, Ill., and have gone to Wenona, Ill. Almost every church in town received additions as a result of the campaign. Many men were reached.

A series of meetings was begun the first Sunday in February in the church of Greenville, Ill., the pastor, Rev. W. H. Kendall, doing his own preaching. A large number have confessed Christ and many were received into the church.

Rev. F. R. Wedge closed a very gratifying series of meetings, continuing four weeks, in the church at Table Rock, Neb., Feb. 23. Mrs. Wedge assisted in the personal work and the pastor, Rev. C. P. W. Wimberly, conducted the singing.

The two weeks' series of successful evangelistic services under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. Asher at Trenton church, Condit, Ohio, closed March 2. Methodists, Christians, Presbyterians and Christian Unionists worked side by side.

Recently an evangelistic campaign was conducted in Guthrie, Okla., church under the leadership of Rev. W. A. Erwin and his son of Amarillo, Texas. The church is much revived and all departments are being pushed by the pastor, Rev. George O. Nichols.

E. C. Miller of South Bend, Ind., who has been associated with Dr. W. E. Biederwolf in evangelistic work for some time, is now giving his entire time to evangelistic campaigns. He formerly was purchasing agent for the Studebaker Company in South Bend.

Rev. Walter Russell of Chicago and Charles F. Allen of Philadelphia, musical director, spent two weeks at Luverne, Iowa, in February, the Methodists and Presbyterians uniting in special services. During January preparatory services were held by the pastor. A number have joined the church.

A two weeks' series of evangelistic meetings on the St. Paul, N. D., country field closed Feb. 27. The pastor, Rev. J. Way Huly, was assisted by Rev. Samuel McIvor of Westhope. Not having a church building that the congregation can use in winter, the meetings were held in the home of one of the members.

Union tabernacle meetings that were held in January by Messrs. Hart and Magann have been a great spiritual uplift to all the churches of Holton, Kan., and vicinity. About 500 came forward during the month's services. Many students of the high school were won for the Christian life. A large number pledged themselves to establish a family altar. Rev. Frank R. Zugg of Washington, Kan., assisted the pastor, Rev. S. A. Fulton, in a week's special services following the evangelistic campaign. A number of families have already been welcomed by this church. This congregation has for several years supported Rev. A. J. Fisher of Sheklung, China. One of its members, Miss Lenore Schoebel, has been for nearly three years a missionary at Urumia, Persia. Robert E. Speer in a recent letter classes her as one

Ingathering from Sunday Meetings

On the Sabbath after Billy Sunday ended his great meetings at Columbus, Ohio, 6,000 persons joined the various churches of that city on confession of faith. The next Sabbath the additions to churches were 2,800, and the Sabbath after 1,000. A number of congregations, following established custom, are postponing the reception of members until Easter, and that Sabbath will see the number of church members increased by hundreds and perhaps thousands more. It is reliably stated that the sale of liquors in Columbus fell off 25 per cent in consequence of the Sunday meetings. Two hundred neighborhood Bible classes are meeting weekly in Christian homes, and a downtown noon meeting for women workers in stores and offices is attended by large numbers.

Union Seminary Relations Up

Assembly's Committee Meets in New York—To Report at Atlanta—Board of Erection to Establish $500,000 Loan Fund.

General Assembly's committee on relations with Union Seminary met in New York City March 13. Dr. D. G. Wylie, the chairman, conferred with President Francis Brown of the seminary and the committee of the trustees, including Doctors C. H. Parkhurst, Anthony Evans and David R. Frazer. The two committees dined together with President Brown. A harmonious meeting is reported, but details are not to be given till Assembly meets. The seminary trustees took under advisement Assembly's request to declare faith in the authority of Scriptures, the deity of Christ and the resurrection and atonement. Those present from Assembly's committee, besides Chairman Carson of Brooklyn, were Doctors Palmer of Columbus, Montfort of Cincinnati and Perkins of Baltimore. Dr. Carson attended against his physician's advice and is still very ill.

The Board of Church Erection has met the demands of the Executive Commission by establishing a half million loan fund.

Good Things in This Issue

Not many weekly magazines of national circulation offer an opportunity to children 12 years of age to contribute to its columns and have their names signed! This issue of The Continent has splendid examples of fiction from a number of youthful writers who may be heard from more extensively in later years. The efforts of Benjy and Betty to send their valentines where they will do most good on Easter are told in clever ways on Young America page. The first part of the story was published some time ago and in this issue may be found the second part as written by the young folk themselves. Did your children send in a story? There will be other opportunities of the same sort later.

The Wayfarer in this issue comments on a fact which many an earnest Christian has found after visiting a rescue mission. Be sure to read his suggestion for a remedy for bookish religion.

In the next issue in the Ways of Working column will be suggestions whereby annual meetings of churches may be made more interesting than they are sometimes. This week a group of plans for working with children is presented. Perhaps your church is using a scheme better than any of these which you will be glad to pass on for other readers.

Financial Situation

Foreign Money Rates Higher—Railways Doing Much to Increase Returns from Farms on Their Lines Business News.

Spring is turning the attention of the business world to the country for signs of future prosperity. A recent snow in the Northwest is said to have done the fields there a large amount of good. Money rates in New York have been a little more firm in sympathy with the tightening of the markets abroad. The Balkan situation is not settling itself as fast as the money interests would like. The inaugural speech and first acts of President Wilson have not alarmed the financial interests—and the first acts of a new President are watched with close attention for possible untoward tendencies. Those who realize the true relation of the banking system of the country to business are hoping that the new administration can find some way to readjust present practices so that the volume of currency will be more responsive to demands, and hope that it will be done soon.

The constantly increasing efforts of the railways and other large corporations to point out the best ways to farm and market crops continue to attract attention. Professor P. G. Holden, formerly the corn man of Iowa, now with the International Harvester Company, is urging the value of alfalfa as a general crop for farms, specially in its manner of restoring nitrogen to the soil.

Urge Raising of Small Fruit

The Rock Island railway has enlarged its agricultural department by the employment of a horticulturist who will develop the small fruit and melon business on farms along the line of that road, Professor E. R. Bennett, who has recently been with the Colorado Agricultural College and has achieved large success in several states in raising fruit which brought considerably more than the usual market price. Some of the farmers whom he has induced to raise potatoes in Colorado have seen the annual crop from an acre increase from $30 with usual products to $150 with potatoes. Such work as this means that the land is more valuable, and to anyone holding a mortgage on property managed in this way, it means that the security is largely increased.

The Panama canal and its approaching completion has served to direct attention of American business men to an intense degree upon the commercial possibilities of South America. Most of the trade of these countries now goes to Europe because of better transportation service and better understanding of the conditions of trade. The Chicago Association of Commerce has given considerable thought to this condition and for several years has had a trade representative in Argentina studying affairs. The association has decided to put a permanent trade exhibit in one of the larger cities of South America to show what Chicago manufactures. This has been recently shipped by fifty or more firms who now export goods to some extent. The export trade of the country is growing and the manufacturers generally are showing larger production.

A Reader's Question

"I recently sold a farm for $5,500 and want to invest my money so that it will bring the largest possible income. I shall want to use $1,000 in September to send my nephew to school and make some improvements in my house. The balance I can leave for a number of years."

Answer: You can probably put your money into a farm loan to best advantage, at least the $4,500 you want to invest permanently. The $1,000 might be invested in a good railway bond at once. This can be sold readily when you need the money and will return you interest for every day you own it. As bonds are very low now, there is also the possibility that you can sell later to advantage. If you can't find a $4,500 mortgage at once you might divide it into two mortgages on different farms. This is frequently done. Any reliable mortgage loan house can obtain the mortgages for you.

course of our raft. We tried to row, and then to paddle, using boards as oars. We tried to steer her and swing her with our longest planks as rudders. We made sails of some of the boards on one corner of the raft, or again pushed them into the sea, first at one end and then at the other. But all our efforts failed to alter our direction one iota. Nearer and nearer we drove to the shoals, absolutely helpless to save ourselves.

"Yes, we looked many times toward the houses and the land where were boats and men in plenty. But we knew at heart that they had not seen us. Then the sea rose under us. The breakers crashed into our crazy craft again, and once more we bade one another good-by, as it seemed as if the raft were all in pieces, and death only a matter of moments.

"But somehow we were again able to grab and hold onto projecting pieces, and when we had once more driven clear, passing right over the reef, we found that the raft was in two pieces, which were only a dozen yards apart. My brother and brother-in-law were lying out flat on a few planks; the rest of us were clinging to the other remnant. Scattered boards were washing around everywhere, but we could only get hold of a very few. So with the inevitable end seeming to get nearer and nearer, we once again began our long drift seaward." (To be Concluded Next Week)

Thus the two little groups of survivors on their two rafts struggled and hoped and despaired. In next week's issue Dr. Grenfell will tell how one raft was saved and the other lost. It was a recital which cut deep into the consciousness of the listener and impressed him more than the usual religious service in the little mission chapel where they were standing.

Bradford Horton, Man

can match you. A wooden Indian might, but no living man."

"Brad, are you laughing at me?" demanded Sleighton.

"Why not? Didn't you laugh at me when you pulled me out of the snowbank?"

"Oh, well, that was different. You looked ridiculous then."

"Well, what about you on a horse, A. S.? Jickers says, 'There's something ridiculous about the combination of horse and man, and it's not the horse.' He says, 'I've seen that horse when Do-Re-Mi wasn't on him.'"

"Jickers said that?"

"Just so. Said also that you'd better get yourself strapped on or you'll go leap-frog fashion over the horse's head."

Sleighton beat his leg with the lash of the whip. "How'll I get exercise, then? I've got to have outdoor exercise."

"The lake's good exercise. Come and row with me."

"No, you don't, Brad. I've been up, and the boats up there are tubs, the whole lot of them."

"Mine isn't. I know a boat when I see one."

Though Sleighton after this relegated his riding whip and boots to the background where unused articles accumulate, it took some days of persuasion and a visit to the boathouse where Bradford kept his slender St. Lawrence river boat to convince him that there was real sport to be had on the lake, which had become Horton's favorite outing place. Bradford had discovered its charm the year before and had purchased his boat in the spring. Night after night he had spent on the water, alone or with Mrs. Elmore or one of the Jickers trio, rowing or paddling or drifting with the evening breeze as twilight fell. He had made the acquaintance of Joe's attractive friend, Nick Moon, and had often thought what an ideal place for a summer holiday was Branscombe's house, hidden away in the trees on the point. Once Sleighton was converted into willingness to accompany, his pleasure in the lovely sheet of water was redoubled and more than once a week on until winter the two launched their little craft upon the placid waters.

One evening they came up with Joe and Lucy Jickers and Alice Lee. Joe caught sight of the name on the bow of Horton's boat.

"Ghost of Blackstone!" he shouted, "what a name! 'Anti-gone!' Who's your aunty, son, and where's she gone? Where has she gone?"

Sleighton was rowing. His oars missed the water, and he fell backward into the bottom of the boat, laughing helplessly. Horton seized the paddle and moved swiftly up to the Jickers party.

"Is that what you call catching a crab, Mr. Sleighton?" asked Alice Lee.

"No, Miss Lee. That is what is called hitting the bull's-eye," replied Sleighton, and again he laughed.

"Now what is there to laugh at? We don't see anything funny," broke in Lucy Jickers.

"No, you don't, but Horton does."

"Shut up, A. S.," said Bradford, and his face was as red as the afterglow in the sky. To his relief, Joe struck in with a brisk change of subject.

"Brad, we're on our way to Nick Moon's," he said. "No, Lucy, don't worry over the Do-Re-Mi man—he'll get over it. Come along," turning back to Bradford. "We're going for supper on the shore."

"Yes, do," chimed in Lucy, and Bradford assented gladly.

Nick saw their boats approaching and was waiting on the shore. "Hello, 1827!" he called as they drew into the shallows. "Evenin', Miss Lucy. Evenin', Miss Alice. Evenin', singer. Come up to the house. Isn't my house good enough for you? Come on, every one of you. You go ahead, 1827. I'll pull up the boats."

A cheerier place than Nick Moon's porch could not be found anywhere, and the view was enchanting.

The call to supper drew them away at last, reluctant though they were. But Nick's voice was commanding:

"You've seen sights like that lots of times, but you've never had the chicken and waffles Sally's got on the table now, and you'll never have 'em again. Come on! They're hot, and Sally don't like laggards."

Austin Slighton sat beside Lucy Jickers, who began to talk at once.

"Do you know where Mr. Horton got that boat?"

"Had it sent down from the St. Lawrence, I believe."

"There, I knew he did!" she declared triumphantly. "I thought it looked like the boats up there."

"Why, have you been there, Miss Jickers?" Sleighton asked with interest.

"Of course. I spent a whole summer at Gananoque."

"May I ask when? What summer?"

"Why, surely." Lucy was at once surprised and amused at the young man's manner, it was so frankly and eagerly inquisitive. "Summer before last, July and August."

"You? That summer? You?" he exclaimed in excitement.

Lucy was really laughing now. "I?" she answered. "Yes, I. What's wrong with that?"

"Nothing wrong. But I didn't know, you know."

"Well, Mr. Sleighton, have you usually known where I spent my summers?"

"Ah, now, Miss Jickers, don't laugh. I'm only just naturally surprised. I thought I knew everybody in the sleepy old village that summer, but it seems I didn't. I didn't know you were there. I ought to have known it," he added with regret. "It would have been great to row you on the St. Lawrence. Oh, I love that river, Miss Jickers!"

"I don't wonder," she said gently. "It is a river to love. Was your home there? Tell me about it."

He needed no further encouragement. Before the supper was done she knew his story, a story by no means dull. She learned how he had been born in Gananoque and had gone when old enough to the states for better school advantages; how when the civil war came on he had gone to the front, first as drummer boy, afterwards as soldier; how he had then begun to struggle once more for an education, through many sacrifices and not a few disappointments.

"The summer that you were in Gananoque," he ended, "I went back to the old town, perhaps for the last time, for my people are all gone. And I never knew that you were there! Think of it! Oh, my, but I missed it—I mean you missed it—I mean, we—we missed—you see, I—well, you——"

He was relieved in his helpless floundering by Lucy's ringing laugh, which caught the attention of the others.

"What's the matter, Miss Lucy?" asked Bradford.

"Oh, Mr. Sleighton's the matter. He's funny. He's awfully funny. And, Joe, just think! Mr. Sleighton's home is in Gananoque, and he was there all the summer that Mary Tappan and I were. And I never knew it, and he never knew it, and we both never knew it," and once more she began to laugh.

Thus easily the talk became general, and before long the going home time came and Joe was on his feet. "It's locking up time, gentlemen of the jury." Then, turning gravely to Horton, he added, "Your honor, my client, Miss Lee, wishes to ride in that bull's-eye boat, that aunty-gone craft. Counsel has discouraged her, but she persists. So, if your honor will permit, client and counsel will go with your honor."

"So I'm to be commodore, am I?" answered Bradford. "A. S., you take Miss Lucy and follow." So it fell out that Austin Sleighton and Lucy Jickers floated down the outlet together.

"Brad," said Sleighton as they separated that night, "do you know what a fine girl Miss Jickers is?"

"Of course. When did you learn it?"

"Tonight. I've seen her at the Shakespeare Club for two winters, of course, but I never knew her very well. I tell you she's fine, Brad—fine as silk. She asked me to call."

"You're falling in love, Austin."

"Oh, pshaw! Can't a fellow say a girl's fine without your thinking he's going to be a fool? Anyway, she wouldn't look at me."

"Perhaps not. If I were a girl, I would."

There was a short silence. "A. S.," Bradford asked at length, "have I ever said anything anywhere about Antigone that Joe Jickers may have heard?"

"I don't know. Shall I ask him?"

"No, you idiot. Good night."

Now the fact was that Sleighton himself had once told Joe the name by which Horton called Eleanor Elmore. (To be continued)

Calendar and Record

[To Stated Clerks: The Continent desires to print the important facts about the meeting of every presbytery. But ten lines about each one would require twenty-six columns! May we not ask that in the reports kindly sent to us the significant acts of presbytery be given preference to routine, so that the items may have the widest possible interest? Brief reports, strictly to the point, make earlier publication and fuller representation possible.—Editors.]

Openings in Country Fields

On the advice of the department of church and country life Salt River Presbytery has abandoned six churches, leaving thirty-eight for which there are only ten ministers. This department under Dr. Warren H. Wilson has been doing intensive work in the northeastern part of Missouri and is now attempting to find additional pastors. "The work of the department," says Dr. Wilson, "is showing itself in the desire of rural churches which never had a minister to call a regular pastor, but we cannot find the men." Pastors who accept appointments in this presbytery will be representatives of the church and country life department.

"The Beautiful Rests on the Foundations of the Necessary"

There are certain things which are necessary not only to the foundation of beauty but to its preservation, and without which beauty is imperfect and unenduring.

The first of these necessaries is a soap that will protect the skin from the impairing influences of climate and atmosphere, and keep the complexion of a velvety softness and a sweet, peach-like bloom. The only soap that fully and completely answers these requirements is

Pears' Soap

WHICH IS BOTH A SKIN SOAP AND A BEAUTY SOAP.

It [illegible] the foundations of beauty, and gives that natural stimulative force that keeps the skin in healthy action, without which the color fades and the cheeks become sallow.

Around the Shop

Lugubrious Grump was a dear old man who had started out early in life to insist on perfection. "Things is got to be just right," he declared proudly, "or I ain't goin' to have nothin' to do with 'em."

Gube was a young fellow of considerable ability, but there was something wrong about every job he undertook. If the work was not too hard and the salary was right, his bench was on the wrong side of the room, or he was not pleased with his employer's view on the tariff question. By good fortune, however, he finally got into an occupation that he could manage according to his own notion—namely, spending the money left him by an uncle whom he had never seen. As the uncle was dead, there was no opportunity to complain because some of the inheritance consisted of stock in a railway of which Gube disapproved because it refused to stop the 10:37 train at Shadyville.

One day Gube read in a newspaper that there were spots on the sun, so thereafter he went out only on cloudy days; and, of course, he stayed in on moonlight evenings because of the mottled appearance of the orb of night. When the end came his neighbors wondered secretly how heaven would suit him.

Gube's disposition came from his father, who liked to read, and to read good literature, but whose critical faculty was out of balance. He loved to "keep posted," but his daily paper once advocated views contrary to his, so he stopped it. His religious paper printed a paragraph he couldn't understand, so he stopped his subscription. He thought if he ever got rich enough he would hire editors to make papers to print what he liked to read and which would be perfectly perfect, but before he could reach that condition he had to leave this world and Gube.

The Around-the-Shop Man really meant to take you on to the moral, but here we are at the fence!

Not a Missing But a Connecting Link

A man is known to us who is notable for the number of good friends whom he has introduced to each other; friends who are closer to each other than either is to him. Sometimes these friends have become husband and wife.

The same man has been responsible for introducing several leaders into religious work—men who are doing a service which he himself is unable to render.

Whimsically, the man alludes to himself, in intimate circles, in this fashion: "I am not the 'missing link,' but the 'connecting link.' My work seems to be in bringing the right persons or the right agencies together."

That is no small task. It makes this man a sharer in all the results wrought by the combinations which he has effected.

Follow the idea for a moment. It means for the ordinary, everyday person, with no peculiar talents, that if he himself cannot preach he may help another to hear a man who can preach. If he cannot radiate winsome helpfulness and inspiration, he may, nevertheless, lead his friends to somebody who does possess this quality of glow. If he cannot write great thoughts, he may at least bring great thoughts to the attention of those who would not otherwise share them.

* * * * *

Most immediately and practically, the point of the little story for every reader is that he may do a real service of unmeasured helpfulness to a friend—perhaps comfort, exalt and sweeten that friend's character and career—by introducing to him THE CONTINENT and its merits.

Definitely, there is somebody known to you whose horizon sorely needs broadening. Would not THE CONTINENT broaden it?

Another, a faithful church worker, needs to learn new methods, and to get into a spirit of fellowship with other workers. Is not THE CONTINENT the cure?

Here is a parent troubled about literature for the children, and the question of a wise keeping of the Lord's day. There is light for such in THE CONTINENT.

Young folk in the Christian Endeavor Society should have a sympatheic knowledge of the whole Presbyterian Church and her activities. They need to be trained to become elders and deacons and trustees. What course of preparation so good as a regular reading of THE CONTINENT?

A pastor is perturbed because his people do not see things in the large; they are interested in the parish, but not in the kingdom. Is there any better remedy for this condition than a general circulation of THE CONTINENT among the members?

The big, modern, man-note in the church has not yet reached some communities. Would it not vitalize the faith of a host of men were they to read THE CONTINENT?

The problems of the kingdom today are new and immense. This is a time of change and stress. The master word is with the gospel. And it is spoken and interpreted through THE CONTINENT.

* * * * *

Enough has been written to make clear the point. The church paper has a mission, an essential mission, in the life of the church of today. Whosoever causes a Christian to become a subscriber to a religious paper of the right sort does a service with consequences beyond calculation. To be a connecting link between THE CONTINENT and a human life is to render a service to both, and to the kingdom as well.

The agencies of the Kingdom are dependent upon the friends of the Kingdom for their usefulness.

Enroll yourself for permanent usefulness as a connecting "link."

We shall be glad to help you, and it will help us to know that you are willing to cooperate. Why not write today?

Good Farming as a Church Interest

"BETTER BE EXPERT ON SOULS THAN SOILS."

This neat bit of epigram is a recent invention, mothered by a quite recent necessity. Only lately have the people who detest changes in the church had to hunt up argument against the modern country church movement. And this remark is the aptest they have found.

Young as it is, therefore, the epigram has already been compelled to do a vast deal of hard work. In fact, it has been badly overworked—a case for the child labor committee to look into. But its toil can be lightened. Let us kindly detain the little epigram long enough to bring it into company with the facts. After that it won't be kept so busy.

The gist of complaint against this modernism in country churches is that it advises rural pastors to try to introduce scientific farming methods on the farms of their parishes.

Now it is no great feat by smart phrases and short-cut logic to make that proposition look ridiculous. The church is in the world to spread religion, and where is the religion in nitrates and nitrites and all the rest of the chemical lingo which goes into the science of soil-culture? The minister is sent to preach the gospel; does he imagine he can measure it in bushels of corn?

Yes, it is all very sufficient logic—against certain conceivable follies. Possibly it is well enough to have it repeated once in a while; it might warn some topheavy theorist.

For it is imaginable that a minister could get so wrapped up in scientific farming that he would forget about souls and bury himself in soils. But if he did, it wouldn't be at all the sort of interest which real up-to-date country pastors are taking in the subject.

The fact is that critics who suppose there is good sense in this souls-versus-soils epigram miss altogether the reason why leadership in scientific agriculture is urged on pastors in country work.

The actual principle involved is not radical nor strange. It is simply this:

A church cannot live in any community unless the people who make up the church have something to live on.

This is a general principle, but just now it applies in the United States to industrial and agricultural communities particularly. These are places where the question of what to live on pinches most.

To be sure, the difficulties of country congregations are not all from this source. There are rural communities in America where the farmers are all, as the saying goes, "rolling in wealth," and yet so indifferent to religion that neighbors call them pagans. Such communities need something very different from scientific farming.

But the typical country church in straits—the church about which people say, "It's been running down for years and it won't be long till it's dead"—stands in the midst of very different conditions.

The surrounding farms in such a case have been gradually worked out until it is no longer easy to make them yield livings equal to the needs of intelligent families.

Over such a community general discouragement broods. Everybody wants to move. Old people who can't get away settle down to end their days as economically as possible on their savings. The young folks can't possibly be held.

And every departure of an individual or a family makes the case of the church more desperate. Even if incoming purchasers or renters should in the long run prove available church material, it takes time to win them and longer time for them to reach a supporting ability in the church equal to the owners who have gone.

And the interval is long for the church to expire of slow and yet all too quick starvation.

Now what is a live country pastor going to do about it? Participate meekly in the process of starvation? Or join the exodus? Not if he has the right substance in him for a hard job in a fighting corner.

What he is bound to do can't be summed up in an epigram. But it comes to this:

In the typical country church of America today, if a preacher is going to preserve to himself any chance at all to look after the souls of the people, he has got to pay attention to soils and other agricultural realities.

The minister simply must become a leader in restoring the sentiment that the country—their own community in particular—is a good place to live in.

There are a great lot of things which the minister will need to do for this end—many social things aiming for uplift of ideals and cementing of fellowships through the neighborhood. But the primary thing on which all the rest will depend is his service toward solving the good living problem.

Unless the minister can convince the farmers and their ambitious children that there is a good living to be made on the farms, the farmers likely and their children surely will go somewhere else.

And the only hope of convincing them so lies in scientific agriculture—making the land yield all that the best applications of science can render it capable of.

This is where the necessity comes in of having the country preacher be a preacher also of better farming methods. Oh, no—not an expert; the expert idea is just caricature. But a believer in it—a man wise enough to master facts and figures that will demonstrate the possibility of making the farm a livable place.

And he must be a man who can radiate enthusiasm—a perfectly genuine enthusiasm, not a book-made artificial sort—about the art of tilling God's good earth.

This doctrine of the spiritual honor attaching to the primitive occupation of mankind the country minister ought to believe with all his heart and preach instantly in season and out of season—especially to the boys.

And when he does that, he is no more departing from the spiritual functions of the ministry than the old pioneer preachers were when they insisted so strenuously on the foremost community need of the country districts in their day—good schools.

Just as those old pioneers returned at all due seasons to declare the word of God straight from their pulpits, unharmed by their excursions into the realm of popular education, so be assured that these modern country preachers will get back to the gospel, too, unharmed by their service to the outstanding country need of the present time—promotion of up-to-date farming efficiency.

The World

A Welcome Right-About-Face in China

A frank and prompt reversal of policy and an end of American intermeddling in the internal affairs of China, together with a hint of early recognition of the new republic, is contained in the declaration issued from the White House last week. The United States abruptly withdraws from any part in the six-power loan and declines to have any part in coercing China.

President Wilson and Secretary Bryan, with the approval of the cabinet, state that at the request of the last administration a certain group of American bankers—meaning J. Pierpont Morgan and associates—undertook to participate along with bankers of other nations in a loan to the Chinese government (approximating $125,000,000, of which the Americans were to advance $21,000,000). The Wilson administration was asked by this group of bankers whether it would renew the request to them to participate, saying they would continue to seek a share in the loan only if expressly requested by this government. In other words, Wall street would oblige Washington if Washington asked it—on the announced theory that the United States could thus give a practical exhibition of good will toward China; American capital would have access to that great country, and at the same time the United States could be in a position "to share with the other powers any political responsibilities that might be associated with the development of the foreign relations of China."

This view of the case did not at all appeal to President Wilson and Mr. Bryan as it had to President Taft and Mr. Knox, nor do they hesitate to say so plainly: "The administration has declined to make such request because it did not approve the conditions of the loan or the implications of responsibility on its own part which it was plainly told would be involved in the request.

"The conditions of the loan seem to us to touch very nearly the administrative independence of China itself, and this administration does not feel that it ought, even by implication, to be a party to those conditions. The responsibility on its part which would be implied in requesting the bankers to undertake the loan might conceivably go to the length in some unhappy contingency of forcible interference in the financial and even the political affairs of that great Oriental state, just now awakening to a consciousness of its power and of its obligations to its people."

The proposed loan requirements included the pledging, as security, of antiquated and burdensome taxes and also the administering of those taxes by official foreign agents, and other oppressive and humiliating terms. And the implied responsibility of the United States in encouraging a loan thus applied and secured "is obnoxious to the principles upon which the government of our people rests."

"But," says President Wilson, "the government of the United States is not only willing but earnestly desirous of aiding the great Chinese people in every way that is consistent with their untrammeled development." The government is eager to promote extended and intimate trade relationships, and will support legislation necessary to that end. The message—for it is a message to the people of America and to the people of China—concludes thus: "Our interests are those of the open door—a door of friendship and mutual advantage. This is the only door we care to enter."

Significance of the Chinese Loan Declaration

Reading between the lines, commentators find that China is now free to get money where it will, so far as the United States is concerned. Private syndicates in Europe have been willing to advance funds, but were warned off in favor of the officially favored bankers, but the United States does not propose further to employ diplomatic and possibly military machinery for the exclusive benefit of one small body of New York capitalists. The idea that the United States should postpone recognition of the Oriental republic in order to help drive a hard bargain for an international money combine has been repugnant to all sincerely in sympathy with the aspirations of new China, and President Wilson's announcement was greeted with wide approval.

In spite of the fact that the financial intrigue has lasted long and is of world reaching extent, the hope is expressed that China may be able to free itself from all embarrassing entanglements, and with the moral support of at least one great nation be able squarely to face the designs of Russia, England and Japan. America's attitude toward the new China is no longer obscured and befogged but shows clear in honest daylight. Now that America has withdrawn support from the bankers, London newspapers say the other powers may do the same.

Huntington Wilson, assistant secretary of state under President Taft, who had been asked by President Wilson and Mr. Bryan to continue in office, was so angered by the new administration's Chinese attitude that he sent in his resignation and a long letter of criticism, to which the President made no reply other than acceptance.

Chinese National Assembly Meets Next Week

The new Chinese national assembly, which is charged with the duty of electing a president and establishing a permanent constitutional government, will meet for the first time on April 8. Yuan Shih Kai, the provisional president whose ability has been demonstrated, will, it is expected, be chosen president. Another hopeful item of Chinese news is the appointment by the Chinese government as its expert adviser in constitutional reform of Professor Frank J. Goodnow of Columbia University. Professor Goodnow is a legal scholar and author, and is regarded as moderately conservative in his views.

Austria Threatens Montenegro; Peace Terms

Austria-Hungary, one of the six great powers of Europe, and Montenegro, one of the smallest of nations, have lately threatened to become involved in war over Scutari, the Albanian city lying invitingly near both its large and small neighbors. A few days ago, when the Monenegrin siege operations were reported as likely to succeed the Austrian minister at Cettinje made certain demands on Montenegro, which were followed up by a sharp note from Vienna that civilians should be allowed free exit from Scutari, that forcible "conversions" of Roman Catholics should cease and other incidents should be explained. The king of Montenegro replied that practically the entire population of Scutari was under arms and he refused to halt the siege, and he denied the stories of violent conversions. Austria sent warships to Albania to enforce its ultimatum.

Meantime the representatives of the powers who had been asked to mediate in behalf of Turko-Balkan peace communicated to the premier of Bulgaria their views as to the basis of negotiations. This basis is not what the allies want now, but it is probably much more than they hoped for when the war began.

Assassination of the King of Greece

Desultory fighting and dilatory peace negotiations were for a time overshadowed last week by the assassination of King George of Greece, who was shot by a mad Greek anarchist, Aleko Schinas by name, at Salonica. The king had moved with his suite into the captured city on the Ægean last November for the purpose of giving strength to Greece's claim to permanent possession of the port when the time should come for division of the spoils of the Turko-Balkan war. For Salonica is one of the capital prizes of the present multifarious contest, and the king's strategy was admirable, although irritating to the Bulgars and Serbs.

Personally King George was a most amiable man, without known enemies, and had enjoyed an unusually long and, on the whole, successful reign. Within a few days from the date of his tragic death, which occurred March 18, he would have celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his coronation, and to this event he was looking forward with gratification and pleasure. He was the second son of the late King Christian of Denmark and was called to the throne of Greece when a boy of 19. He found the kingdom discontented and debt-burdened; he left it prosperous and hopeful.

The new king of the Hellenes, formerly Prince Constantine, King George's oldest son, lost popularity and standing with his people because of Greece's failure in the war with Turkey in 1897, but he more than regained his prestige in the present war as commander in chief in the capture of Janina and previous victories. He begins his reign under far better auspices than did his father.

Suffrage Outrages: The Secret of the Crusade

Criminality in the form of a political crusade caused the destruction by fire of property valued at $100,000 in England last week. One squad of female incendiaries burned down an unoccupied mansion on the Thames above London owned by the widow of Sir George White, a Boer war hero. Another squad fired the buildings of a golf club at a summer watering place in Somersetshire. Traces of oils and inflammable materials were found scattered about the White house, and papers inscribed "Votes for Women." A militant suffragist, Miss Olive Hocken, is on trial in London on charge of setting fire to the Roehampton Golf Club's pavilion.

Ada Patterson, a New York writer, whose name is not unknown to Continent readers, in a newspaper article a few days ago gave her answer to the question of what the militants mean to do. Miss Patterson asserts that the militants seek martyrdom, for they are firmly of the belief that if one of their number is killed, votes for women will quickly follow. "They are imbued with the spirit of men who have died at the stake," she says. "That one of them shall seriously suffer or die for the cause is their aim." Said one of them: "When one of us has been killed, by accident or intention, public sentiment will change in a day."

Minimum Wage Law in One State Already

Massachusetts has a minimum wage law for women, the first one enacted in the United States, and although it will not go into effect until next July, it is interesting to examine it, now that the subject is receiving nationwide attention through the investigation and agitation started by the Illinois senatorial committee and the state's ambitious young lieutenant governor, Mr. O'Hara. The theory of the latter is that working girls who receive liberal wages will not fall into a life of vice—a postulate which has able opponents as well as supporters. The Illinois investigators visited Washington on Saturday and asked President Wilson to call a national conference for a study of the "white slave" question.

The Massachusetts act creates a permanent wage commission with power to establish wage boards in any occupation in which the wages paid female employees are, in the commission's judgment, inadequate for self-support and maintenance of health. The wage boards are to represent employers, employees and the public, and recommendations are to follow public hearings by these boards. Finally the commission will enter its judgment as to a particular minimum wage by a decree containing the names of those employers who refuse or fail to accept the standard set. Full publicity is the only force provided for to impel acceptance of the findings. The Springfield Republican, while doubting the entire wisdom of the statute as it now stands, thinks the publicity method worth trying, and calls upon the legislature to make an appropriation sufficiently large to cover the necessarily heavy expense of obtaining and publishing the important data.

Administration's Army Policy Announced

Mr. Garrison, the new secretary of war, has given out his ideas of what should be the military policy of this nation in view of existing conditions. Secretary Garrison declares in favor of the immediate preparation of the military forces of the United States to meet emergencies, retaining the regular army at its present strength—90,000 men—with improvement of the national guard or state militia and the creation of a reserve force.

The secretary denies that he is a militarist, but says the maintenance of a compact, efficient army of limited size is the reverse of militarism. Compared with the 765,000 men in the "peace" forces of Germany and the 546,000 in France, each with lesser population and area than the United States, the American allotment seems almost minute.

The secretary proposes a reserve of trained officers and men, and a trained volunteer soldiery who would respond to the first danger call. He prefers two-year enlistments rather than the long term enlistments advocated by the house committee on military affairs in the last Congress.

—Surgeon General Blue of the United States public health service on Friday issued a brief bulletin on Dr. Friedmann's tuberculosis remedy, now under scrutiny, stating that considerable time would be necessary to carry out the investigations to a definite conclusion. Meantime patients are advised against traveling long distances in the hope of receiving treatment.

ONE HUNDRED KOREANS SET FREE

A tremendously significant and most gratifying, though unfortunately incomplete, victory for justice over oppression has been achieved in Korea by the verdict of the appellate court in Seoul on the police-manufactured case charging a large company of Koreans, mainly Christians, with conspiracy to assassinate Count Terauchi, the Japanese governor general of that province. One hundred and twenty-three defendants were prosecuted for complicity in this alleged sedition. The court below acquitted seventeen and convicted 106. The superior court, by a decision rendered Thursday, March 20, has convicted six and released as innocent the remaining hundred.

Of the six still held for the supposed crime, all have been granted a material reduction of sentence. Six men by the original verdict were sentenced to penal servitude of ten years each. Of these, one now goes free and the others are committed for six years only. Of nineteen previously receiving sentences of seven years each, all but one now escapes. The term for that one is commuted to five years.

The six still in prison are the most prominent of the defendants, including the one man among the group who has an international reputation, Baron Yun Chi Ho, president of the Methodist College in Songdo. He and four others—Yang Ki Tak, Im Chi Chung, Yi Seung Hun and An Tai Kak—stand sentenced for six-year terms, while Ok Kwan Pin, the sixth convict, is given five years. All of these men are alleged to have been leaders in the Sin Min Hoi, or New People's Society, which the Japanese insist was an association for revolution and assassination. The Koreans admit the existence of the society, but claim that its object was the peaceable education and uplift of the Korean masses. Baron Yun allowed his name to be used as one of the officials of this society, but apparently took no active part in directing it. The real leader of the movement was Yang, who served for several years as the editor of a patriotic daily published in Seoul. Im is a resident of Seoul, at whose house the government affirmed that Yun met Yang to perfect the conspiracy, although Baron Yun was able to show by unmistakable records that he was not in Seoul at all on the day alleged for this meeting. Yi and An were prominent citizens of Pyeng Yang, alleged to have been summoned to Seoul when Yun and Yang had elaborated their plot. Ok is a young man of 22 who is alleged to have been of particular use to the conspirators on account of his eloquence as a public speaker.

Lyu, who originally received as heavy a sentence as Yun, but was acquitted on this trial, is a graduate of Japan's national military academy in Tokyo, and served with the Japanese army in the Russian war. It would seem that his influential Japanese connections have worked in his favor.

Court to Be Credited with Great Courage

The verdict thus rendered at Seoul by Japanese judges unmistakably establishes the contention of The Continent that there never was the slightest real evidence to justify the allegation of Japanese police that Count Terauchi was the object of a plot of assassination. Stared in the face by a judical decision releasing a hundred men whom police charges had specifically marked as the instruments of a seditious plot, even the most biased must admit that the plot is totally disproved, even though the alleged ringleaders are still held for punishment. And this means that torture alone could have produced the purported confessions of a conspiracy.

Of course the great flaw in the finding lies in the court's failure to discharge all the defendants. But it must not be too harshly condemned for this. Although the presiding judge throughout the trial showed the most unmistakable disposition to deal fairly with all the defendants, the missionaries could see that he still labored under tremendous pressure from the military administration of the province. They had therefore but little faith in his ability to withstand the truculent demands of officials around him. That he and his colleagues under such circumstances have had the strength to go as far toward justice as they have is a monumental credit to the Japanese judiciary.

Nevertheless, this satisfaction must not be allowed to obscure sympathy and concern for Baron Yun and his six compatriots who now, standing alone, become more obviously than ever a sacrifice to the "face" of the Japanese police. It remains yet for the international protest which has liberated 117 of the unjustly accused Koreans to be exercised in behalf of the last six. For them undoubtedly an appeal will be made to the supreme court of Korea, in which the fully trusted Christian judge, Watanabe, has the deciding voice. But under the judicial practice of Japan, this court can only review points of procedure, and cannot investigate the case on its merits. So if the procedure below is technically regular, it may be impossible for Judge Watanabe to vacate these last sentences. In that case intercession for their pardon must be made to the Japanese emperor.

The Prophetic Note in the Ministry

THE TIMES call for prophets. In recent years there is an increasing appeal to the Old Testament prophets for social inspiration. Dr. Jefferson sounds a similar note in his little book on "The Minister as Prophet." Many young men who are looking forward to the ministry hear this word and wonder what there is which can be put into their preaching and their life which will make them prophets. It is worth while to stop and analyze the prophetic note, to see what are the traits which mark a man as a prophet. There seem to be five such marks.

First, a prophet sees clearly the evils of his times. That is not hard to do in these days. Hardly a week passes that another book does not appear, pointing out the evils in the church and society and personal life. Certainly, no man can be a prophet who does not go to his work with a clear vision of these evils. The first need of the church is to know the facts, to look at them without blinking and with unfailing honesty. Some men lose their prophetic power by seeing evils that do not exist. They are grumbling pessimists. Others lose the prophetic note by persistent refusal to see evils as they actually are. They are blind optimists.

Second, the prophet sees clearly the conditions that ought to be. This is the note that is missing from many of the exponents of the evils of the present day. They see the evils, but they have no ideal for their correction. They want a change from what is, but they do not know to what the change should be. A real prophet sets over against the evils of his times an ideal clear enough and definite enough to make these evils look as evil as they really are. He sees the evils in the light of his vision of what ought to be in the church and the social order and the personal life.

Third, a prophet sees clearly the way to the correction of the evils, and declares that way. Perhaps history has revealed at this point its clearest distinction between the true and the false prophet. The method of correction is in large part the test of a true prophetic message. If a man can face the evils of the times and believe that their correction lies in some nostrum, or in some easy method, he may talk in prophetic terms, but a sensitive ear will miss the note of authority. We have watched the career of one man who set out with a prophetic voice. He has run a long course and has found remedy after remedy, but they have been growing pettier all the time. There was a time when he felt that the introduction of the single tax would solve our social problems. Later he felt that there needed only to be the union of churches, and we should have our problem solved. He has proposed solution after solution. History deals firmly, but kindly, with prophets of this order.

Fourth, a true prophet believes that the way which he sees can be trod. He sees the way as God's way, and he cannot think of failure. His faith in God makes him sure that the way will yet be taken. Men may oppose or favor, they may rebel or obey, but the evils are to be solved, real order is to prevail, victory is to come. The prophet is sure of that. Edward FitzGerald, who translated Omar Khayyam, had a friend Matthews, an earnest evangelical preacher of the Church of England. He said Matthews was the only man who did not stand in the midst of the world in a maze, because "he fixed his eyes on a wooden cross and had no misgivings whatever." His sermons shook FitzGerald's soul, and he was about to become an evangelical Christian when a man without the prophetic note, and without sure conviction, estranged him again.

Finally, the true prophet is ready at any cost to himself to lead or to follow in that way which he sees. He is not content with pointing out the way. He will give himself to opening the way and leading into it. If there appears someone who can lead more successfully than he, he is ready to fall in line as a follower. Let the cause increase, even though he must decrease. The man who "climbed up in a high church steeple to be nearer to God," and who "handed down messages twice a week to God's people," need not have been surprised to find that God was down there among the people all the while, and that he was not nearer God as he got farther away from God's people. The prophet seeks seclusion only that he may keep his vision clearer, for the sake of going back into the fight itself.

In a word, the prophet knows and believes and is ready to do. Mere idealists are not prophets; mere seers of evil are not prophets; mere preachers are not prophets. Yet the time greatly needs men with the prophetic note. Lazy men are out of the question. Inaccurate men are impossible. The men who are to lead the new movements will have such marks as these we have named. We believe many young men who are now preparing for the ministry will join the ranks of those already in the ministry who sound that prophetic note.

Manse Memorial Appropriate to Cleveland

It is a pleasant thing to think of that the Presbyterian manse in the hill town of Caldwell, New Jersey, where Grover Cleveland was born in 1837, continued the home of an unbroken succession of Presbyterian pastors until it was dedicated last week to be a sacredly guarded memorial of the great American President who first saw light beneath its roof. One is glad that it was never anything else than a manse until it became a memorial. The house was never secularized; it was always a house of religion and prayer until consecrated thus to one of the nation's most reverent memories.

In his early manhood it might have been doubted whether Grover Cleveland was destined to a life worthy of his birth and raising in the family of a minister. But he was one of those men whom God saves by requiring much of them. The aimless drift of his earlier years was reversed when great opportunities and great responsibilities sobered him and made room for the native strength of his religious inheritance to reassert itself. So, long ere the climax of his career, President Grover Cleveland had grown to the stature of a noble and stalwart character, inflexibly ruled by conscience, whereof his birthplace constitutes now a highly appropriate memorial—being as it is a house founded on the purposes and organization of the church, and withal so soundly built that after 130 years it stands unaffected by time and fit for indefinite perpetuation.

Thus may it long stand to testify to American citizenship that the air of a home where religion reigns as the supreme consideration of life is an atmosphere singularly congenial to the worth of such manhood as the nation may rest on securely in hours of fluctuating standards and dubious ideals. Because this lesson must always hang about these venerable walls, so long as coming and going visitors remember the original character of the house, Presbyterianism is happy as well as proud to resign the building to the care of high-souled patriotism as embodied in the distinguished fellowship of the Cleveland Memorial Association.

No Vote for Any Self-Seeker

If the right Christian rule were observed of conferring the moderatorship of Assembly only on men who never aspired to it, it is possible that injustice would be done some men who might without ground be suspected of harboring such an ambition. Yet that would, so far as the office itself goes, be only a nominal injustice, since no man is entitled to the place nor made greater in the kingdom of heaven by holding it. And in any case men of a quality superior to personal place-hunting would far rather suffer something of discredit themselves than to see their church continue longer a victim to the scandalous practice of candidacies engineered, under the thinnest of veils and sometimes even openly, by ministers who have completely forgotten what manner of spirit they are of.

Under present circumstances there is only one way to deal an effective death blow to this evil self-seeking and the hypocrisies that have gathered around it. That is for every Assembly commissioner to take in his heart a solemn vow with himself not to vote for any nominee whom he has reason to regard as a self-promoter. The word for each commissioner to carry to the Assembly floor is the Master's injunction to beware of those who love the chief seats in the synagogues. There is no need to talk much of it; certainly no need to bandy recriminations. Just let each man vote silently by his own conscience for somebody whom he believes too humble to covet honor, and the lesson will be taught effectively to men who by the unhappy success of the method in the past have been overtempted to strain at their own bootstraps.

Generosity Replacing Justice as Paymaster

That larger kindliness which is not content with having done justice to others, but delights to multiply justice by generosity, had its way notably when a rich New York business man, James H. Ottley, distributed $100,000 of his private wealth the other day among the employees of the firm in which he had accumulated his fortune. The action of Mr. Ottley is particularly interesting because it could not possibly be interpreted to be selfish. He had no reason to coddle the recipients of his gifts. He had just sold out all his interest in the company which publishes McCall's Magazine, and this $100,000 was a totally unexpected farewell remembrance.

While the corporation's president he had paid his employees excellent wages according to the prevailing standards, and going out of business, he stood well acquitted of all economic obligations toward them.

But he wanted to do more, and after leaving sent back this $100,000, which represented not a debt in law but a debt of gratitude and friendship. Everybody who had been with the company for any considerable length of service shared in this substantial tribute to faithfulness. To many it came as a great boon in the midst of sickness or misfortune in their families. But the merit of it on the part of the giver was not in any such chance fitting into emergency needs, but in the motive of a heart whose simple impulse was to do a free-handed thing toward appreciated coworkers.

In the long run such impulses and acts as this must be the economic saving of civilization—the solution of the struggle between the "haves" and the "have nots"—just this uncompelled willingness of wealth to give more than it is obliged to pay to industrious poverty. The Ottley gift is but a small measure of what must be the increasing tendency of industry and commerce as the spirit of human brotherliness spreads. The minimum wage of compulsion must be displaced by the maximum wage of brotherly love. Not socialism imposed by a system or a law but socialism of voluntary good will is to be the ultimate note of coming economic peace.

Equal to The Hibbert Journal

Any thoughtful American, if he had the least modicum of interest in religion, must greet with pride the first issue of The Constructive Quarterly. When Dr. Silas McBee retired from the editorship of The Churchman, men of ample views in all denominations lamented it as a severe loss to current Christian thinking. But supposing that retirement to have been the necessary prelude to his organizing and putting forth The Constructive Quarterly, one should now rate the circumstance not to be loss at all but wholly gain. For the new magazine is certainly the weightiest and most stimulating intellectual production which has yet appeared in periodical literature on the western side of the Atlantic. American thinkers who have read The Hibbert Journal with a patriotic jealousy, deploring the inability of America to match its breadth and solidity, need now be jealous no longer. They can balance The Constructive against Hibbert without apology as long as its character holds at the level of its first number.

Dr. McBee's avowed purpose is to promote Christian unity by inviting men of every form of Christian faith, Catholic as well as Protestant, to set forth in his pages all their own manner of thinking about theological problems and questions of church order. Let everybody speak his mind, says the editor, but without assailing anybody else, and that is the best way to help everybody understand everybody else, which in turn is the best way of bringing to pass the unification of Christians. But lofty as this purpose is, the reader is rather happy to find that it does not dictate the whole contents of the magazine. The Constructive Quarterly is, we perceive, not to be a hobby horse. Apart from its main object there are delightful excursions into other fields where denominational differences are forgotten in larger unities and not even pale and polite reflections of contention get in the way of long and far eyesight. Such specially is Robert E. Speer's beautiful biographical tribute to the late Henry Clay Trumbull under the title, "An American Saint."

Sin Has to Be Reckoned in the Problem

Far be it from The Continent to disparage the importance of the lieutenant governor's effort in Illinois to trace the relation between less-than-living wages and the lapse of many working girls from ways of honorable industry to the better paid ways of vice. There is a relation undoubtedly that ought to be mercilessly exposed. And happily large employers in department stores and elsewhere, when examined on the witness stand, showed a better disposition toward the problem than the public had believed in. Some doubtless have been relying too implicitly on a general instruction that beginners' wages should be paid only to girls not entirely self-dependent—girls partially supported by their parents. They did not know how the rule had failed. However, nearly all the merchants examined agreed with the lieutenant governor's commission that minimum wages in any case ought to be higher. This confession alone makes a worth-while outcome of the inquiry, even if it is regarded only as an economic gain for labor and not in relation to women's virtue at all.

However, the members of the commission must realize—and we trust they will have the frankness to say in their report—that the moral ruin of young womanhood is a problem which can by no means be translated wholly into economic terms. No investigation of sin can get past the hideous fact of sin. Young girls go wrong in the world for precisely the same reason that other people go wrong—because for at least one tragic moment of illusion wrong looks lovelier than right. Sometimes it is wickedness within—more often, perhaps, wickedness without—which creates the deception, but in both instances it is wickedness—which has to be resisted by something stronger than a sufficient wage; which, in fact, can be resisted by nothing less strong than a holy heart. Of all this the commission was reminded by some pitiful letters from girls already dwelling in the pit of hell, letters confessing that sin and only sin—their own sin and the sin of their tempters—landed them where they are. No, indeed; sin can't be put out of sight by spreading over it a cover of economic discussion.

—The Roman Church proposes to celebrate the present year, 1913, as the 1600th anniversary of the Christianization of the Roman empire. It seems a little hard to figure out, however, from Constantine's history just why this particular year should be chosen for this particular anniversary. The year 313 is indeed the date of the edict of Milan, by which Constantine proclaimed religious liberty in the empire, but that edict was really only a repetition of one that Constantine had issued two years before, from which the era of tolerance, ending the old persecutions, is actually to be dated. On the other hand, it was not until 323 that Constantine openly avowed himself a Christian. Some authorities indeed give 313 as the date of the "In hoc signo vinces" vision from which Constantine dated his conversion. But the time of that event is very uncertain, to say nothing of the uncertainty of the event itself. And perhaps most Protestants would entertain considerable doubt whether the Christianization of the Roman empire, apart from the ending of the persecutions, is worthy of any celebration at all, if the highest interest of the church is solely regarded. A good many people think that Christianity stepped down rather than up when Constantine took it under his patronage.

—A storm has broken out in the Methodist Church over a book issued lately by one of the publishing agents of the denomination—Dr. George P. Mains—a book that incorporates many modern ideas of biblical criticism. In fact, the title of the volume, "Modern Thought and Traditional Faith," is of itself a fair signal that the production is not specially conservative. But we have the testimony of Zion's Herald of Boston—which has always been a jealous champion of orthodoxy and which is rather fond besides of beating up church officials—that a careful reading of Dr. Mains proves him absolutely sound on the authority of the Bible, the divine lordship of Christ and other test doctrines of accepted evangelical faith. It is safe therefore to conclude, from this indorsement—because any bias of Zion's Herald would rather run the other way—that Dr. Mains has not said anything to worry any but the supersensitive and the constitutionally timid.

It is downright against the principles of The Continent to excuse any form of mob violence. Yet those principles are put to a pretty hard strain to keep us from speaking admiringly of that Methodist preacher in Salem, Illinois, who skillfully diverted a mob from lynching a couple of lecherous villains by leading the rioters instead to wreck the "blind tigers" where the wretches got the liquor that inflamed their lust. If there could ever be a justifiable case of doing evil that good may come this would certainly qualify under that head. There was at least a justice in it which was more than poetic, and the idea of making the drink seller responsible for the crimes of the drink drinker, though lawless now, will some day undoubtedly be put into the law.

—The Chicago Tribune admits that on account of adverse public opinion beer can't now or likely ever be put back into the army canteen—though The Tribune wishes it could—and it therefore indorses Major Wotherspoon's advice to quit agitating the question and spend time improving army conditions instead. All this is a long step toward good sense on the part of both the newspaper and the army officer. May both be speedily joined by many of their respective colleagues in journalism and in the military establishment.

"The Tie That Binds" Democracy

BY GEORGE W. COLEMAN

The "Ford hall meetings" in Boston, of which the fifth anniversary has just been celebrated, are the most broadly human institution of that city, bringing into sympathetic fellowship a more comprehensive representation of varied human nature than meets together elsewhere in the New England metropolis. And this article portrays the mind which leads and really governs those gatherings. And as here clearly appears, it is a mind which conceives both religion and patriotism as culminating in human solidarity

UNLESS WE ALL get together we shall all "get left." This is as true and quite as serious a statement as Franklin's famous bon mot to the signers of the declaration of independence, in which he declared that "we must all hang together or we shall all hang separately."

Any democracy will fall apart if no means are afforded for its component elements to get together. Our American democracy is both by nature and intent increasingly heterogeneous. Most powerful forces are dividing and separating us into many classes. Is there anything in our common life that is pulling us all together? If we can unite our differences we shall be the stronger because of them, but if they keep us apart they will be our destruction.

Our democracy is written into our constitution and it is written on our hearts. Are we living it? "Less and less" is the answer of many keen observers whose vision covers a wide range.

In every city and town that I know anything about people are sharply divided into various classes which are either indifferent or hostile to each other, and there is no common meeting ground. Gentiles and Jews do business together, but do not mix socially or religiously. Catholics and Protestants are widely separated, but hardly more so than Unitarians and Baptists, Christian Scientists and Presbyterians. Republicans and Democrats, Prohibitionists and Socialists come together, if at all, only for bitter partisan warfare. Employer and employee may be housed under the same roof in industry and commerce, but each class is combining for protection against the aggressions of the other. The rich and poor live in the same city or town, but on different streets and in sections of the community that have nothing to do with each other. The cultured and the vulgar, be they rich or poor, naturally draw apart from one another.

Well, what of it? Hasn't it always been so and will it not continue to the end of things? Are Jews to turn Christians, or Protestants to return to the Catholic Church? Are all employees to become employers, and are we all to reach a common level of wealth and leisure and culture? While we are waiting for such a millennium the American democracy, which is the world's greatest hope for utopian days, may, through sheer disintegration, go all to pieces.

Welding Influences of Today Inadequate

But all these varying and conflicting elements have been, in our earlier history, fused into one common life. The New England town meeting idea, with all its progeny; the free public school, with all its marvelous expansion; the free press, with its amazing developments, have been the instruments which have hitherto sufficed to weld together the strongly conflicting elements of American life. But they are now proving inadequate.

Urban life has grown so large and complex that the town meeting idea has become impossible in large centers and has grown obsolete and futile in the smaller communities. The public school, in spite of the private and parochial school, is still our greatest solvent, but is wholly inadequate to compete with the masterful forces of the times in that it has the pupils under its ministrations only eight or ten years, when they leave the democratic ideals of the schoolroom and for all the rest of their lives are plunged deep into the "classocracy" of everyday living. And our free press has fallen into a class stratification which only mirrors and intensifies the separations already existing. We read the journals that represent our point of view in politics, in religion and in social and economic ideas. Few indeed are those who take the trouble to read the other fellow's daily paper, the other man's class publication, the opposite side's magazine. Do you take a socialist paper, a labor union publication, a Jewish weekly, or a yellow journal?

A democracy must be made homogeneous in its ideals, even though it be made up of elements drawn from the ends of the earth. And those ideals cannot be superimposed from without nor handed down from above by one class to the others, but they must be evolved from the entire mass. The people must together work out their own salvation.

Are we doing it? Is there any place in all this broad land where we all get together habitually to talk over in friendly spirit our common concerns? Can we accomplish our purpose at all unless we actually get together in person? Would it suffice for us to read about each other? Is it enough that the male half of us several times a year go up to the same ballot box and register our decisions? Will it do, that we can remember the days twenty-five years ago when we went to school with Isaac and Patrick and Fritz and Tony, no one of whom we have had relations with since?

In old Roman days they had the forum. In old colonial days they had the New England town meeting. What have we that corresponds for these twentieth century days? The social settlement in the congested districts of our great cities feels keenly this great need and meets it in a very limited way. The use of the public schools as a social center is a more direct attempt to solve this problem and it succeeds admirably within the limits of the district which it serves.

For the city as a whole and for the general run of towns there is, with but a few significant exceptions, no common meeting ground for well-intentioned citizens of every variety to come together, to get acquainted, to share ideas, to mold public opinion and to shape the common life.

Suggested Means for "Getting Together"

You say it can't be done? Let me reply, pointedly, it is being done in different cities and in various ways. And may I make bold to assert that it can be done in any city or town (each, it may be, in its own special way), provided one man can be found in the place who believes profoundly that it ought to be done?

There has been such a gathering in Cooper union, New York City, every Sunday night for fifteen years. In Rochester, New York, for the last five years there has been such a meeting in a theater on Sunday nights. New Orleans had one Sunday afternoons last winter. Chicago has something very much like it. Boston has operated one since 1908. Minneapolis, Denver, Colorado Springs, Dallas, have each had little groups of men who are very much interested in this idea.

Perhaps the Boston meeting more nearly than any other brings together in mutual accord all the varying elements of the city's life. And it is the more interesting to the readers of this paper, because it is distinctly and exclusively promoted, supported and engineered under denominational auspices. But it is not my purpose here to describe the Ford hall meetings, with which some of you are already familiar, but to emphasize the fact that these meetings have for five years brought together every Sunday night honest-minded, true-hearted Jews and gentiles, Catholics and Protestants, agnostics and atheists, employers and employees, the rich and the poor, the learned and the ignorant, the privileged and the unfavored, who have enjoyed each other's presence, have profited from an exchange of ideas, have learned mutual respect and toleration, and, in so far as the influence of from 5,000 to 10,000 people may go in a center of a million population, have made real democracy just so much more possible than it was before these meetings began to exert their influence on the life of old Boston.

There ought to be at least a score of such meetings in a center the size of Boston, and each one of them might most advantageously take on its own special character. This one effort has already prospered sufficiently to be recognized generally as one of the institutions of Boston. Here the people, all the people (representatively), come together—not to campaign, not to legislate, not to protest and criticise and tear down, but to get inspiration, to gather knowledge, to exchange ideas, to lift up ideals, to unfetter truth and to stimulate a taste for better things.

Think of the transformations that would be wrought in any town after a few years if all the elements of its citizenship could be brought together regularly for the consideration of everything and anything relating to the common life. It isn't enough that it should be simply a forum for the airing of views. It must be something more than a platform for the making of speeches. It must not be confined to the spiritual conventions of any religion, but it must be shot through and through with moral and spiritual purpose. To this end it must not be either a lyceum or a service.

But I clearly recognize that while this may be my ideal for such a meeting, others will work out quite different conceptions. It matters little how it is done so long as you succeed in getting together fair representations of all those who have good will and who want to do something to make it count.

Widely Varying Views No Bar to Profitable Discussion

There is another very helpful way in which this interest in the common life may be nurtured and promoted. I have found from six years' experience with an ever-increasing group of guests at my summer home at Sagamore Beach each season that it is possible to bring together in the most helpful association a group of men and women each one of whom is a leader in his own field, but all of whom are as widely differentiated from one another in point of view and method of approach as are the varying elements in the more popular gathering of which I have spoken. At the Sagamore sociological conference each summer we have together 200 leading men and women as diverse from each other as could be imagined, who, nevertheless, invariably find a common ground of intense fellowship as they proceed to discuss together the livest topics of the day.

In this gathering the Methodist bishop, the Jewish rabbi, the Catholic editor, the ethical culture leader and the outspoken agnostic can sit down with many others and discuss "Scientific Management in the Churches" to their mutual profit and satisfaction. The captain of industry, the labor union leader, the aggressive socialist and the philosophical anarchist will walk the beach till long after midnight thrashing out together their widely divergent views. The southern gentleman and the colored man of the legal profession discuss together with the home missionary educator the progress that the negroes are making. The school teacher, the social settlement worker, the playwright and the actress occupy the same cottage together and continue ad libitum the discussion of the last session of the conference. And they all mingle together in the most beautiful fellowship. Never before, perhaps, having met or talked with anyone so far removed from their own walk in life, they are amazed and uplifted to find so many and such substantial and harmonious points of contact.

Thus it is that with the greatest leaders of thought and action, as well as with the rank and file of the people, I have found that it is possible to get all sorts of people together for a happy and profitable discussion of the many things that relate to our common life.

The supreme test came when, after waiting four years to get my courage up to it and to pick my way toward it, I tried a free and searching discussion of the problems of sex in the midst of a company of 200 leading men and women. We went into it in all its ramifications, frankly, sanely, wholesomely. I had never expected to live to see such a thing done. It was a wonderful occasion. I am determined now to try out a similar discussion with the Ford hall Sunday evening audience. If we win out it will mark a great step in advance.

Let us return now to the place where we started. We are fearfully divided up and separated from each other into all manner of sects, parties, classes and cliques. Democracy cannot long survive without a mutual flowing together of all its component elements. We have manifestly lost the facilities for meeting together; we have no common ground upon which we can all stand. On the other hand, it is just as manifest by these illustrations that I have given that we have not lost the ability to mingle together when the opportunity is afforded; and we can find a common meeting ground. It has been done already, and it can be much better done and the occasions multiplied indefinitely.

Stimulus Comes from Contact with Other Minds

There is one more very important element to be considered in this plan to get everybody together. It is a great gain without any loss. Each individual retains completely his entire individuality. He neither forfeits nor compromises his faith, his methods or his position. He goes back to his work just as he came, except that he is stimulated and cheered by the realization that the strength, ability and devotion of many others are being spent in different ways to accomplish the same end—the blessing of the people.

The man who loves his family but has no love for his country is just like the man who loves his church, his party, his business, his union or his class, but has no interest at all in other people who are struggling as best they can in their own way to attain their own ideals. A strong interest in the common life is as consistent with a strong development of the individual life as patriotism is consistent with family love. That sounds axiomatic, but so far as the interests of the common life are concerned we have almost entirely forsaken the assembling of ourselves together. If that function is necessary to the life of the church, how can we expect to dispense with it altogether in the life of democracy?

But we do not need to look upon it as a duty, for it affords the keenest joy. There is no place, not even among the brethren and sisters of the household of faith, where I receive a greater stimulus to high thinking and noble living than right in the midst of the fellowship of the common life. Just for my own spiritual exaltation I would rather be in Cooper union of a Sunday night than in most evening church services. At Ford hall, in Boston, every Sunday evening during the winter months I get a great blessing from my fellowship with the common people. And the wider apart we are in faith and practice the greater is the inspiration when we find ourselves in heartiest accord on some great fundamental truth.

It seems providential that we are beginning to find a way of getting together just at a time when for the safety of our common life there is the greatest need of it. The clamor of class warfare grows more portentous every year. People occupying neutral ground are fast being driven into one camp or the other by the extremes of either side. The powerful and implacable reactionary is breeding socialists and anarchists faster than all the radical propaganda of our times. The bitterness and the violence of the mob are breeding extreme conservatives faster than they can be developed by any other means. The gulf between the privileged and the unfortunate, the distance between the rich and the poor, the misunderstanding between the radical and the conservative, grows more pronounced all the time. We cannot change the status of these different groups by any process of legerdemain. There is no panacea for all our troubles. We cannot hope for any immediate solution of our difficulties, but we must get together; we ought to talk it over face to face; we are bound to hear with our own ears what the others have to say; we must look each other in the eyes before we give way to disgust or hate; and we must do this thing in every nook and corner of the country. There must be a place in every community where all the people can meet to discuss together the interests of all the people. If our present local governments are not democratic enough to supply the place and the management for such gatherings of the people, then it must be supplied by private initiative.

We must all get together or we shall all "get left."

"I Am a Man of Thirty"

For thirty years I have been receiving the benefits of civilization. Hospitals have been open to me when I have been sick. Schools have trained my mind and hand. Colleges, founded by men of broad vision and maintained by those who have devoted their wealth to others, have helped add to my store of knowledge.

Through my ancestors I have in my being the experience of unknown ages. Ideas inherited from the Christian system have put democratic ideals deep in my soul. I am the citizen of a country for the wise government of which I am in large part indebted to early seers.

Literature and art, sprung from the story of the life of a man who for three short years talked to men, have added to my development.

As I approach the age at which Christ entered his work it is proper that I ask myself what I have to offer the world for all I have received.

Have I developed myself symmetrically? Am I prepared for my opportunity; am I as sound physically and morally as I might be; have I permitted the soil of the world to smirch my soul? Can I face my wife without shame and my children without remorse?

If in three years I am called to account, is it likely that my work will have been worth remembering?

Have I done anything to add to the happiness or comfort of my fellow man?

I face the fullness of my powers. May I assure myself that my past life has been such as to give promise that before my course is run I shall have returned a full measure of active thanks for the good I have received?

As a man of 30, what sort of man am I? A. B. C

To Increase the Attractiveness

A superintendent of a city Sunday school endeavored to give the summer meetings added attractiveness. Upon a certain warm Sunday in August lemonade was served. At the close of the service the superintendent announced that slips of paper would be passed around and the pupils allowed to make suggestions as to methods of making the meetings still more attractive. One youngster wrote: "Put more sugar in the lemonade."—Tit-Bits.

In the Icy Sea—with God Near

BY WILFRED T. GRENFELL

This battle of six fishermen of the Labrador was told Dr. Grenfell by one of the hardy natives. Their small ship stuck between bowlders near the shore and they were swept to sea on a pile of lumber as a rude raft. The houses on the shore of an island were easily visible, but all day their crude signals were unseen until the breakers split their craft in two, leaving four men on one part and two on the other. Bidding each other good-by, the men clung to the boards and fought for life, with death in sight, and there we left them last week. Here is the conclusion of the story

"SOON IT BECAME apparent, to our dismay, that the larger raft was leaving the other behind. I kept calling to my brother to try and keep together, and to hold up the planks to catch the wind, but they appeared to have none to spare. We ourselves forced several boards straight down into the sea through our own pile, holding them there fast so that they might act as drags. But we had no control, and still continued to forge ahead.

"As the distance widened we still shouted to them occasionally to keep up their courage, but at last we had to bid them good-by, for fear we might drift out of earshot, and then it would be too late.

* * * * *

"Just at that moment another wonderful thing happened. The wind veered again, bringing the low island more to leeward of us, and at once we realized that there was still another chance to be saved. We could see that it would only be by a few yards at best, but it was at least possible. Anyhow, it again gave us new pluck, and though we did not pray out loud about it, or perhaps in words, I guess we all did pray somehow. I know I did. And we doubled our efforts to attract the attention of the men on the island.

"By balancing carefully we could still stand upright on the raft, though the planks were all the time getting fewer. Though no one could possibly have heard us, and no one appeared to see us, we kept shouting and waving all we could. Meanwhile we still worked our hardest to try and turn the raft, so that she might slew as much as possible to windward.

Map Showing Dr. Grenfell's Work in Labrador and Newfoundland

"Already the daylight was beginning to go again. It must have been about 4 in the afternoon when we made out two men moving on the island, which was then not more than half a mile distant from us. It wasn't long before we knew that they had seen us. Meanwhile, the wind had increased again considerably in the new direction, and everywhere there was white water on the wave crests. Much more came over us on our poor raft. But cold as it must have been, we no longer even noticed it. Our whole minds were occupied with watching the surf line of the island. It seemed strange to us that no boat came out to meet us. For we drifted so terribly slowly, and it was getting darker and darker all the time. We might have known, however, that no boat could possibly have lived through such a sea.

WOULD WE MISS THE ISLAND AND PERISH?

"At last we were really close in, and we were driving so close to the point that one minute we were sure we should drive ashore and be saved, and the next we were equally positive that we should miss the island and all perish together. The minutes went like hours; the cold and wet and hunger were all forgotten. The old man was now lying just stretched out on the boards, and it was all we could do to keep him from being washed away. Now the surf on the point was roaring so loud that we could no longer hear one another speak, but as the raft rose and fell on the sea we could make out the men on the land beckoning, and evidently shouting. We could hear nothing that they said, and could have done nothing to help, anyway.

"The other raft was about 300 or 400 yards away from us, and was just that much nearer the end of the island. They were still all right aboard her, and we could see now and again that they were doing their best to claw her to windward. Once in a while we waved to them to keep on trying.

"Then suddenly without any warning our own raft rose on the top of a huge breaker, a sea rushed all over us, and our crazy bunch of boards struck the bottom with a furious crash. We had washed right in to the line of huge bowlders which the floe ice drops everywhere in the spring around the landwash. Fortunately for us the tide was at half flood, so that sea after sea washed us farther in over the outermost rocks, till I suppose we were more or less protected from the heaviest combers of the deep water outside. But even now without help we knew that none of us could hope to reach the shore alive. Indeed we could not have done so, if the men on the shore had not been there. There were only two of them, but they roped themselves together, and we could see that one of them was beginning to work himself out into the sea as far as he dared. He had brought with him a light line, which, with the aid of a stone and stick, he at last succeeded in flinging over us.

"How the boards had kept together all this time no man on earth can say, but as soon as I caught the line I hauled in as much of it as I could, and lashed to it the old man, and another who had now nearly gone also. We other two clung to the long end and also to the raft. We soon found, however, that they were not strong enough on the land to drag two helpless bodies through the surf, so we lashed ourselves onto the end as best we could and jumped clear of the boards into the sea. Though we were washed over and knocked about badly, we were able to find bottom somehow, and just held on tight when the backwash came sweeping out. Then between the seas we could shove and help a little with what strength there was left in us. So when the sea began to rush in again we were all huddled together, and thrown up nearer to the shore, and at last, more dead than alive, we were all four dragged out on the beach.

A LAST GOOD-BY TO THE OTHER RAFT

"Meanwhile the two men had seen the second raft, and without any delay rushed off to the point to see if they could save the others. I was myself just able to follow them, but that was all. Their boat was small and her oars were useless. It was absolutely impossible to launch her through the breakers, so as to try and cut off the raft as she came along. Yes, if they had thought earlier of dragging her to the other side of the island they might have got clear, but then they certainly would never have got back in such a sea and wind. All we could do was to stand there watching the other raft. It was just off the point now. We could plainly see my brother and my sister's husband, and we saw that they could see us, for they waved to us and we to them. But we knew that this time it was really a last good-by. Their raft missed the point by a hundred yards, and drifted slowly out to sea. Again and again we saw them waving. Those were the most awful moments of my life, for I knew that they knew they were lost men. So they passed out of sight and we never saw them again.

"We started at once to make bonfires on the island to attract attention, and indeed it was by that they learned the same night on the mainland that help was needed on the island. But it was two days before a schooner could get to us, and then, though they searched the sea for miles, nothing but a few sorry remains of lumber scattered on the water was found. That night while we were warm and dry and had hot food and shelter for our own bodies our minds were away out on that other raft with those who were perishing. There was no rest or sleep for us. There was nothing—nothing—nothing which we would not have done or given up to save them.

"We had been through it ourselves, you see, and then they were our brothers. To think of them perishing while we could do nothing nearly drove us crazy. The keeper of the lighthouse never got over it. He had to resign and leave. He couldn't endure the constant reminders—'Well, they might have seen us earlier in the day, or the boat might have been in good order, or they might have thought of carrying her to the lee side of the island, or if they had gone out they might have lived through the night, and fetched up at one solitary rock ten miles out to sea which has a light on it'—well, they might have done anything. We would have cut off our right hands willingly if it would have done any good. Yes, doctor, we don't always see what we can do because we don't look out."

There was a brief silence as I suddenly remembered that we were standing in the chapel, and that "divine service," so called, was just

Betterment Through Kindliness

BY LEE McCRAE

WHICH ARE YOU—an optimist or a pessimist, or a pendulum creature swinging from one extreme to the other according as things go well or ill with you? Now a pessimist (of the ultra type) says, "Everything is bad and getting worse." He is looking at the world through a crack in the fence and with one sore eye.

An optimist (of the ultra type) declares, "Everything is all right." He has shut one eye, and is holding up a rose-colored glass to the other one. He is the sort they make Christian Scientists of—the people who at one fell swoop take all charity and sympathy out of humanity by saying there is no poverty, no tuberculosis, no sickness of any kind, no trouble, no evil.

But between the silly optimist, who would have us smile and smile whatever happens, and the pessimist, who bids us scowl and scold and thus make bad worse, why can we not take the sane middle way and call ourselves "meliorists"? Why not bravely face life and life's conditions as they are and say, "Nothing is so good it cannot be made better; nothing so bad it cannot be made good, and I am here to help both."

For there are times and places where neither smiling nor scowling does a bit of good, where only kindliness of the tangible sort does it. And it is so easy—if you just get started to thinking and doing "little nicenesses," as my small neighbor calls them.

And people are doing them! In one short day I came across these "meliorists":

A dressmaker with a large patronage who reserves one week every summer to sewing for the children in the Mercy home.

Two laundries which volunteered to do all the washing free of charge for the Newsies' Club, the only home of many of these poor newsboys.

Then I picked up a daily paper that carries this standing suggestion in its columns: "When done with this paper on the train, kindly roll it up and throw it out of the window to the first group of section hands you see."

"That's what I call benevolence!" I exclaimed, pointing out the item to a traveling man.

"Yes," he replied, "but I beat 'em to it! For several years I've been tossing papers and magazines to forlorn little cabins along this road. You just ought to see the kids—and grown people, too, for that matter—run out and grab them! It's lots of fun!"

Surely a meliorist is he in sorely needed places!

A young stenographer and a young school teacher, barely acquainted, frequently passed each other on the street on their way to business. One day the stenographer stopped abruptly, held out her hand and said impulsively, "I wish I could tell you how much your cheery 'Good mornings' have meant to me!"

A man driving downtown every morning in his four passenger machine seldom goes alone, but the people in the back seat are not often his friends, nor even acquaintances half the time. Says he: "Why should I pass a man—or a lady, for that matter—standing on the corner waiting for a car? I ask them politely to ride; then I don't talk, but just pay attention to my wheel until I let them out at Main and 1st. It saves them time and nickels, and takes hardly an extra drop of gasoline. Why shouldn't I?"

Another meliorist he!

There is enough good food put into garbage cans every morning to feed all the hungry. There are enough dead people's clothes packed away in sentiment—and moth balls—to keep every shivery body warm in winter! What the world wants is more thought—no, more desire to "make better," for then the thought and deed would follow.

These are given just as "that-reminds-me" stories to set you to wishing.

Lucy Laney of Augusta, Georgia

HERMA N. CLARK

SHE IS JUST a plain, little, colored woman, in a shabby black gown, but she is truly a "woman of influence." Years hence, it is safe to say, her name will stand high on the roll of those who have rendered conspicuous service to her race, for in the heart of the "black belt" Lucy Laney has established, with pitifully meager funds, a school for colored boys and girls, called "Haines Normal and Industrial Institute."

Here sewing, cooking and general housework are taught the girls, while the boys learn printing, carpentry and shoemaking. In addition, there are well arranged courses of study, from the kindergarten to the college preparatory, and in every department the formation of character is thought of first of all.

Lucy Laney

Who is the woman who has planned this institution and made it a reality?

Her history is somewhat like that of Booker Washington, for she, too, came up from slavery.

When the slaves were freed, Lucy Laney was a child of 6 years, yet she seemed to feel, at that early age, that she must do something to help her people. Her father, a slave himself, belonged to one master, her mother to another, but they were permitted to live in their own little cabin, a privilege not enjoyed by all slaves. Both seem to have been superior people, sound morally and full of good deeds, and Miss Laney says she never remembers the time when they did not have at least two other children, besides their own twelve, to care for.

The sister of the owner of Lucy's mother, seeing the unusual intelligence of the little black girl, took great interest in teaching her privately, and at the age of 12 this child, "with just unshackled feet," could read Cæsar. She graduated, at the age of 16, from Atlanta University, the oldest school for negroes in the South.

She taught in the public schools for several years, accumulating experience and saving every penny she could for the realization of her dear dream. It had crystallized now into the determination to establish a school for the children of her race in Augusta, Georgia.

At last she launched her enterprise. She rented a two-story, rickety house for a dormitory, and an old barn for a schoolroom, hiring her teachers and paying them from her own savings.

Following the advice of the minister of the Presbyterian church (white) of Augusta, she made her way to the General Assembly of the Northern Presbyterian Church in 1886. There—it was in Minneapolis the Assembly met that year—she told her brave little story in such an eloquent way that her school was taken under the protection of the Freedmen's Board of that church.

Though this was a proud and happy day for the courageous little colored woman, because it meant indorsement of her work, it did not bring great financial prosperity. The buildings are far from adequate, but even with her poorly equipped plant Miss Laney is giving an all around training to approximately a thousand students, who, in their turn, go out from the school filled with the desire to help their people to greater thrift, to better living, to nobler lives.

BRADFORD HORTON, MAN

BY RICHARD S. HOLMES

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters—Bradford Horton, working his way through Prestonbury Theological Seminary, becomes entangled in a money theft which not only threatens his reputation but also puts him in a false position with regard to his parentage. Two friends remain openly loyal during his trouble. A third, Miss Elmore, though less outspoken in her championship, displays sufficient loyalty to give her father considerable uneasiness. He is, therefore, relieved in mind when, at the beginning of a long foreign tour, he sees that she has won the love of a young Scotchman. His relief is short-lived, however. A hot defense of Horton in a discussion results in an open breach with her father. Mr. Elmore, resenting her defiance of his wishes, collapses under the strain, but after several months' illness he forgives her and reconciliation follows. In the meantime Horton is called to his home to straighten out affairs in the bank founded by his adopted father, which has been wrecked by ventures in Wall street. To aid him in this work, and in a spirit of noblesse oblige, Horton sends for Oren-Toole, through whose jealous machinations his fair name had been smirched. Friendship between the two men results. A sheriff's sale is arranged to satisfy a judgment decree against the Horton estate. Bradford plans to bid in the old home for his mother, from whom he has been estranged because of his determination to enter the ministry. Oren-Toole's services are enlisted in the scheme, which is successfully carred through. Horton finds his chief recreation in rowing on the lake just out of Prestonbury. His boat bears the name Antigone, the name by which, in his heart, he has long called Miss Elmore. He shares his boat with Austin Sleighton.

CHAPTER XXI.

Drama Done Into Real Life

As the winter drew on it became more and more evident that Sleighton, the earnest theologian, untrained in social conventions, was developing rapidly into a new Sleighton of multiplying social accomplishment. His diffidence had been due largely to lack of social advantages in his early life, and his touch with Prestonbury society, especially through the medium of the Shakespeare Club, was giving him the opportunity he had never had.

In one direction, however, he was unable to overcome his diffidence. He had not yet called upon Miss Jickers. Longing to see more of her, he had not come to the point of accepting her invitation, when chance brought it about that he was cast for Malvolio in "Twelfth Night" and Lucy for Olivia, and the young lady proposed that he should come to her home some evening to rehearse the dialogue parts between them. Nothing could have pleased Sleighton better, and he named a night for the rehearsal with alacrity.

"What's up, A. S.?" inquired Horton when a few evenings later his friend appeared at supper with an extra curl to his black hair and a flaming red tie made in a bow with spreading ends. "What's the danger?"

"Danger? Who said anything about danger? What do you mean?"

"Nothing, only I saw you had your red flag out."

"That's no danger signal," he replied. "That's the flag of conquest. I'm going to see a girl."

"Who's the fortunate one, A. S.?" asked Horton as the table laughed. "Whither are you going?"

"Oh, you know! Shut up, can't you?"

"Haven't you been there yet? You're wasting your chances, A. S."

But the tormenting banter of his friends could not destroy Sleighton's pleasure in that evening. They read together, and Lucy asked all sorts of questions about the dialogue, and about how she should read this and that and the other of her lines, and then he had to read them for her, and they both laughed a great deal, and the evening was gone before he knew it.

"Now you've found your way here," said Lucy, as he was taking his departure, "you must be sure to come again. Don't wait till we're cast for leading parts together, for that may not happen soon."

Austin Sleighton went home as one who treads on air.

The Shakespeare Club was astonished at its next reading. Sleighton had been coming little by little to hold the place of star performer, but he surpassed even himself in his picturesquely absurd rendering of the vain and ridiculous character whose nature he seemed really to assume. "He's mistaken his calling," said those who listened. "He ought to go on the stage, not the platform."

But to Sleighton the little triumph was nothing compared to his walk home after the club dispersed. Ansley was not present, and he seized the opportunity to offer himself as escort to Miss Jickers. The four blocks they had to traverse to her house seemed to Austin like a trip through space to the stars, and his heart thumped so he was afraid Lucy would hear it. He longed to tell her that this was the most blissful moment of his life so far, but since he dared not say that, he said nothing, until he awakened from his happy dream to realize that Lucy was trying to bring him out of his stupid silence and into an approach to the animation that had marked him during the evening. He apologized for his dullness, and for the rest of the distance basked in her praises of his performance as Malvolio.

The ice was broken. Thereafter he found no difficulty in calling upon Miss Jickers. He began by appearing at the Jickers mansion at intervals of two weeks, sometimes seeing Lucy alone, sometimes joined by her father and mother, and perhaps rather monopolized by the old doctor, who "loved to talk to students," as his daughter put it. By the time December was well under way his calls had become weekly occurrences, and his near friends were well aware of the attraction.

Mrs. Elmore, indeed, had seen through him on the "Twelfth Night" occasion. Coming home that night she had made report to Bradford that his friend had gone home with Lucy, adding, "Unless I am woefully deceived, he is very much in love with her." Bradford had scouted the idea, but events served to convince him of its correctness, though he was too busy at Mrs. Elmore's piano practicing for his holiday oratorio engagements to devote much of his spare time to Sleighton's affairs.

Stopping in at the drug store the day before his start East for the first of his engagements, Bradford found Joe full of the subject. "Your honor," he began, "I don't know whether I'm for prosecution or defense, but I must say the do-re-mi man is progressing. If he should be charged with intentions on the liberties of a certain individual, you know, and with detaining said individual in the parlor of Dr. John Jickers for hours, you know, he couldn't prove an alibi."

"I don't much believe he'd try, J. J. I think he'd plead guilty."

"What? And not have a trial? I tell you there ought to be a trial. It's a case; it's a sure case, and I want to be counsel for the prosecution. No, sir! Don't let him plead guilty."

"Shall I tell him you favor a suit?" laughed Bradford. "His suit, for example?"

"No, your honor. Do-re-mi's progressing all right. He'll get there without your help or mine. It's a case, your honor—it surely is a case."

When the Shakespeare Club resumed its meetings after the holidays the play committee announced "Ingomar" for the last week in January, with Lucy Jickers as Parthenia and Sleighton as Ingomar. There was a little murmur of surprised merriment at the notice, for not even those who were most intimate with Lucy dreamed that she returned the evident and transparent interest of her admirer. But the surprise which the reading of the play brought the girl nearly betrayed her before them all.

The last of January came, and the evening reading began tamely enough. As the members of the cast warmed to their work, however, it was plain that Ingomar Sleighton was giving the most realistic rendering of his lines that had ever been heard by a Prestonbury audience. "Would you think," someone whispered to Mrs. Elmore, "that so staid and matter-of-fact a man could read that just as if he were really dead in love with Parthenia?"

"Perhaps he is—with Parthenia Jickers," was the laughing response.

By and by came the lines about "two souls" and "two hearts," and Sleighton's love-lorn rendition of them at the climactic moment frightened Lucy a little, so fervent was it. At that precise moment, however, came an interruption in the person of Ansley Jickers, and under cover of the little stir of welcome to him Sleighton whispered swiftly, "Lucy, Lucy dear, let's have it that way always; you and I, you know, always. Shall we? Always, you and I?"

The crimson flooded her face, but a beautiful light shone in her eyes as she whispered back, "Yes, Austin; you and I, always."

The whispered exchange took but a moment, and the reading was resumed. But Ansley Jickers had seen the little colloquy and had read his sister's face. At the end of the play, when the company dispersed, he explained to Sleighton that he would be unable to accompany Lucy home, and asked him to take his place. "Lu, dear," he said, turning to her as she came up, "I've asked Mr. Sleighton

THE HOME COUNCIL

Renewal Through Change of Viewpoint

BY ANNE GUILBERT MAHON

"WHEN I GET very weary and find myself feeling depressed and nervous, I just change my viewpoint," said a woman whose source of livelihood was her needle and who was, consequently, much confined to her own four walls.

"Sometimes," she continued, "if I can take a few moments of leisure, I slip on my hat and coat and go for a brisk walk around the block. You have no idea how that short walk refreshes me. It takes but five minutes, and I soon make up for the lost time in the renewed energy with which the walk in the fresh air supplies me. I never consider it lost time by any means. To get the most benefit from the walk I make it a point to notice everything along the way, just giving myself up to the little outing and not allowing myself to think of my work or anything harassing. I feel like a different woman when I return to my sewing.

"But there are times," she added, "when I am very much rushed and feel that I cannot take time even for a five minute walk. At such times, when I find myself growing very jaded and weary, I take my sewing from one room into another. Fortunately the outlook from my front window and that from the back are entirely different. The front looks out upon bustling city streets, with much traffic and many things going on. The back window looks upon pleasant green gardens, trim flower beds, green hedges and grass plots. The change in outlook refreshes me wonderfully and is almost as good as going out.

"Just try a similar change of outlook when you find yourself getting tired and depressed over your work. See if it does not refresh and revive you."

She was right. A new outlook, though perhaps not a cure for weariness, depression, sorrow, means renewal of spirit to endure. The change of viewpoint which it brings carries with it refreshment and strength. Monotony of any kind wears far more than work itself, and the woman who is able to change her viewpoint and get the resultant mental rest and stimulation, even while she continues her work, has within her grasp a blessing that too few women really appreciate.

"I can never be thankful enough for Charles Dickens's works," says another woman. "At a time of great sorrow, when I was forced to be shut in with my grief, I fled to his books for forgetfulness of myself and my sorrow. They took me completely out of myself. I felt as if I had been away, actually, and I never can tell the good they did me nor the way they helped me over that hard time."

She, too, had learned the secret of changing her viewpoint. Her individual way of accomplishing this was to lose herself in the scenes and events contained in the books of the great novelist. It is not always possible for us to get away from our environment when we are weary or troubled. We, too, are often shut in with our grief. But some new viewpoint is always possible to us. Very few of us are so limited in our resources that every way of escape is cut off.

An invalid, one who has been bedridden for many years and who is absolutely unable to change her physical viewpoint—since her one window looks out only upon the bare brick wall of the next door building—yet found it possible to change her viewpoint mentally.

"I was taking a little journey," she explained smilingly to a friend who had come in and found her lying with closed eyes and a perfectly happy expression of countenance.

"When I get tired of the pain and the weariness of lying here," she continued, "I close my eyes and take a little trip in my mind. When I was young I was fortunately able to go around a good deal and I saw many beautiful places, all of which I distinctly remember. Now, I just imagine to myself that I am taking those trips, stage by stage, and enjoying them over again."

Helpless, bedridden, suffering, confined to one spot as she was, she, too, had learned the magic of change, and the rest which resulted.

Shut in, weary, depressed, sorrowful each one of us may be at times, but even so there is little reason why we should not follow the example of these women. It really makes very little difference what avenue of change we follow, just so it leads to the desired end. Reading, walking, gardening, calling, exercise, a different kind of work, even absolute quiet with a restful day dream in it may have its mission of strength and refreshment. Whatever turns the current of thought into new channels will be effective. There never yet was a rut that didn't have its own special kind of fag attached to it. Change and rut-fag can't run in double harness.

Verses Old and New

BE TRUE

Thou must be true thyself,
  If thou the truth wouldst teach;
Thy soul must overflow, if thou
  Another's soul wouldst reach;
It needs the overflow of heart
  To give the lips full speech.

Think truly, and thy thoughts
  Shall the world's famine feed;
Speak truly, and each word of thine
  Shall be a fruitful seed;
Live truly, and thy life shall be
  A great and noble creed.
—Horatius Bonar.

The very generous response which has come from our Home Councilors to Mr. Weir's request for information as to the authorship of these verses shows that they are loved in many homes. "For years I have had that poem pasted in my Bagster Bible," writes one. Another says, "I found it in an old scrapbook."

Horatius Bonar, D. D., was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1808, and died there in 1889. He was also the author of "I Was a Wandering Sheep," "I Heard the Voice of Jesus Say," "Beyond the Smiling and the Weeping" and many other familiar hymns. One of our Councilors tells how the late Ira D. Sankey said of Dr. Bonar: "A man who could write such hymns as those and not allow them sung in his own church, because it was a 'psalm singing church,' was indeed a rare man."

The poem, "Be True," is given entire in the hope that it may give the help to all that it has already given to many.

How Do You Spend It?

The movement for a "sane Fourth" has become countrywide in its sweep; but, in common with most reform movements, it has opened the way for new problems. One of these problems has to do, of course, with keeping the Fourth a day of vigorous patriotism while at the same time stripping it of those features which made it especially "glorious" to Young America. There is undoubted danger of denaturing the day to such an extent that it will fail of the strong appeal it has heretofore made to our children.

The Home Council asks the cooperation of its readers in helping it to overcome this difficulty. You all have Fourths, fellow Councilors, and without doubt they are both "sane" and interesting. Will you not tell us how you have made them so, that other fathers and mothers may have the benefit of your experiences in making Independence Day plans of their own?

The Continent will pay $1 apiece for suggestions for sane Fourth of July celebrations, containing not more than 350 words, which it considers really helpful and worth while. These suggestions must be the result of actual experiences, tried out personally and proved successful. All suggestions must be at the Continent office by May 15.

The heart of childhood, and particularly of boy childhood, still hungers for toy pistols, firecrackers and other death-dealing devices for making the day hideous and destructive. If we take away these deadly toys we must supply something to take their place. And The Continent hopes that the particular "something" of your own Fourth may supply the something in homes less successful in their search for a sane substitute.

Let us work together in this toward a return to those good old days of which you told in the Home Council last year, when the reading of the declaration of independence was made the chief feature of the Fourth of July celebration. We shall look for a generous response to our request.

Three Missionary Books by Women

DOUBTLESS the ranks of foreign missionaries include very few men originally trained for war. Charles E. Garst, a native of Ohio, was appointed to West Point from Iowa, and saw seven years of service with the regular army before he resigned and went to Japan with Mrs. Garst in 1883. It is interesting to note that his decision to go, and to go as a representative of the Disciples Church, was influenced by his reading of a religious newspaper—Isaac Errett's Christian Standard. Mr. Garst died in 1898, and a daughter born on the mission field has since returned to serve there. The experiences of Mr. Garst's unique career are inspiringly told in a book which holds more than an average interest, "A West Pointer in the Land of the Mikado," by his widow, Laura DeLany Garst. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25.

Minna G. Cowan, in her "Education of Women in India," depends upon official sources rather than personal observation for her facts and conclusions, though her visit to India doubtless prompted the writing of the book. The historical sketch and the survey of existing conditions show that there has been a growing recognition of the necessity for woman's education, though comparatively little practical advance. In the United Provinces, for example, only 1.3 per cent of the girls of school age are in training; the 9.6 per cent of Burma is the highest. Miss Cowan strongly urges the importance of the Christian element in the education of Indian women and finds the special need at this time to be European women to engage in school work. The book, which well repays study, is published by the Revell Company at $1.25 net.

Among the many splendid men sent to the foreign field by the Methodists of America probably none is less likely to be forgotten than Nathan Sites of Foochow. Graduated from Ohio Wesleyan just as the clouds of civil war were gathering, Dr. Sites was the first alumnus of that college to go to the foreign field. The young bride who went with him survived until she had completed the story of his life, dying less than a year ago. Dr. Sites went to his rest in Foochow in 1895. The book is one of the most interesting of recent missionary biographies, and is made additionally attractive with twelve hand-colored pictures and other illustrations. [Fleming H. YOUNG AMERICA

What Alice Saw at Weihsien

BY JEAN MATEER BEEMAN

ALICE HATHAWAY and her aunt were sitting at dusk one evening in the pleasant parlor of the missionary home in Weihsien, China, when suddenly they heard a weird noise in the street.

"What do you suppose it is, auntie?" asked Alice. "It makes me feel all creepy!"

"It is likely either a wedding or a funeral; the music is the same for both, you know," replied Mrs. Kennedy. "Would you like to go out on to the street to see? You are going back to America so soon that this may be your last opportunity to see either." Mrs. Kennedy had been a missionary in that field for many years.

"Oh, yes!" cried Alice. "Do let us go at once. I do hope it is a wedding. I have always wanted to see a real Chinese wedding.

They hurried to the gate, where they met a long procession of men, women and children, dressed in white, the mourning color, and weeping as they moved slowly on toward a near-by temple. It was a funeral. Trumpets were blown at intervals and a native band played the strange death chants, which can be heard at all Chinese funerals. Mrs. Kennedy spoke to a woman along the street and then turned to her niece.

"This is a very peculiar ceremony," she said; "one of which I have often heard, but have never seen before. Let us go over to the temple and watch the mourners in their services. You know the Chinese consider that they have three souls. One remains in the grave at death, one is sent to the southwest and one is born again. Therefore when a person dies the men and boys of the family, far and near, with some of the women, go to the temple in the evening after dark to find the spirit which is to go to the southwest and send it on its way. Why it should rush off to the temple no one can explain."

"Here we are at the temple now," exclaimed Alice. "What are those queer-looking objects there on the steps?"

They drew nearer for a better view. A crowd was standing around with lanterns, which added to the weirdness of the scene. The procession approached and the music continued, louder and more mournful than ever.

"Here is a paper horse, with cart and money boxes. See, the carter—a paper doll—has fallen down. Pick him up, Alice, and put him back on the cart, and I'll replace the other dolls, which represent the men who carry the boxes of paper money to help the spirit along the way. There, now, they are in order again and we'll stand aside and see what is the next thing on the program," said Mrs. Kennedy.

"What queer customs!" returned Alice in astonishment. "I never dreamed people believed in such things."

The mourners climbed the temple steps, wailing as they went. The eldest son, a man about 50 years of age, carried a piece of shu kiai (cornstalk), to which some paper money was attached. They moved slowly on into the temple yard, crying, "Yeh, yeh" (grandfather), calling the soul which had fled at death to come into the stick of shu kiai.

After a short time the spirit entered the stick, so they thought, and then they returned to the front of the temple, two men carrying the stick with great effort, pretending it to be heavy since the spirit had entered it. They took it to an empty chair back of the table on which was spread food—five different dishes—with incense and candles. Marching in front of the table, the mourners kotowed (bowed down) three times, while a guest did the same, throwing wine under the table three times. Two of the chief mourners came forward and kotowed. After this the old man slowly went back to the spirit-filled shu kiai, others helping lift it on to his back. Then with great effort he carried it to the paper cart and put it in.

The paper horse attached to the cart had in its mouth a lot of straw, and a man went through the motions of feeding it from an empty bowl. The paper dolls were all set up and everything was set fire. The missionary and her niece were standing in the way of the spirit on his flight to the southwest, and they were politely asked to get out of the road. Just as they did so a man picked up a bucket of water and threw it past them down the street. This was to water the horse in the cart as it proceeded to the southwest. The piece of shu kiai was fed before they put it in the cart.

Then when the procession to the spirit world was burned the eldest son stood up on a chair some distance from the burning, but where he could look down the street, and pointing to the southwest with a big stick, called out, "Grandfather, grandfather! Do not be afraid. We have sent you to the southwest; we have opened a great and shining way." He shouted several other sentences, each three times, and got down from his chair. The procession of mourners retraced their steps to their home, accompanied by the band and the trumpeters, and calling out every few moments, "Grandfather, grandfather, farewell!"

The American girl watched the entire ceremony in wonderment. "Aunt Pearl, do they really believe such dreadful things as this?"

"Yes, dear; they really believe it, and what a hopeless belief it is! I am glad you had the chance to see this spectacle. It will give you an idea of the superstitions of these people whom we are trying to lead to Christ."

"Thank you so much for taking me, Aunt Pearl," returned Alice. "I mean to come back to China when I am a woman and do what I can to help these poor people. And when I get home to America I shall tell the girls of our missionary club what I have seen tonight. I am sure it will be a revelation to them, too!"

Prizes for Best Stories

DEAR YOUNG AMERICA: It's an entire story the editor is asking you to write this time—something about this little zebra in the picture. By "something" the editor means, not "This is a zebra. It has stripes," or anything of that sort. What is meant is a real story, suggested to you by the picture. And to tell a real story, such as every other boy and girl will like to read, of course it will be necessary for you to know a bit about zebras. But the editor doesn't want a book story, either. The sort of story you are to write is left to you. It is only fair to tell you, however, that this particular zebra lives at the Lincoln park zoo in Chicago. But he might live in any other zoo—or he might not be in any zoo at all.

You must get your story into 400 words. All stories must be at the office of The Continent by April 29.

Five prizes will be given—$5, $3 and three of $1. Be careful of spelling, writing and punctuation. They all count, you know. Also, be sure to give your age. Several forgot in the "Benjy and Betty" contest, and so, of course, could not compete.

The editor confesses to being very much interested to see what this zebra tells you. Will you not get your stories to The Continent's Young America headquarters promptly?

Rhymes to Remember

PUSSY WILLOW

The brook is trimmed with melting snow,
The maple sap is running,
And on the highest elm the crow
His coal-black wings is sunning.

A close green bud the mayflower lies
Upon its mossy pillow;
And sweet and low the south wind blows,
And through the brown fields calling goes,
"Come, pussy, pussy willow;
Within your close, brown wrapper stir,
Come out and show your silvery fur;
Come, pussy, pussy willow."

Soon red will bud the maple trees,
The bluebirds will be singing,
And yellow tassels in the breeze
Be from the poplars swinging.

And rosy will the mayflower be
Upon its mossy pillow;
But you must come the first of all—
"Come, pussy," is the south wind's call—
"Come, pussy, pussy willow."
A fairy gift to children dear,
The downy firstlings of the year—
Come, pussy, pussy willow.

Buffalo Bill as Santa Claus

DEAR YOUNG AMERICA: Your picture of Buffalo Bill and the baby lion was fine, but I like him best when he is my Santa Claus, like he was Christmas.

We are in the Arizona hills, and Buffalo Bill was at Campo Bonito. He invited everybody to come over to a Christmas tree. Nearly all our school went. It is five miles to his mine and mill. We went in a wagon in the morning and came back at night.

Our school is mostly Mexican children; there are some little Indians who live in a tent.

Buffalo Bill dressed up for Santa Claus. He told us funny things and everyone got a present; then we had a big lunch. There were burro races. At first the burros just strolled along. Then we had all kinds of races. Johnnie Baker, who is the crack shot in the "wild west show," threw little things in the air and shot them. The young lady who jumps high on horseback married our forest ranger on New Year's eve. We like to see her ride in her pretty leather suit.

Some of the Mexicans live in grass houses. They are nice, polite folks. Your reader,

MAURICE WISHARD BRAINARD (age 10).
Oracle, Ariz.

[All our boys and girls will be interested in this little story. And we all hope, don't we, that some day Maurice will write to us again and tell us about how he spends his time in the Arizona hills and what the forest ranger does and more about his Mexican neighbors.]

The Way He Did It

Sometimes little folk do not behave exactly as they are expected to do; but they occasionally improve on the original program.

In Italy, in the days when the present Dowager Queen Margherita was the lovely young bride of the crown prince, a little anecdote of her reception in one of the hill towns was current alike in society and in the press, says The Youth's Companion. The little boy who was to present the usual bouquet was the son of a distinguished literary man, and he had been taught a pretty poem of a few lines in graceful praise of the princess. But when the moment came to recite he stood mutely gazing at her, too overcome to speak. After a moment, in order to relieve the situation, the princess smiled, and held out her hand for the flowers. The little fellow held back for a moment, then, to the delight of the assembly, explained confidentially, as he gave the flowers to her:

"There were verses, but you are so beautiful I can't remember them."

An Insurance Man on Alcohol

The Mortality of Alcohol, by Edward B. Phelps. How many people are slain every year by strong drink? There are plenty of people able to answer your question quickly and glibly—very glibly. They will tell you what somebody has said on the lecture platform or somebody else has said in a temperance newspaper, the usual answer being 100,000 a year for the United States alone. And there seems to be in the minds of many a sort of gospel authenticity about that figure. At least, when The Continent once said that the estimate is all guesswork and largely exaggerated, some subscribers seemed as much pained as if the paper had denied Holy Writ. But guesswork it is, for the problem is one on which a scientific opinion is impossible without more time taken to study it than is available to the average man who prepares a temperance speech—or edits a weekly paper. Happily at last, however, a man specially equipped for it has taken time to go into all the statistics available and make an estimate. The author of "The Mortality of Alcohol" is a trained insurance actuary, editor of The American Underwriter Magazine, and he does his work in scientific spirit without any advocate's concern for the results. The seventy-five pages of his volume are highly technical and bear the impress of the knowledge and patience which make scholarly authority. But perhaps the untechnical reader will skip it all to the conclusion, which states Mr. Phelps's judgment that the outside total of deaths for which alcohol can be held responsible as even in the remotest way a contributory factor is not above 66,000 in all the United States. But in all conscience that's plenty bad enough. [Thrift Publishing Company, 141 Broadway, New York. $2.

History, Biography and Letters

The Writings of John Quincy Adams, edited by Worthington C. Ford. Volume I. The younger Adams was a remarkable example of precocity leading to a career in which his greatest power appeared to come not with the high office of the presidency but in the comparatively narrow province of a congressman. It was perhaps the very refinement of his genius that held Adams from greatness while in high preferment; when his responsibility became less his courage seemed less guarded. By diary or letter almost every day of his ife for sixty years is accounted for. His correspondence was constant and voluminous, always prepared entirely by his own hand. The present volume begins with a letter written in May, 1779, when Adams was a student in France at the age of 12, and closes with a letter written from The Hague seventeen years later when he was minister to Holland and under appointment to Portugal. Previously he had been private secretary to Dana, minister at St. Petersburg, and the closing letter was dated shortly after he had visited London in behalf of the American government, to expedite the observance of the Jay treaty. It is understood that this publication, while not attempting, of course, to reproduce all the vast bulk of Adams's writings, will include in its selection much material not hitherto printed. The selections of the first volume impress the reader with a creditable opinion of Mr. Ford's discrimination. [Macmillan Company, New York. $3.50 net.

Recollections of the Civil War, by Mason Whiting Tyler; edited by William S. Tyler. Colonel Tyler was a fine type of Christian soldier, and, while his diary and letters may not add important historical information to that already on record, the story of his experiences is well worth reading. Colonel Tyler, who reached second in command of the 37th Massachusetts, set down his immediate impressions of war life in Virginia with a refreshing absence of the bitterness so prominent in some diaries of the period. There are several portraits and maps. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $2.50 net.

George Washington, by Woodrow Wilson. This beautifully printed edition of the President's charming biography of his illustrious predecessor is most timely. The story of Washington's career is vivid, frank and exceedingly interesting. Everyone ought to read it not only for the brilliant narrative but for the demonstration it affords of the literary skill of a man who is to figure most prominently in American affairs of the immediate future. There are thirty-two full-page illustrations. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $2 net.

Religious Books

Studies in the History of Religions: Presented to Crawford Howell Toy by Pupils, Colleagues and Friends; edited by David Gordon Lyon and George Foot Moore. This volume is one of a happily increasing number in this country, and represents the custom imported from Germany of honoring the old age of some prominent leader or teacher by dedicating to him fresh and original contributions in the general field in which he has labored. These essays were designed to celebrate Professor Toy's 75th birthday (March 23, 1911). On account of unforeseen difficulties in carrying out this original plan, the publication has been delayed by more than a year. The delay, however, does not affect the value of more than two or three of the papers, and that only in the matter of timeliness. The specialist will wish to study the papers, and the remark that they are all highly technical, even though the effort has been made to use unconventional language, will be sufficient for the general reader. Anyone who is interested in the broad subject of comparative religion will find in some one or more of these studies an ample reward for a careful examination of the volume. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2.50 net.

The Holy Christian Church, by R. M. Johnston, is an interpretation of the history of Christianity from the point of view of its outward institutions and expressions. The author's aim is to show how such a religion as the Christian was destined to make its appearance, undergo its various transformations and exist in its present form, or rather forms. Accordingly, he begins with a sketch of the world of Babylonia and Assyria, Greece and Rome, not omitting Palestine and the Hebrew nation, down to the days of Jesus Christ. All this is naturally preparatory for the exposition of the personality of Jesus and is followed by a similar exposition of Paul. From the end of Paul's activities to the present time Christianity is viewed through the ecclesiastical forms into which it has developed. Ostensibly the volume is meant to be an interpretation rather than a record; but the real depth and power of religion is hardly in the mind, if indeed it is in the consciousness, of the author. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.50 net.

The Continental Reformation, by Alfred Plummer, is a sane and sympathetic study of the work wrought by Luther, Zwingli and Calvin between 1517 and 1557 A. D. The viewpoint is that of a moderate Anglican, and the author is tolerant of many doctrines with which he does not agree—with the exception of Calvinism. He is severe in denouncing predestination as an "immoral" doctrine, but he fails to say how one is to believe or preach divine sovereignty without it; nor does he allude to the significant fact that all philosophers—Greek, Oriental and Occidental—have held it and do hold it to this day. In all other respects the volume is admirable, and we infer that another one dealing with the reformation in England and Scotland is to follow. Dr. Plummer is late master of University College, Durham, England. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

Messages for the Morning Watch, by Charles G. Trumbull, is a book of collateral reading for the first six months of the Sunday school year 1913. The author very properly speaks of them as "Devotional Studies in the Book of Genesis." They have grown out of the studies which Mr. Trumbull pursues with delight every morning before taking up the serious labors of the day. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.

The Ideal Adult Class in the Sunday School, by Amos R. Wells, describes just such a class as every pastor wants, and few acquire. But out of such a class as he can get, perhaps he may develop something like the one here pictured, and so mightily increase his usefulness. [Pilgrim Press, Boston. 50 cents net.

Novels in Miniature

The Hallowell Partnership, by Katharine Holland Brown, relates the experiences of a nice young engineer and his spoiled college sister, who set out to be partners on a big drainage "job." They have a great many experiences in the Illinois lowlands that young people will enjoy reading about, for their story is the good, wideawake sort that wideawake young Americans like. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1 net.

The Sword of Bussy, by Robert Neilson Stephens, is one of the most dashing of those dashing romances that delight the heart of the romance lover. Bussy is a court gallant who has loved many ladies, though he seems not to meet his true mate until Mr. Stephens appears and leads him through a thrilling wooing to domestic bliss. It's a really good yarn of its sort. [L C. Page and Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

The Fortunes of the Landrays, by Vaughan Kester, has been issued since the author has won so much attention with his other recent books, "The Prodigal Judge" and "The Just and the Unjust." It scarcely duplicates their strength, although it is an interesting story of the rush to the California gold field told in a slowly minute fashion, with nice descriptive touches. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.35 net.

The Little Gray Shoe, by Percy J. Brebner, is one of those characteristic tales of slash and dash in which escaping princesses, ladies disguised as serving maids, gallant knights, villains and old grim, gaunt castles with dark dungeons and secret passages tend to make one forget that he is living prosaically in the twentieth century. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

Philip Dru, Administrator: A Story of Tomorrow, 1920-1935. America's second civil war, brought about by the high cost of living and other current problems, is the background of this novel of the future. Its author is said to be a power in present-day politics. [B. W. Huebsch, New York. $1.20 net.

A Builder of Ships, by Charles M. Sheldon. The author of "In His Steps" here tells the story of a powerful American who becomes unscrupulous in his ambition, but is at length led into the kingdom of the Master. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.20 net.

George Helm, by David Graham Phillips. A resourceful country lawyer breaks into the political game and becomes governor of his state. Interwoven with his progress is a love affair with a magnate's daughter. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.30 net.

Pride of War, by Gustaf Janson; translated from the Swedish original "Lognerna." A novel of power dealing with the Turko-Italian war in Tripoli. In its teaching is a keen plea for international peace. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $1.30 net.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

April 6, 1913—Jacob and Esau

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Genesis 25:27-34; 27. Golden Text, Isaiah 20:18: Jehovah is a God of justice; blessed are all they that wait for him.

Abraham comes to us as a superior being. He emerges from the unknown and walks through life as the friend of God. Isaac is comparatively passive, while Jacob and Esau touch life on every side. The best and the worst find exemplification in them. It sometimes requires two lives to develop one. Especially is this true of Jacob and Esau. They were the twin sons of Isaac and Rebekah. Esau was physically abnormal, being covered at his birth as with a cloak of hair. For this reason he was named Esau, or "hairy." Jacob on the contrary was "smooth," a quality equally evident in man and manner. Esau was born first, closely followed by his brother, who reached out and caught him by the heel. This incident stamped him as Jacob, or "one who catches by the heel." No term could have been more fitting. Whenever Jacob saw another about to succeed, his method was to throw him down and seize the prize for himself. That Esau should have been born first was a crime which he could not forgive. It made him second in the race. So he resolved to supplant him.

Those Who Should Naturally Be Alike Sometimes Differ Most Widely

The two grew up side by side, like two trees from the same root. There is no problem like a boy, except it be the problem of two boys. The same ancestry and surroundings fail to produce the same results. That an Ishmael should have been born to Abraham was not strange. Ishmael's Egyptian mother could be held accountable for every blot and blemish. But Isaac and Rebekah were grapes of the same vintage. From that tree the world would pluck the golden apples of a perfect life. But wait and see. The race is sometimes to the swift and sometimes to the slow.

Jacob and Esau soon began to develop the trend of their natures. Esau turned his face toward the reckless and the unknown, while the other crept close behind, grasping at his heel. Before them lay something that meant more than all else—the birthright. This was regarded as the gift of God. It was quoted in no markets, nor was it subjected to the caprice of any fortune. With it went the covenant promises of the Almighty. But why strive for the impossible? Men like Jacob, however, ask no such question.

Esau already had the prize, only he undervalued its worth. It placed him in the family succession, but his tastes took a different direction from theirs. One's pleasures are the real test of character. What we delight most to do may be taken as indicative of what we are. Esau was a sportsman. His bow and arrow were his favorite companions. Hunting would have been torture to Jacob, but Esau loved it as he did his life. The woods appealed to him more than the fields. Jacob, on the contrary, was a plain man, who delighted in the work of the farm. He cared for his flocks and counted them every day.

These sons had their respective admirers at home. Isaac loved Esau, while Rebekah preferred Jacob. Just why, we question if either knew. One can no more account for his tastes than he can for the color of his hair. Opposites frequently attract each other where likeness repels.

Sale of Birthright Determines Future of Jacob and Esau

One can readily imagine how things went on in the patriarch's home. Human nature is always the same, in tent or palace. The birthright no doubt absorbed more and more the family interest, Esau alone excepted. As the twig grows the inclination of the tree becomes more apparent; and the two brothers only awaited an opportunity to confirm their futures.

That opportunity came in Esau's sale of his birthright to Jacob. One day he returned from a hunt tired and hungry and found his brother making lentil soup, a dish still common in that country. "Feed me," he exclaimed, "I pray thee, with that same red pottage; for I am faint." That was Esau—physical Esau. "Sell me first thy birthright." That was Jacob—cunning, covetous Jacob. The bargain was concluded and Esau for one mess of pottage sold his birthright. Small things are signboards of larger things. Esau despised his birthright. He was not starving, and possibly, in the fascination of the hunt, did not even know that he was hungry. The buyer and the seller stand on the same plane. Subsequently Esau married wives from among the Hittites and became a grief of mind not only to his mother but to his father as well.

But love easily forgets and Isaac determines to confirm Esau in his position. The patriarch is now an old man and seems to regard himself as approaching the end. As a matter of fact he has some forty years yet before him, but no man can foretell the day of his death. Esau is sent out to obtain his favorite venison preparatory to the blessing. This was more than probably intended as a holy service, although of that we are uncertain. Rebekah becomes aware of what is about to take place and by a series of deceptions secures the blessing for Jacob. This is fully recorded in the text of the lesson and need not be repeated.

Blessings of Jacob and Esau Accorded with Their Natures

The whole transaction is a sad commentary on the morals of the age. None of the parties involved is clear from suspicion. Isaac knew that the elder was to serve the younger, and no power could change it. Esau had sold his birthright already for a mess of pottage and now would redeem it with a plate of venison. The two blessings were in accord with the natures of the two sons. Jacob was to possess the "fatness of the earth," while Esau was to "live by his sword." That was what they were fitted for. Characters like Esau are misleading. They are capable of high impulses, but always lapse back to what they were; as for Jacob, he must be judged not by his former but later self. Although born a Jacob, he became an Israel, one who had power with God.

Birthrights belong to those who prize them. We are all born to the birthright of a respectable manhood, but many a one exchanges this priceless inheritance for a mess of pottage. No law can protect a man against himself. Life does not depend upon when we are born, but what. As with Esau, Appetite and Pleasure are the supplanters whom we need most to fear.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins.

Analysis—Jacob and Esau had an equal start but a diverse end. Permanent good is never gained by alliance with evil. Family quarrels among professors of religion deplored by the good.

When our ready made philosophers inform us that "man is the creature of his environment" some of us remember that we have personally known dozens of Jacobs and as many Esaus, born in the same home, nursed by the same mother, surrounded by the same helps and hindrances, and yet pursuing diametrically opposite courses. Robert Ingersoll was the son of a minister, while one of the most useful men in our ministry today is the son of a scoundrel. The secret of personality we may never discover, but it is not to be found in environment.

Jacob and Esau were not alone brothers, they were only brothers and twin brothers. They both were prospered in worldly goods. But nothing could make them alike except the grace of God. This, defective as his character was in some respects, Jacob possessed; this, fine as many of his traits were, Esau lacked. Jacob was "a quiet man, dwelling in tents" (Gen. 25:27), while Esau was a successful hunter, a brave soldier (ch. 32:6), a favorite among the daughters of the land (ch. 26;34) and subject to bursts of generous impulses which we are forced to admire (ch. 33: 4, 15). Yet his name was writ in water, all for lack of a moral character and a religious faith such as his less taking brother possessed.

Jacob Sinned in Doing Evil That Good Might Come

When we are studying lessons from the early history of religion, a period before Moses was born, before the world had studied biographies of either saints or sinners, we must remember that these were times of such ignorance that God would not judge them by the standards made known to us (Acts 17:30).

Jacob knew that Abraham, his grandsire, and Isaac, his father, believed themselves chosen as founders of a new era, a new family among the nations to be lights in the world and examples of piety. He shared this faith, although he did not realize much that it meant. Many a negro slave set free by the war of the sixties knew that his freedom meant a harder life for himself, but he believed that it meant also a larger opportunity for his children.

No doubt Jacob honestly believed that his brother was unfit for the head of a monotheistic, moral community, but he made the same mistake that zealous religionists have made in all ages with less excuse. It was this belief that the end justifies the means which brought forth the false decretals in the middle ages, which sanctioned and kept in use the horrors of the inquisitions and which to this day permits religious people to circulate rumors to the disadvantage of their opponents. In fact, within the past few weeks a chief of municipal police in a city not a thousand miles from Chicago boldly affirmed that perjury was not a heinous crime when committed to shield the order to which the perjurer belonged. There are people now living who belong to the eighteenth century before Christ instead of the twentieth century after.

Esau Forfeited His Position Because He Despised It

No man loses place in God's kingdom by another's sin, but by his own. Esau had already forfeited his position as possible head of the as yet undefined kingdom of God among men by his own expressed contempt for such honors and such power (ch. 25:34). Both he and his father seemed to recognize that in the incident by which his leadership was demitted to Jacob there was a providence which could not be called in question. As men now often write their wills on their deathbeds, so in those days they called their families about them and dictated what should be done on their decease. There was the solemnity of a religious act in such mortuary directions and Esau appears to have had no intention of asking his father to revoke the gift; indeed, he seems to have been more angry at the fraud than sorrowful for the changed outlook. He had rather be a sheik of the open plains than a shepherd, a hunter than a priest.

Isaac himself appears to have looked upon the event as settled by an overruling providence which he must not question. Perhaps in his own heart he recognized that he had barely escaped making a very serious mistake.

Isaac's Last Days Troubled by Threatened Extinction of Race

Isaac has been a peace lover all his days. But now, through his own fault in some degree, his last days, which should have been calm, were troubled with threatened extinction of his race. He could not but know that Esau harbored thoughts of violence toward Jacob (ch. 27:41). He feared to die and he was distressed to live. The sons who ought to have knelt beside his bed in filial loyalty showed but too plainly that the death of the father would be the signal for the outbreak of violence.

We may well believe that the surrounding heathen smiled grimly when they saw such murderous passions in a family professing to be actuated by the highest motives. They said among themselves that this was the end of all Abraham's dreams. They knew that no house, least of all a religious house, could stand if divided against itself (Matt. 12:25). And Paul carries this farther, declaring that no provocation could justify Christians in going to law before the people of the world (I. Cor. 6:5-8). As so often happens, neither Jacob nor Esau got what he sought, for Jacob's best years were spent in exile and Esau drifted farther and farther from the ancestral line, and to this day his descendants remain outside the cities of Israel.

FOREIGN MISSION TOPIC—India awakening.

India is a great Asiatic empire, under British rule, composed of people of various races and speaking more than fifty different languages. Including Burma, it has a total area of 1,766,000 square miles and a population of about 300,000,000. That is to say, it has about half the area of the United States, with about three times the population. The great lengths of India from north to south and from east to west are about the same—1,900 miles. The empire is rich in the diversity of its climate and soil. It contains the highest mountains of the earth's surface, the loftiest peak of which is Mount Everest (29,002 feet). It has also vast river deltas, which rise only a few inches above the level of the sea. Cut off from the rest of Asia by the titanic mountain ranges, it is a continent rather than a country.

According to the census of 1901 the principal religions of the land, with their adherents, are as follows: Hindu 207,147,026, Sikh 2,195,339, Jain 1,334,148, Buddhist 9,476,759, Parsee 94,190, Mohammedan 62,458,077, Jewish 18,228, Christian 2,923,241. These figures include Burma.

One of the significant phenomena of our age is the social and political unrest of India. The world has heard much about it in recent years, and yet it is very easy to overestimate it. Perhaps as fair and impartial a statement as is to be found is contained in the opening chapters of "India, Its Life and Thought," by John P. Jones, D. D., a book which is cordially recommended to students of Christian missions. Briefly stated, the following may be regarded as the chief causes of this unrest:

1. The success of the Japanese in their war against Russia, which taught the natives that western nations are not invincible against eastern weapons.
2. The examples of Canada and Australia, which have appealed to the imagination of the more moderate advocates of Indian reform as affording the desirable type of government for India.
3. The growing strength of the national congress, which has met annually for twenty-seven years to discuss the actions of the Indian government and to pass resolutions favoring Indian independence. This is a body of some 3,000 representatives chosen from all parts of India, who assemble in an influential center and conduct their deliberations in English. It is significant that the men of India alone of all eastern nationalities learn to speak and think in English with a force and eloquence which place them among the masters of English style.
4. The rise of a new class in the gradual formation of a body of young Indian graduates from the English-speaking colleges and universities, who are radically dissatisfied with a system which does not promote them to places of power in their land. Upon this point we cannot do better than quote some sentences from Dr. Jones's book: "Disgruntled graduates of the university and schoolboys take the most prominent place in this movement. The universities annually send forth an army of men supplied with degrees—last year it was 1,570 B. A.'s; and it is the conviction of nine-tenths of them that it is the duty of the government to give them employment as soon as they are graduated. As this is impossible, many of them nurse their disappointment into discontent and opposition to the powers that be. Many of them become dangerous demagogues and fomenters of sedition. Not a few such are found in every province of the country. And they find in the students their best material to work upon."

Nevertheless this unrest is largely superficial. Ninety per cent of the Indian people know that the British government is, for the present at least, a necessity. And they are generally sincerely attached to it. The present movement is really an indication of the resurrection of the national hope and purpose. It is the foam on the surface of a mighty, inflowing tide. The heart of India is being stirred, aroused, invigorated, by the gospel of peace.

The British government has ever been confident of its position in the land; hence it has taken practically no steps to suppress the platform agitators, or editors of the vernacular press, when they have attacked it. And gradually the government has given to the Indian people a larger place in the national councils. The coronation of King George V. and Queen Mary as emperor and empress of India in Delhi last year did much to augment the loyalty of their Indian subjects. And the transfer of the capital from Calcutta, which is a modern city without associations, to Delhi, which was the ancient seat of government, has been a diplomatic stroke of genius. These events of the past year are proving most helpful to the cause of Christian missions.

Today Protestant missions pursue actively all lines of work for the elevation of the people. There are ninety-one missionary societies, belonging to many countries, with a force of some 4,000 men and women. There is a native pastorate of over 1,100 ordained men, with a total Indian agency at work of some 26,000 men and women.

Our own board has three great missions—the Punjab, the North India and the Western India. These three missions contain thirty-two stations and are supplied by some ninety-three missionaries.

His lamps are we,
  To shine where he shall say,
And lamps are not for sunny rooms,
  Not for the light of day.
But for dark places of the earth,
Where shame and wrong and crime have birth;
Or for the murky twilight gray,
Where wandering sheep have gone astray;
Or where the light of faith grows dim,
And souls are groping after him.
And as sometimes a flame we find
  Clear shining through the night—
So bright we do not see the lamp,
  But only see the light,
So may we shine—his light the flame,
That men may glorify his name.

A good temper is one of the principal ingredients of happiness. This, it may be said, is the work of nature, and must be born with us; yet sometimes it may be acquired by art, and always improved by culture. Almost every object that attracts our notice has its bright and its dark side; he that habituates himself to look at the displeasing side will sour his disposition, and consequently impair his happiness; while he who constantly beholds it on the bright side insensibly meliorates his temper, and in consequence of it improves his own happiness and the happiness of those about him.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

April 6, 1913

THE LOFTINESS OF LOWLINESS

TOPIC—The ideal Christian. IV. His humility. Matthew 20:20-28.

Humility is a virtue which is not to be had for the seeking. To have true humility the possessor must be unaware of its existence. Conscious humility is impossible; for then it becomes "the pride that apes humility." A greater, nobler pursuit than that of humility, namely, the desire to be like Christ and to do Christlike service, brings humility in its train.

Self-appraisal is inevitable for most of us; and occasionally it is desirable. We are bound to measure our own powers. Everyone needs to remember the scriptural injunction "not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think." The common human weakness is to measure one's self by the person next below rather than by the person above. Naturally, he who compares himself to his inferiors instead of to his superiors will always remain inferior himself. It is healthier and wiser to look up to those who are better, stronger and more worthy than we, than to look down upon those who are less good and strong and wise.

Efficiency often dies of a disease called self-complacency.

A measure of that ingredient of humility which is called common sense would save many a man from making himself ridiculous.

There is real sagacity in humility. The lowly in heart may be made high, but the proud are more than likely to be made low.

When the prophet caught a glimpse of God's holiness he called himself unclean. Nothing helps us to a true estimate of ourselves—which involves real humility—like a clear conception of the character of God.

The reason the really great are humble is that they are great enough to see the heights to which they have not attained.

"Nothing in my hand I bring,
Simply to Thy cross I cling;
Naked, come to Thee for dress,
Helpless, look to Thee for grace;
Foul, I to the fountain fly;
Wash me, Saviour, or I die."

The world is full of absurd little folk who early began to take themselves too seriously. At once arrest of development began. They had no time for growth, being absorbed wholly in self-admiration. Strutting, posing, boasting, going through life along a lane of mirrors, they are a nuisance to their betters and an incumbrance to society.

Some folk have prayed daily since early childhood—

"Lord, show me myself,
Lord, show me thyself;
In Jesus' name, amen."

This prayer leads to humility. Whoso knows himself as he really is will not be proud. A single clear look into one's own heart is enough to fill one with self-loathing. Set over against that look a glimpse of the glorious perfections of Christ, and our utmost righteousness becomes as filthy rags.

Dr. Sheldon's book, "In His Steps," had a great vogue. All over the world earnest Christians were set to asking themselves, "What would Jesus do?" It is pertinent to recall that only once did Jesus say, "I have given you an example, that ye also should do as I have done," and that was after he had girded himself with a towel, and done the humble work of a slave, a task which the apostles were too proud to do. To be Christlike is to be willing to stoop to the lowliest service.

Search others for their virtues and thyself for thy vices.—Fuller.

"The meek shall inherit the earth." Everybody is willing to help along a humble person, but the self-assertive somehow arouse the instinctive combativeness of everybody. It is a very human weakness to want to stick a pin into the puffed-up man.

Every worrying person is a split self. He does not throw his entire personality into what he is doing now, but allows detachments of his thoughts to wonder what will happen to him next. When Jesus said, "Be not anxious for the morrow: for the morrow will be anxious for itself," he was telling us to be complete ourselves today, without detailing a section of ourselves to look out for a tomorrow which may never arrive.—Henry Sloane Coffin.

You cannot serve two masters—you must serve one or the other. If your work is first with you, and your fee second, work is your master, and the lord of work, who is God. But if your fee is first with you, and your work second, fee is your master and the lord of fee, who is the devil.—Ruskin.

MISSIONARY WORK

Great Results from Mott Tour in China

The tour of John R. Mott and Sherwood Eddy through mission fields in the interest of the continuation committee of the Edinburgh conference took them in February and March through China and Korea. Letters arriving from missionaries in those fields show what tremendous influence has flowed both out of the conference held with missionaries and out of the evangelistic meetings which the visitors have held particularly with students in all the cities they visited. Mr. Mott is reported to have said that his meetings in Canton with the students of that city were the greatest experience of his life. He spoke there to an audience of 3,000 young men, and when at the conclusion of the services he offered them the opportunity of signing a card which pledged them to read the Bible and pray every day, and to live in accordance with Bible precepts so far as these commended themselves to their consciences, 825 young Chinese put down their names. Twenty-six of these were students from Canton Christian College, and of that number sixteen joined the college church next Sabbath, making a total of forty-six who have thus professed Christ at the college during the year.

The tour of China culminated with a great national conference in Shanghai very much like the centennial conference there in 1907. The note of unity which was struck so strong in 1907 was emphasized more than ever in 1913. A plan of interdenominational Christian universities for China was laid out, and it seemed to be the unanimous sentiment of the missionaries of all denominations present that denominational movements in the higher education have become unthinkable.

Awful Atrocity in Name of Civilization

Wellesley G. Bailey of Edinburgh, the superintendent of the Mission to Lepers, has received authoritative information concerning the terrible massacre of lepers by government soldiers which was perpetrated at the city of Nanning, the remote capital of the province of Kwangsi in southern China. The massacre was instituted under the direct orders of the governor general of the province. This governor is General Luk, who has a bad record and is said to have been guilty of a very similar atrocity some years ago at Lungchou, a smaller city in the same province. In this case the offense of his cruelty is aggravated by the fact that, taking advantage of the trend to modern ideas in China, the vicious old general pretended to be acting in the interest of scientific hygiene. The excuse he has made for the massacre is that leprosy is a great menace to humanity and the destruction of those afflicted with it is the surest way of stamping out the scourge.

There are two missions in Nanning, the station of the Church Missionary Society of England and a colony of French Roman Catholic priests. The English missionaries had been anxious for some time to build a leper hospital, but could not spare the energy for it from their other work. And for a long time the Catholics seemed entirely indifferent to the needs of lepers. But finally there arrived in the latter mission a very earnest and sympathetic priest, whose attention was early attracted to the collection of miserable hovels outside the city, where the community of suffering had drawn together a larger group of outcast lepers. The priest determined that something must be done for them. By writing to friends in Europe, he collected $5,000, and then asked the Chinese merchants of the city to subscribe an equal sum and the governor general to give a piece of ground for the location of the new hospital. The appeal was manifestly disliked by both the merchants and the officials, but to "save face" they would not refuse it, and the sum requested was subscribed and the ground given.

But it appears that the intrusion of the French into the matter angered General Luk so much that he took measures immediately to dispose of the question in another way. Soldiers were sent out to dig a deep trench near by the leper village, and early on a Saturday morning soon after a large body of troops completely surrounded the lepers' wretched huts. Shouts brought them out of the doors of their hovels, and immediately the soldiers opened fire, shooting relentlessly until the whole community—men, women and children—were dead or helplessly wounded. Then the whole mass, many still living, were dropped into the trench, kerosene poured over them, and the pile set alight. The victims at this one point numbered fifty-three. Of course there was immense excitement in the city, and to defend himself the governor general issued a proclamation urging that all lepers should be put out of the way, and advising that those who did not voluntarily kill themselves should be killed by their friends and relatives. How many more died in this way is not known.

Many crimes have been committed in the name of civilization, as of liberty, but perhaps never one quite so monstrous as this in the name of "hygiene." Certainly the incident illustrates how keenly China needs not civilization simply but civilization based upon Christian religion. The Mission to Lepers, attracted by this terrible occurrence, will undoubtedly move immediately to put a leper hospital somewhere in the province of Kwangsi. Local prejudices may make it inadvisable to locate in Nanning itself, but the site will not be far from there.

Embroidery That Supports a School

A unique institution is the school for young married women conducted by Mrs. George S. McCune at Syen Chyun, Korea. In this academy the young women devote part of their day to making doilies, centerpieces, tray cloths, fancy aprons, bureau scarfs, sofa pillows, etc., all beautifully done and all sold so that the school may be maintained.

Just now, alas! there is thought that unless more orders appear the school may have to close, and yet only $40 in orders would provide for a month—and this when a pretty bureau scarf of linen worked in daisies costs only $1.50. Still, it is scarcely likely that American women will miss this opportunity to help—and everyone's hoping for bigger things, not smaller.

Missionary Brevities

—Rev. Charles E. Scott of Tsingtau, China, sums up his impressions of the revolutionary year in China in these words: "More intimate and prolonged contact with the Chinese than any previous years makes us marvel the more at their patience, steadfastness and endurance. Among our Christians I have seen sacrifice under danger for country, devotion under persecution to the church, of which I had not previously dreamed. I have seen manhood of the first rank, and the better I have come to know these friends the more deeply I prize their friendship. Even the gentry and officials have 'opened up,' willing now to fraternize and to listen to the gospel."

—In spite of Mr. Steffanssen's remark that he hoped no missionaries would try to establish a work among the new race of people he has discovered in the Arctic circle Bishop Stringer, who has done such valiant service as pioneer bishop of the Anglican Church in the Northwest, announces that missionaries from his denomination have already started for the "lost" people. Rev. W. H. Fry is bearing the message of the gospel to these Eskimos, and expects to reach his destination in the fall, probably in October.

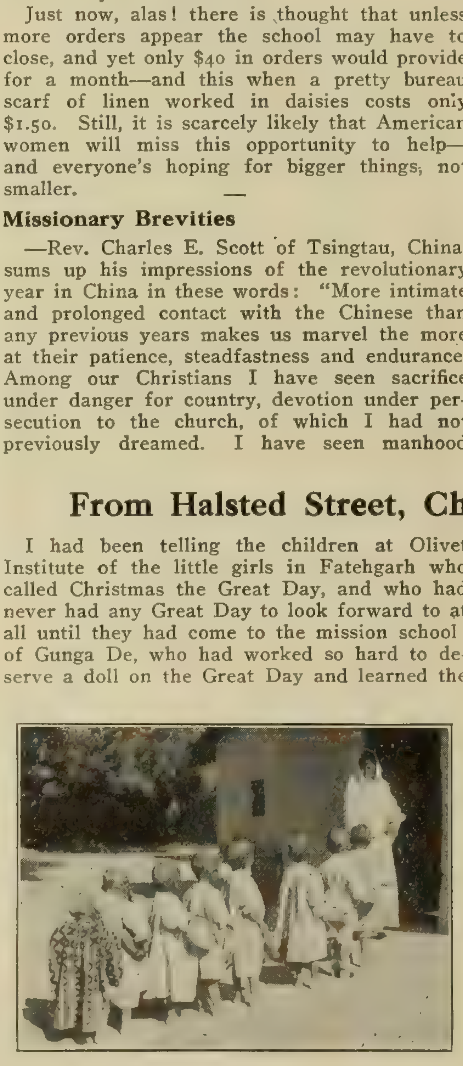
—Rev. A. M. Cunningham of Paotingfu, China, says that a little group of Christians in Hekou were very desirous of securing a chapel in which to worship, but they were only six in number, and as the mission funds are available for opening work only in large centers, their wish could not be granted. The little band, however, undiscouraged by this refusal, started out to raise the necessary money without mission help, one family even offering to sell part of their small farm. Within a few weeks, with some assistance from native Christians in other towns, they had raised practically $75 and presented their plea anew, asking of the mission a sum not over $15 to repair and equip their chapel. This amount was speedily granted.

Board Notes and Announcements

—Friday morning at Room 48, Chicago, brought various messages—besides the missionary letters—which one would not willingly forget. First from Dr. F. M. Fox of the national Presbyterian Brotherhood, whose talk on Philippians 4 made that a new chapter. Miss Barr of the Freedmen's Board spoke in a manner so loving and so vigorous that her good stories and her plea for prayer for the missionaries who make jails needless were the more impressive. Mrs. Robert M. Ross of Lienchow, mentioning the recent worship of the rabbit and the fox in provinces where there has been wholesale destruction of idols, said, "I never dreamed that my China could retrograde." Messages were read from Mrs. E. T. Allen, Miss Grove, Mrs. Van Hook and Miss Holliday of Persia, Mrs. Charles S. Williams of Colombia and Miss Wheeler of Mexico. Mrs. Robinson reported a gratifying meeting in Marion, Ind., with a liberal gift for the China fund.

From Halsted Street, Chicago, to Fatehgarh, India

I had been telling the children at Olivet Institute of the little girls in Fatehgarh who called Christmas the Great Day, and who had never had any Great Day to look forward to at all until they had come to the mission school; of Gunga De, who had worked so hard to deserve a doll on the Great Day and learned the beatitudes and her psalms and prayers, only to have her Hindu father take her away to bathe in the Ganges so she would miss the prize giving, and of her joy when she found the doll waiting for her the next day. Afterwards as I stood waiting for the car on a dreary, sordid Halsted street corner a little stranger who had wandered into the meeting came and stood beside me. A thin shawl was over her head, and the hand that held it together under her chin was thin and blue with the cold. There were dark circles under her eyes and the little face had no look of childhood about it.



Children at the Mission, Fatehgarh, Lined Up for a Meal

"Say, missus," she began, "you forgot something."

"What did I forget?" I asked, puzzled.

"You forgot to tell us how we could send things to those children out in India. I've got a doll—she has no head, but I like her—and two picture cards. Maybe I will get some more, so I would like to send those."

Just now the little girls at Olivet have been hearing again from Miss Forman of the orphan girls at Rakha and of the many little voices that will be asking "What have you brought us?" when she sees them again. They could hardly keep order until they had voted to spend all the money in their treasury for dolls to dress and send to Fatehgarh. But the treasury, which had seemed ample until then, held only $5, and bought only twenty dolls; whereas there are a hundred little Hindustani girls wondering if their dear Miss Sahib will bring them dolls when she comes again over the "black water."

If anyone should wish to help the little girls at Olivet with the generous box they would like to pack early in April their president would be glad to receive the gifts. Her address is Miss Lena Hass, Olivet Institute, Penn and Vedder streets, Chicago.

QUAKER
PUFFED
RICE

Did You Ever Know of Any Child Who Didn't Enjoy Puffed Grains?

They'll eat them between meals like peanuts, because the grains taste like nuts.

They want them every morning with sugar and cream, or mixed in with their fruit.

And at supper or bedtime they fairly revel in Puffed Wheat or Rice served, like crackers, in a bowl of milk.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West

And the more they eat, the better

These are whole grains, with all of the minerals lacking in bolted flour.

All the millions of granules have been blasted to pieces by Prof. Anderson's process.

Never before were whole grains made so easily and wholly digestible.

Serve them any hour — mealtime, between meals or bedtime

They don't tax the stomach. In this respect they are unique and ideal, as any physician will tell you.

But healthy children never think of this scientific side. They eat these foods because nothing they know is even half so enticing.

These foods are shot from guns

Inside the guns they are subjected for an hour to a heat of 550 degrees. That accounts for the almond flavor—the taste like toasted nuts.

Inside each grain there have occurred a hundred million explosions — one for every granule.

As a result the grains come out crisp, airy, porous, eight times normal size.

250,000,000 dishes were consumed last year

If the folks in your home didn't get their share, let them get it this year.

Telephone your grocer—now, before you forget it—to send you a package of each.

Success with Graded Lessons

As there is considerable agitation about the graded Sunday school lessons perhaps the readers of The Continent would like to hear a word from those who have had some practical experience with them. The Sunday school of First church of Hastings, Neb., organized and put the graded lessons into the school four years ago, as soon as they were published, and since that time have taken them up as they were issued. We have found them very efficient in every respect, making the teacher more careful in preparation and in attendance. In our junior department, consisting of seventy pupils and eight teachers, the superintendent reported no absentees among the teachers without previous arrangement for over six months, and similar reports come from the other departments.

We have found that the junior lessons lead to a desire to accept Christ and an earnest wish to unite with the church. For example, the pastor a year ago asked all the juniors who were Christians to stand, and the whole junior department rose. This year a number of the fourth year boys and girls will unite with the church. I think after giving the intermediate lessons a thorough study one will understand the object of the committee which planned them, for these lessons are to be the inspiration of these same boys and girls who have so recently started in the Christian life, giving them high ideals and appealing to them through the noble examples of men and women not only found in the Bible but also those who in modern times have stood for the truth even to the laying down of their lives. I do most heartily hope and pray that the General Assembly will not see fit to make any material changes in the plan of these lessons and that all may realize that the real object in all Sunday school work is to develop Christian character and that there is no better way of doing this than by setting before the boys and girls the noble examples as illustrated in all ages of our church history. E. S.

The Sunday School Only "a School"

I was much interested in a recent article signed by W. O. F. entitled "Look After the Children." The writer has evidently been accustomed to regard the Sunday school as an evangelistic agency. Evangelism is not included in the basic idea of the Sunday school; the basic idea of the Sunday school is school. It is a place, primarily, for imparting a knowledge of God's word, but it has not the means at its command, nor will it ever possess the means, of enforcing obedience to the precepts learned.

The statement of the writer that "80 per cent of the additions to the membership of our churches comes from the Sunday school" is misleading, for the import of the phraseology is that this proportion was evangelized by and in the Sunday school, which is very far from fact. It would be better to say that 80 per cent of our church members have passed through our Sunday schools. In my present pastorate quite a number of Sunday school children have united with the church, but not one of them was evangelized in or by the Sunday school.

The home is the God-appointed agency for evangelizing our children. In this day of hurry, the Sunday school can be used to impart the intellectual framework of religious training, but it is not fitted to impart the spiritual aspect of it. If it begins when it should, the spiritual nurture of a child commences before it is born and by the time a child is old enough to enter even the kindergarten department of a Sunday school the subtle influences of the God-imparted life have already taken root. And these are nourished and matured by the prayers and daily influence of a holy mother and by the spiritual leadership of a father who is a priest in his own home. My observation leads to the conclusion that nearly all the children of our Sunday schools who join the church and become true followers of Jesus Christ are those who have been reared in the warmth of holy love incarnate in the home; and that those not so reared largely go to make up that great company, estimated at 75 per cent of all Sunday school members, who drift out into the world and are lost to the church. Further than this, a study of those who join the church with the Sunday school training as their sole religious basis reveals the fact that they quite largely constitute that element who disgrace the church by blasphemy, intemperance and by running riot with the world. And where there has been no outbreaking sin they are at best indifferent and careless.

It is God's plan that the parents of the children should evangelize our youth, and if they are indifferent about it, or if they want to shoulder it off upon the Sunday school, then it seems to me it is time for the ministers of the Lord "to weep between the porch and the altar," and while they pray mightily, to preach to parents such heart-searching sermons as will arouse them to see the peril to their children. The present distress is upon us because parents have an overdrawn estimate of the spiritual possibilities of a Sunday school and a minimized estimate of their own spiritual obligations. ANSLEY B. BLADES.

Has He Improved It?

Replying to a question of English in the issue of Feb. 27, "How would you have said it?" I would have said: "The committee should consist of all the teachers and the mothers each of two children in each room." R. J. P.

U. S. and U. S. A. in Arkansas

Presbyterians in the city and Presbytery of Little Rock, Ark., are having a hard problem to solve, though church men a thousand miles distant may see it as quite easy. The Presbyterian Church U. S. A. is contemplating, after years of strenuous labor (in which they have not only established a strong organization and attained self-support but also acquired valuable property), uniting with the Presbyterian Church U. S. and surrendering their corporate name and existence. Seemingly but one thing is in the way, i. e., the presbytery's claim to an equity in the valuable property. A great amount has been given from home missions and other sources to bring our church to its present prosperity. It seems but fair that a return should be made. The Presbyterian Church U. S. A. has been quite ready to join in this give-and-take game. Usually it has fallen to our hand to give, yet all have rejoiced in the consolidations resulting. Let not those far removed be misled by the hasty judgment and more hasty pens of men who cross our southern commonwealth on a Pullman car, glancing hastily about them. The portion of our beloved church formerly Cumberland Presbyterian has long had a strong foothold in Arkansas, as in most of the Southern states.

In our union of a few years past we practically pledged the united church to work here. Ours is in no sense a sectional church. We have, during these long years, taken every precaution against overlapping and joined heartily in efforts for federation and local unions. We have no criticisms to make concerning our Southern Presbyterian brethren, but we do beg our northern friends to speak advisedly on these matters. The men on the field must have the right of first judgment. Time will solve many of these problems. The men in both churches are able ecclesiastical statesmen. Wonderful progress in reducing waste will be attained in a decade. G. W. S.

Former Congressman William S. Bennett of New York and Dr. W. J. Dawson of First church, Newark, N. J., recently spoke at the seventh annual dinner of the men's club of Park church, Newark.

Sunday School Missions After 25 Years

BY ALEXANDER HENRY

THE ASSEMBLING of upwards of sixty Sabbath school missionaries and educational superintendents in Chicago recently to celebrate the silver anniversary of Presbyterian Sabbath school missions naturally turns our thoughts to the distinctive character of the work these men are doing.

Twenty-five years ago the Presbyterian Church awoke to a definite realization of its responsibility for the Christian education of the youth of our land. Just as our church, in earlier days, carried on its foreign missionary work in conjunction with the Congregationalists, under the auspices of the American Board, so we were, for many years, prosecuting Sunday school missions under the auspices of the American Sunday School Union.

Seventy-five years ago the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions was organized, in order that the church, in its corporate capacity, could meet its responsibility for the evangelization of the world. In that same spirit the Board of Publication was made the Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work, in order that the Presbyterian Church could definitely engage in the work of providing Sabbath schools for the youth of our land who were living in communities deprived of church privileges.

The able committee of which Judge Shields of St. Louis was chairman, and such men as Doctors John Hall and George P. Hays were members, in reporting to the General Assembly of 1887 designated the work of the new agency about to be organized as "the establishment of Sabbath schools, religious visitation and the gratuitous distribution of Christian literature among the spiritually destitute."

If Sabbath school missions were needed twenty-five years ago, still more are they required now. The necessity for giving our American youth, through the Sabbath school, an opportunity to receive a Christian education is greater today than it was twenty-five years ago, while the difficulties of doing this have been enhanced rather than diminished.

The vital importance of the work and the complexities of its problems demand the best thought and concentrated attention of our churches, presbyteries and synods. Here is a case where we may well apply the apostolic motto: "This one thing I do."

The Sabbath school missionaries in their resolutions say: "The experience of twenty-five years in this effort to provide Christian education for our youth makes us feel that synods and presbyteries should give it a more prominent place in their planning and working, and we heartily indorse the report of the Executive Commission to the last General Assembly when it says: 'The board should have access to all destitute regions, and its methods and management should remain as originally constituted under the supervision of its own committees in presbyteries and synods.'"

Sunday School on the Plains of Western Kansas

Entire counties in this district are without a resident minister and the Sunday school is the only form of religious service maintained.

It is evident that the experience of twenty-five years of service confirms the wisdom of the original plans under which this work was inaugurated. The steady development of Presbyterian Sunday school missions, the abundant results and the growing appreciation of the church all indicate that the blessing of God has been resting upon it. With this assurance we can hopefully and courageously enter upon the ever-widening field of opportunity that opens before us.

Ways of Working

Interesting Annual Meetings

There is a certain class of men who attend annual meetings and who seldom are seen at any other church gathering. The opportunity to vote on church officials seems to attract them as a ward caucus does a prospective office holder. Perhaps to the large proportion of members of the average church the announcement of an annual meeting brings no pleasurable anticipation. The annual meetings they have attended in the past have been long drawn out affairs, full of statistics read in a monotonous voice. The only definite fact they got out of the meetings was that the church was or was not in debt.

There is a new order of annual meetings coming into being in which the business men have applied to church work the same system of analysis of cost and charts of operation which they use in their commercial affairs. Church members are learning now just how much the expense is each Sunday per capita for heating the church. They know just how much they have to contribute each week in order to meet the cost of insurance and interest. In the same way members of the session are being more specific and enlisting more intelligent support from the members of the church. A Minnesota church last year showed by a map of the city and an assortment of pins just where the membership lived in relation to the church. Other churches by means of maps have shown the large amount of work yet to be accomplished in what can be assumed legitimately to be their own territory.

In some churches those who have charge of the annual meeting have been in the habit of asking various members to prepare five-minute papers on such subjects as "How Can Our Church Reach More Men?" "What This Church Might Do for the Boys of the Community," "How the Church Music Can be Improved." Such papers not only serve the purpose of attracting a more representative gathering at the meeting but interest both speaker and hearers more definitely in new lines of activity.

Some churches have found it most satisfactory to have the financial and other statistical reports printed and distributed and only referred to by the officers who make any explanations necessary. The annual meeting is an excellent time to get people more deeply interested in the operation of the church and the opportunity should be improved to as great an extent as possible by presenting the facts of the church in a way to catch the interest of the schoolboy as well as the gray-haired veteran who has pored over the church ledger for the last twenty years.

Try to Reach Every Member

The month of March is being used by the Southern Church for a canvass of every member on behalf of the benevolences of the church. It is hoped that $1,500,000 may be raised this year. The Laymen's Missionary Movement of the Southern denomination is cooperating with the executive committees of the General Assembly in accomplishing this task. J. P. McCallie is chairman of the campaign committee. Beginning next fall he is to be general secretary of the Laymen's Missionary Movement.

Winning Temperance Fight

One of the direct and immediate products of an evangelistic campaign in Butler, Pa., early in January, 1912, under the leadership of Dr. French E. Oliver was a determined effort to free Butler county of all licensed places for the sale of alcoholic liquors. The judge refused all applications except two, one in Evans City and one in Zelienople. So embittered were the applicants of Butler and Lyndora that they promised to close their hotels to the public with the expiration of the license year. Because some relented this project failed.

The effort to become a free county was renewed this year. Remonstrances were filed against each of the twenty-eight applications for retail license and a general remonstrance against the wholesale applicants. More than 10,000 persons signed these papers, about half of them being men. Evidence, too, was presented in court. More than sixty representative business men testified that business had been steadier and stronger in the year practically free from licensed houses and that peace and sobriety showed a marked improvement in the industrial centers where liquors had previously been dispensed. The court denied all the applications.

Oklahoma Boys at Work

This group of young Americans compose the Amer-I-Can Club of Tonkawa, Okla., one of a number of similar organizations for boys in Oklahoma formed by Rev. M. J. Millard, secretary of boys' work for the synod.

Country Church Active Long

The eighty-fifth anniversary of Seneca Castle (N. Y.) church was observed by special exercises March 7. At the afternoon meeting the pastor, Rev. E. E. Grosh, read an historical paper prepared by himself and Elders G. W. Sargent and Henry J. Peck. Rev. John S. Niles, moderator of presbytery, presided, and Rev. George Nicholls of Dresden and Rev. A. B. Temple of Seneca took part in the service. Rev. H. H. Kellogg, a former pastor, and E. Payson Porter of New York, son of the first stated supply of the church in 1828, gave reminiscences. After supper to the out-of-town guests the exercises were concluded at the evening service, at which Dr. J. Wilford Jacks, stated clerk of synod, presided. Dr. John McColl of Gorham, whose church was organized the same year as Seneca Castle church, led the devotions and Dr. Joseph H. France of Naples and Rev. Carl W. Scovel of Cortland made addresses.

Among the ministers who have served the church are Stephen Porter eleven years, Burritt B. Gray seventeen years, A. H. Parmelee four years, H. H. Kellogg fourteen years, Howard Cornell twelve years, E. E. Grosh nearly five years. Others served shorter terms. The church is situated in a rural section of Ontario county, practically a country church. Quite recently an extension was made to the edifice and room for religious and other purposes added at a cost of nearly $2,400. The anniversary revived and encouraged the church to further service.

over. Revolving in my mind was the question whether the mysticism of worship or the experiences of life offer the soundest guide marks to the highest truth. The story cut so much deeper into my consciousness than the exposition to which we had just listened.

We moved outside without speaking, and from the platform my eyes at once fell on a schooner that was lying in the harbor.

"What did you do, skipper, when the steamer at last took you from the island?"

"Why, I just went and got that schooner on credit," he replied, as he noticed the direction in which I was looking. "You can't afford to be idle, and it's no good to keep looking back, is it?"

"Yet some people do both, skipper," I answered. "Though no man can afford to do either."

The Shepherd Who Watched by Night

Thomas Nelson Page has a most beautiful story in the March Number of Scribner's Magazine entitled "The Shepherd Who Watched by Night." It is the story of an old rector who had outlived his active usefulness and who came to a pitiful earthly end in a strange unfolding of glory. Do not fail to read the story.

> "He was no longer able to preach. He had felt something of this himself. Now it came home to him like a blow on the head, and a deeper pain was the conviction which, long hovering about his heart, now settled and took definite shape, that he ought to get out. But where could he go? He would have gone long since if he had known where to go. He could not go out and graze like an old horse on the roadside. There was no provision made for such as he. No pensions were provided by his church for old and disabled clergymen, and the suggestion made in the letter had no foundation in his case: 'You must or, at least, you should have saved something in all this time.'
> "This sounded almost humorous and a wintry little smile flickered for a moment about the wrinkled mouth. His salary had never been over six hundred dollars, and there were so many to give to. Of late, it had been less than this amount and not all of this had been paid. The smile died out, and the old man's face grew grave again as he tried to figure out what he could do. He thought of one or two old friends to whom he could write. Possibly, they might have some country parish that would be willing to take him, though it was a forlorn hope. If he could but hold on till they invited him, it would be easier, for he knew how difficult it was for a clergyman out of a place to get a call. People were so suspicious. Once out, he was lost.
> "At the thought, a picture of a little plot amid the trees in the small cemetery on the hill near the town slipped into his mind. Three little slabs stood there above three mounds, one longer than the others. They covered all that was mortal of what he had loved best on earth. The old man sighed and his face in the dim light took on an expression very far away. He drifted off into a reverie. Ah, if they had only been left to him, the two boys that God had sent him and had then taken back to Himself, and the good wife who had borne up so bravely till she had sunk by the wayside. If he were only with them!"

Ministerial Relief and Sustentation would not take away from such a servant of Jesus Christ any of his faithfulness and power. It would only add to his efficiency, and rob his last days on earth of their pressing care.

to escort you home. I have an engagement."

The engagement seemed to take him in the same direction as Mrs. Elmore, for they left the house together. Ansley had learned to know his old playfellow better than ever in this past winter. His frequent visits to Bradford at her home had not ceased even when Bradford was absent or out of town.

Hand in hand the student and the maid went out into the night. Orion, the old sword-girded god, marching around the world, saw two happy souls drink their first draught from the chalice whose edges are ruby lips, and whose contents are affection pure and sweet as incarnate innocence. But Orion went his way to the west and told no one.

Dr. Jickers was in his library reading. He heard steps, and raising his eyes saw Lucy and Austin Sleighton standing before him, still hand in hand.

"Bless my soul! What's all this? What's all this, Lucy?"

Sleighton replied. "Let me answer, Dr. Jickers. I love your daughter, and I want her for my bride."

"You do? Is your heart in that request, too, Lucy?"

"Yes, father."

The old man rose, drew the girl to him and kissed her; then, with warm hand grasp to Sleighton, "God bless you, my son!" he said. "I'll go tell mother."

It was midnight when Austin Sleighton, closing the front door behind him, met Ansley Jickers coming up the walk. "The escort business seems to have been protracted, Mr. Sleighton," he said. "I am an interpreter as well as an attorney. Have you seen my father?"

"Yes. I should not have stayed so long otherwise."

"Ah, yes, I understand, I understand. Congratulations, Austin; hearty congratulations."

"Pardon me, Ansley," said the other as they shook hands. "But Mrs. Elmore has no father, has she?"

Ansley smiled. "I see you are an interpreter, too," he continued. (To be continued)

Many at Philippine Sunday School Convention

The second annual Sunday school convention of the Philippines, lasting three days, has just closed. It was probably the most helpful and enthusiastic interdenominational convention, or conference, that has ever been held in the islands, with almost 300 present. The convention was held in Manila from Jan. 31 to Feb. 2 in the Tondo Presbyterian church and the Cervantes M. E. church, the two largest Protestant churches. Delegates were present from Presbyterian, Methodist, Disciples, United Brethren and Baptist churches.

Timely topics were discussed by some of the ablest missionaries and workers, Filipino pastors and helpers in the islands. Rev. Alfred Williams of Portland was a special representative of the International Sunday School Association and rendered valuable assistance at every session. Mr. and Mrs. Fred Butler of New York were of much service in rendering special songs. A strong effort will be made to bring more into the Sunday schools, the united forces of which have already reached about 35,000. A resolution was passed to request the World Sunday School Association to send a field secretary to oversee the Sunday school work in the Philippines.

THE KNOW HOW

To Feed Children and Get Good Results

There are more nervous persons made so by undigested food lying in the stomach than the average individual would suppose.

If food remains undigested in the stomach, it begins to ferment, set up gas and a large portion is thus converted into poison.

That's why imperfectly digested food may, and often does, cause irritation of the nerves and stupor of the mind—brain and nerves are really poisoned.

"My daughter had complained for some time of a distressed feeling in the stomach, after eating, which set me thinking that her diet was not right," writes an anxious and intelligent mother.

"She had been fond of cereals, but had never tried Grape-Nuts. From reading the account of this predigested food it seemed reasonable to try Grape-Nuts for her case.

"The results were really wonderful. The little brain that seemed at times unable to do its work took on new life and vigor. Every morning, now, before going to school, she eats the crisp little morsels and is now completely and entirely well; she seems to have a new lease on life—no more distress in the stomach, nor headache, but sound and well every way." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

"There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true and full of human interest.

Cochran and Mahy Visit Colleges

Evangelistic and Vocational Meetings Awaken Remarkable Response Among Presbyterian and Other Students of Institutions.

Secretaries Joseph W. Cochran of the Board of Education and George G. Mahy of the evangelistic committee have lately completed a tour of four Presbyterian colleges—Hanover, Carroll, Coe and Macalester. They stayed from four to five days in each of these institutions, Dr. Cochran conducting vocational meetings and Mr. Mahy evangelistic meetings. Both, however, devoted more time to personal interviews than to public meetings.

Of students not previously connected with the church large numbers professed conversion. In Hanover, the brilliant son of a Presbyterian minister, who, as an avowed unbeliever, has seriously depressed the religious life of the school, surrendered to Christ. At Carroll College, the night before the visitors were to leave, students in the women's dormitory besought their matron to prevail upon the secretaries to remain a day longer in order that all the girls in the building might confess Christ before the meetings were ended. This ambition was completely realized.

In the vocational meetings Dr. Cochran presented to the whole body of students a new form of volunteer pledge, of which the heart is an unlimited promise to put one's self at God's command for whatever calling he may in his providence open up. At Hanover nineteen girls and twenty-one boys signed this pledge; at Carroll forty-one girls and thirty-nine boys; at Coe about the same number and at Macalester almost the whole student body. After completing this tour Dr. Cochran went to Madison, Wis., and spoke in Christ church before an audience of about 600 students from the University of Wisconsin, whom Pastors Hunt and Allison had gathered together. After an inspiring address Dr. Cochran presented this Christian pledge to the audience of university men, and forty of them accepted it.

In view of the great success of this experiment among the colleges the two secretaries have determined to select thirty evangelistic pastors from all parts of the church, call them together into conference on methods for one or two weeks, and then, after making arrangements with their congregations, send each of them out for a month's service next winter in Presbyterian institutions of learning.

School and College

The Korean summer school at Hastings College will open the middle of June and continue for twelve weeks. This is the only summer school of the kind outside of Korea and is attended by Korean students of this country from almost every state in the union. Continued progress is being made on the endowment and it is hoped that the full $100,000 will be raised before commencement.

Jamestown College will graduate its first college class next June, the fourth commencement since the reopening of the college. About the same time it will lay the corner stone of its sixth college building, five of which will have been erected during the four years. This one, Gordon science hall, is larger and finer than any of the others. The funds were secured from a single donor. The recent special meetings under Rev. E. H. Moore of Minneapolis were phenomenally successful.

Home Made

Have your cake, muffins, and tea biscuit home-made. They will be fresher, cleaner, more tasty and wholesome.

Royal Baking Powder helps the house-wife to produce at home, quickly and economically, fine and tasty cake, the raised hot-biscuit, puddings, the frosted layer-cake, crisp cookies, crullers, crusts and muffins, with which the ready-made food found at the bake-shop or grocery does not compare.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK

The men's glee club of Whitman College left for its annual trip March 24. Concerts were scheduled at Kennewick, Wenatchee, Almira, Davenport and Spokane.

Princeton University will receive nearly $3,000,000 by the will of F. S. Thompson of New York, who recently died in Paris. A bequest of $700,000 will be available at once.

The Y. W. C. A. of Glendale College has been making a study of China during the Lenten weeks. This association is wide awake and contributes liberally to the different interests of the work of the churches and is endeavoring to have an intelligent comprehension of missions.

The seventy-fifth anniversary of Monticello Seminary, Godfrey, Ill., will be celebrated beginning June 3. When the school was first opened Chicago was a village. It was before the days of railways and each student furnished her own tallow candle by which to study. The seminary was opened with a curriculum identical with that of Yale and the building was built of near-by stone after a road had been cut through the forest so that the stone could be dragged out by oxen.

The February meetings in Maryville College closed with the four college classes of nearly 200 young men and women all united in Christian profession. The meetings were conducted by Rev. J. M. Broady, the newly installed pastor of First Avenue church of Birmingham, Ala., who was himself converted in the February meetings during his college days at Maryville. There were ninety-eight decisions for Christ. Of the 615 students in all departments of the college only fifteen were not won. President S. T. Wilson says that about a hundred unconverted students enter the college every year and the fixed purpose of this institution is to win this hundred to Christ before the close of the year. There are now thirty-four candidates for the ministry among the students.

Reaches Civil War Veterans

Among the many special services being held in all parts of the country there is encouragement for workers in obscure places in the results achieved in the country church of Dillsboro, Ind. Of eleven new members, seven are over 60 years old. Two of them are veterans of the civil war. They joined church with their wives. The congregation is being served by J. M. Murchison of Lane Seminary, who was assisted in special services by Rev. T. Worsley Maguire of New Castle, Ind.

Philadelphia Offers China Aid

Medical Missionary Volunteers from St. Paul Church — Woodland Congregation to Erect Bible Institute in Shantung.

PHILADELPHIA—Ground floor and galleries of St. Paul's church were fully occupied at the March communion, 930 being present. The pastor, Dr. J. Beveridge Lee, announced, as the greatest honor that had come to him in his twenty years' ministry, that an esteemed member and active worker of the church, Dr. Warren J. Miller, had offered himself for the China mission field and would doubtless be sustained by St. Paul church as its medical missionary. The church has adopted the budget system with the use of duplex envelopes for church maintenance and benevolence.

Woodland church, Rev. James Ramsay Swain minister, will erect a Bible institute as a memorial to the late Mrs. B. B. Comegys, Jr., at Ichowfu in the Shantung province of China. Mrs. Comegys was always a devoted student and able teacher of the Bible and has led parlor classes not only in Philadelphia but before conference classes at Northfield and elsewhere. As president of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the church and also the woman's foreign societies of presbytery, she was consecrated to the cause of missions and, in response to the China emergency campaign, gave herself unsparingly to its aid until her death.

The Presbyterian ministers Monday passed resolutions of high esteem and were led in prayer for Dr. William Hutton, their secretary for thirty years, who for some weeks has been in the Presbyterian hospital in a critical condition from cancer of the cheek.

The accessions of members to the churches of the city at the March communion have been unusually large, as the Calendar and Record shows.

Disston Memorial church, H. C. McBride, D. D., pastor, joined with the Baptist, Methodist, Lutheran and Episcopal churches of the Tacony district in holy week services.

Ninth church, Dr. J. A. Higgons pastor, has had three receptions of new members inside of three months, bringing the number up to nearly 150.

The recent Philadelphia conference of the Methodist Church voted that $800 should be the minimum salary of a minister.

Rev. Hugh W. Rankin of Salt Lake City addressed the March meeting of the superintendents' association in Oxford church. Rev. John W. Francis, pastor of the church, addressed the Sunday midnight services in Forepaugh's theater. W. P. WHITE.

$50,000 Home for Sunday School

Knoxville Church Work Has Overflowed Present Building—Homewood Avenue Congregation to Start New Structure.

PITTSBURG—Knoxville church, Dr. W. A. Jones pastor, is planning a new Sunday school plant. The present church building and Sunday school room are entirely too small. More than one year ago the men's Bible class, numbering more than 100 members, an outgrowth of the Men and Religion Movement, was compelled to seek quarters in an old dwelling. Ground has been purchased adjoining the present church property and plans drawn for a Sunday school plant to cost in the neighborhood of $50,000. In addition to the new plant a gallery will be placed in the present auditorium to accommodate the congregation.

Plans for the new Homewood Avenue building have been completed and a campaign of money raising will be started the 1st of April. The new auditorium will accommodate 1,100 and the Sunday school rooms 1,500. It is proposed to sell the present church property, which has become valuable as a business site, and build near by on ground purchased several months ago.

The annual meeting of the home and foreign missionary societies of presbytery were held in First church March 27-28. In the evening of the 27th the young people's branch of the presbytery held its spring missionary rally in the same church. The principal address was made by Miss Charlotte Hawes of China.

Fourth church, Dr. Samuel Callen pastor, experienced one of the best revival seasons in its history during the past three weeks. The pastor has done all the preaching, and the attendance has been exceptionally good.

Rev. E. M. Milligan, pastor of Sewickley U. P. church, has been elected manager of the Board of Publication of the U. P. Church, succeeding Rev. J. D. Sands, lately deceased.

Rev. John Hoffman, pastor of Crafton M. E. church, has declined the call to succeed Dr. Charles Goodell in New York as pastor of the largest church of the denomination in this country.

Dr. George Montgomery, field secretary of missions in Pittsburg Presbytery, has been ill and confined to his home for some time. Dr. E. Trumbull Lee, pastor of First church, Wilkinsburg, is now confined to his bed, with little hope of his recovery. P. W. SNYDER.

Federation Asks for New Law

Church Men Take Active Part in War on Vice — Calvary Church Mission Reaches Many Persons—St. John's School Crowded.

SAN FRANCISCO—The church federation at a recent meeting took action on two important matters of reform. First, to urge on and assist the municipal authorities to more earnest efforts to clean up the infamous "Barbary coast," and, second, to urge the passage of a law now pending before the legislature, that holds the owner of the property responsible for the violation of the laws intended for the suppression of the social evil. Dr. Rader and his people in Calvary church are aiding in this work in San Francisco through the Kearney Street mission. This is supported chiefly by the Bible class conducted by Daniel Steele. Dr. Rader often preaches there, and during the last three months more than 10,000 men, he says, have come under its influence and hundreds have been converted.

Brooklyn church, Oakland, during the year raised $7,000 for all purposes. Of this $1,900 was for benevolence. Rev. H. K. Sanborne is pastor.

There are about 58,000 Japanese in California, and 2,000 of these are Christians connected with eight denominations and thirty-six churches. In May, 1911, a Japanese Interdenominational Board of Missions was organized, which recently held a conference in San Francisco. The purpose of the organization is to Christianize the Japanese in this country and bring about more harmonious relations between Americans and their own people. The organization employs a secretary and an evangelist and publishes a monthly paper.

St. John's church, Rev. Alexander Eakin pastor, is preparing to build a model Sabbath school room. Its school is one of the largest in presbytery, the primary department alone numbering 130 members. A men's club was recently organized at this church.

Rev. W. K. Howe, pastor of Trinity church, is making special effort to reach people through evangelistic services for the evening congregations. This church has a Sunday school superintendent, Henry E. Bostwick, over 80 years old. He has been at the head of the school for a quarter of a century. JAMES CURRY.

Tusculum as an Investment

The natural resources of this section are being rapidly developed. Northern and eastern capital is harnessing our streams, mining our ores, utilizing our forests.

But note: Our most precious raw material is left in the rough.

In Tusculum's county are 10,615 white children of school age. Of these only twelve complete the course in the only county high school. These conditions are typical of those existing in Western North Carolina, Eastern Tennessee, Southern Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky and Georgia—Tusculum's field.

Tusculum is the agency developing this raw material.

It is not a mission school of unclassified standing but a standard college, whose work is recognized by our best northern institutions.

New York Has Another Church

West-Park Forms Congregation on Washington Heights—G. Campbell Morgan Attracts Crowds New Brooklyn Edifice Occupied.

NEW YORK—The new church on Washington Heights will be organized March 27 under the auspices of West-Park church. Dr. Anson P. Atterbury, one copastor, will preach the organization sermon and Dr. Anthony H. Evans, the other pastor, will preside. This corporation is rich since the old West church sold out for $1,100,000 and came up to Park church. It will build a handsome church on the heights. Already there is a strong constituency and a good Sunday school. Dr. William Carter has been the supply pastor.

Dr. Wilton Merle-Smith, long the pastor of Grover Cleveland, preached a memorial and dedication sermon in First church, Caldwell, N. J., in connection with the consecration of the manse of that congregation, where President Cleveland was born, to the Grover Cleveland Memorial Association as a public historic center.

Although it is almost three years since Dr. G. Campbell Morgan of London preached in New York, the crowds that greeted him in Carnegie hall March 18 and in Fifth Avenue church March 19 showed that he still holds the same place as ever in the hearts of Protestant New Yorkers. He will be in this country again to lecture at Northfield this summer.

HUNGARIANS MEET IN CHURCH

March 15 is the national holiday of the Hungarians, and on that date of the present year the American Parish, over which Rev. Norman Thomas presides, invited 200 patriotic and benevolent societies of that nationality to celebrate the day in East Harlem church. The church was crowded with Magyars, who marched there in a great procession. Enthusiastic patriotic addresses were made. Pastor Thomas spoke in English on American patriotism. It was regarded as the best opening which the American parish has yet had to influence a large body of Hungarians.

Central church, Dr. Wilton Merle-Smith pastor, has changed its second service from evening to afternoon as an experiment.

Mrs. John S. Kennedy has gone to Europe to see the $200,000 Waldensian church which she has built in Rome, Italy, near the Vatican and under the shadow of the dome of St. Peter's. This is almost finished and Mrs. Kennedy expects to see it dedicated.

At Northminster church, Rev. Arthur H. Limouze pastor, a sunrise service was held Easter morning. In the evening a program was given by the Sunday school entitled "The First Easter." A potted plant was sent to every family in the school.

Dr. Jonathan C. Day, superintendent of Labor temple, has been presented with a loving cup by some of the white goods workers in celebration of their recent victory after a strike.

Exercises in connection with the dedication of the new Italian church lasted a week. The first four evenings the preachers were Italian ministers. Rev. Norman M. Thomas, "bishop of the upper East side"; Rev. William P. Shriver and Dr. Ajide Pirazzini, brother of the pastor, were preachers March 21.

The new building of Wells Memorial church was used for the first time on Easter Sunday.

New York Presbytery has ordered the printing of the paper on religious education presented by Dr. D. G. Wylie, chairman of the committee on Sabbath schools and young peoples' societies, in the presbytery Jan. 13. It is available for distribution. It especially emphasizes the practice of daily family prayer and the setting apart of part of the hour of public worship in the church for "the kind of instruction that children need."

GIRLS APPRECIATE NOON LUNCH

One hundred young women are now taking lunch daily at the lunchroom opened in its parish house by West Twenty-Third Street church. Two young girls who had been canvassing along the streets for trading stamps entered and asked if they could get lunch for 10 cents. After being served with soup and a generous plate of bread, and being invited to enjoy the restroom, one of the girls was heard to say to the other, "Ain't this just heaven!" They said that they had been accustomed to make their lunch from rolls which they carried in their pockets and ate in vacant hallways. The ladies of the church serve tables in the lunchroom, and Dr. Menhenhall, the pastor, says that through this contact the lunchroom is doing the church people more good than it does the girls who patronize it.

The four district superintendents of the Board of Home Missions—Doctors Fullerton of St. Louis, Kearns of Minneapolis, Donaldson of Denver and Holt of Portland—were in the city last Friday and Saturday in conference with the executive officers of the board.

First Congregational church, Montclair, N. J., has placed in its vestibule a bronze bas relief of Professor Hugh Black of Union Theological Seminary, in commemoration of the two years he was acting pastor of the church.

The offering at Fifth Avenue church Sunday, Feb. 26, for the Board of Relief and Sustentation was $2,320.17.

Enlarge the Facilities for Men

First Church Conducting Campaign for Addition to Building—Dr. Fox at Work at South Park—Ministers Discuss Amusements.

CHICAGO—A whirlwind campaign to raise $75,000 to enlarge First church is in progress this week by the men of the congregations which up to a few months ago formed First and Forty-First Street churches. S. Leonard Boyce is general chairman of the various committees which have met daily this week. It is hoped that the full amount will be pledged by Sunday morning. The west end of the church will be reconstructed with special reference to more space for the activities of boys and men. There will also be additional room for the Sunday school. Definite plans for the addition have not yet been made.

Millard Avenue church, vacant for a year, has gone to Oakes, N. D., for a pastor. Rev. Bertram G. Jackson has accepted a call and will begin work May 1.

A demonstration of costumes for "The World in Chicago" was held Wednesday in the La Salle hotel. Various officials connected with the exposition were present.

Men of the four Presbyterian churches of Joliet will meet Monday night. Dr. F. M. Fox will speak.

DR. BOYLE INTERESTS PASTORS

Dr. W. H. Wray Boyle before the ministers Monday advocated the necessity of a substitute for the modern stage in place of continued protest. His address on "The Fine Arts of Discrimination in the Matter of Books and Amusements" aroused more interest than the ministers have evinced in any subject for several months. It was also suggested that ministers might compile lists of safe books with profit to young people.

The ministers have indorsed the pending bill prohibiting cigarettes in the state.

"The World in Chicago" conducts a prayer service each Monday noon from 12:30 to 1 in room 901 Masonic temple. Everyone is invited to participate.

Dr. Francis M. Fox, associate secretary of the national Brotherhood, will preach at South Park church Sunday evening at the opening of a campaign with men of the church. Rev. D. C. Boyd is pastor.

The rebuilt Jefferson Park church will be dedicated Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock, when Dr. G. N. Luccock will preach the sermon. It is expected that this church, which has been in the hands of the builders for nine months, will be able to do large things for the community.

Olivet Institute in connection with Easter issued a leaflet, "One of His Lilies," telling of the regeneration of several families through the influence of one girl touched by the preaching at the institute.

Students of McCormick Seminary are assisting the work of Olivet Institute by speaking to men in German at shop meetings.

Much is expected of the work among the foreigners of Joliet through the newly instituted mission supported by the four men's clubs of the Presbyterian churches.

Christian Endeavorers of the city are preparing for the annual reception and dinner April 1 at Hotel Morrison. Professor Allan Hoben will be one of the speakers, in addition to a number of prominent Endeavorers.

Coincident with the investigation of wages of local sales girls has come the announcement of a plan to build a hotel in the downtown district solely for working girls and women. The project was started by the Daughters of the American Revolution, who have already received promises of support from La Verne Noyes, W. G. Shedd and W. B. McKinley.

FRENCH RESPOND TO CONTEST

The Sunday school of St. Anne church has grown from 150 to 511 in the last two months through a contest between classes of men and women. This French congregation of Rev. Pierre Beauchamp has gathered a third of the population of the town into the Presbyterian Sunday school. The two classes, which started with a dozen or so each, closed the contest with 230 men and 140 women enrolled. Special services in English and French have followed for several weeks to enlist the cooperation of those attracted by the contest for members.

Burial services for Richard Lane were conducted by Dr. W. S. Plumer Bryan last Sunday. After forty years as a criminal he was converted in Pacific Garden mission sixteen years ago just after he had been ordered out of the city by the police. He had since been doing Christian work. Three weeks before his death he addressed a street meeting in the rain. This, with an attack by robbers, one of whom had previously been befriended by him, hastened his end. He was 76 years old.

Good Things in This Issue

From the many items of happenings in the world in this issue of The Continent pastors, teachers, sociologists and others can get special inspiration from these four:

1. What of China's future? Read the first item on page 436. In an audience of 3,000 in Canton, 825 young Chinese signed a pledge offered by John R. Mott to read the Bible and to pray every day.
2. What of American college students? Read the report of the visit of Secretaries Cochran and Mahy, page 440. Scores of men and women pledged their lives to the calling Christ will show.
3. What is being done for the young people of the Philippines? Read on page 440 The Continent's report of the Sunday school conventions in Manila.
4. Is Kansas the only place where increased business follows abolition of saloons? Read the answer on page 439, "Winning Temperance Fight."

Your children may be attracted by the contest for stories about the zebra on page 432. Your Sunday school class will be glad to hear about the little girl of Chicago's congested region who would send her headless doll to India, page 436. The map of the stations served by Dr. Grenfell will make the second part of the story by this missionary more real, page 428.

Next week read the article by William T. Ellis on the Atlanta way of handling a great evil and discuss with men of your church what can be done in your town.

Railroad Arrangements for Atlanta

The railroad associations have granted concessions in fare as follows:

1. East of Pittsburg and Buffalo and north of the Potomac river. One and one-half first-class limited fares to Washington, plus $20.20 therefrom for round trip, going and returning same route only. Dates of sale May 12, 14, 18 and 19. Return limit June 10, unless extended.
2. South of Potomac and Ohio and east of Mississippi river. Round trip rate on basis of approximately 3 cents per mile, plus 25 cents for round trip. Dates of sale May 12 to 14. Return limit June 10, unless extended.
3. East of Chicago and St. Louis, west of Pittsburg and Buffalo, north of the Ohio. Round trip 2 cents per mile each direction, added to fares given by Southeastern Passenger Association. (See Section 2.) Dates of sale May 12 to 14, 18 and 19. Return limit June 10.
4. West of Chicago, Peoria, St. Louis, Memphis and New Orleans, up to Denver, Colo. Round trip 2 cents per mile each direction, added to the fares from New Orleans, Memphis, St. Louis, Chicago, etc., to Atlanta. Dates of sale May 11 to 14, except that west of Amarillo and Eagle Pass, Texas, and the Missouri river tickets will be sold May 10 to 13 inclusive.

Open session of General Assembly May 15.

William H. Roberts, D. D., Stated Clerk.

Board Opens Month's Campaign

The campaign of a month of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation in Albany Presbytery will open April 3 at Sand Lake, where Dr. W. J. Johnson, field representative of eastern district, will speak. The next evening at Rensselaer Dr. W. H. Foulkes, general secretary, will speak, with Dr. Johnson at Stephentown. Dates for the following week are: April 6, Dr. Foulkes, morning, Amsterdam Second; evening, Amsterdam Emmanuel; Dr. Johnson, morning, Albany Fourth; evening, Albany Madison Avenue. April 8, Rev. Alfred Fowler, Northville. April 9, Dr. Johnson, Ballston Center; Mr. Fowler, Broadalbine, April 10, Dr. Johnson, Charlton; Mr. Fowler, Galway. April 11, Dr. Foulkes, Voorheesville; Dr. Johnson, New Scotland; Mr. Fowler, West Galway.

Young Women to Convene at Richmond

The fourth biennial national convention of the Y. W. C. A. is to meet at Richmond, Va., April 9-15. One of the special satisfactions of the gathering will be the mutual congratulations to be exchanged over the completion of the new eleven-story headquarters on Lexington avenue, New York City, into which the national board has recently moved its offices. This is the greatest building occupied anywhere in the world exclusively for the philanthropic activities of women.

The speakers of the Richmond meeting include Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin, Dr. James G. K. McClure, Dr. Graham Taylor, Mrs. Raymond Robins, Rev. Frank W. Bible and Miss Jessie Woodrow Wilson, daughter of the President. The most brilliant feature of the convention will be an outdoor pageant, carefully planned for this occasion with striking effectiveness of color, costume and music to symbolize various features of association work.

Ministerial Obituary

Dr. Thomas Dougan

As a result of cold contracted during a long drive in serving the churches of Inkster, Fordville and Belleville, N. D., Dr. Thomas Dougan died Feb. 22. He was born seventy years ago in Ireland and served the churches at North Bend, Ashland and Brodhead, Wis.; Hillsboro and Langdon, N. D., and Roseland, Chicago, Ill.

Rev. Augustus W. Cowles

Rev. Augustus W. Cowles, president emeritus of Elmira College for Women, died recently in Elmira, N. Y., in his ninety-fifth year. He was born in Reading, N. Y., in 1819 and was graduated from Union College in 1841. Six years later he was ordained in the Presbyterian ministry and became pastor at Brockport. In 1856 Mr. Cowles was elected the first president of Elmira College and served in that capacity until 1890, when he was succeeded by Rev. Alexander C. MacKenzie.

A. A. Willits, D. D.

Dr. A. A. Willits is dead at Philadelphia at the age of 92. Dr. Willits served as Presbyterian pastor in Philadelphia and in Dayton, Ohio, but his national fame came to him as a lyceum lecturer. Few men have spoken in as many cities of the United States as had he, and his "Sunshine" lecture, which was the most popular in his repertoire, gave him the sobriquet of "The Apostle of Sunshine." He was peculiarly worthy of it, for his spirit was buoyantly optimistic.

Temperance Topics

More Deadly Than Fever—According to the bulletin of the North Carolina board of health liquor is to blame for twice as many deaths as typhoid fever.

Mistaken Idea of Moslem Abstinence—There exists in the popular mind a well founded fiction that Moslems do not drink, and never get drunk, says The Orient (Constantinople). The perusal of the Constantinople dailies for a single week will shatter such a belief; and were the police records open to public inspection they would tell a sad tale of the spread of drunkenness even among Mohammedans. And there is the more reason for Christians to work hard against this danger, for the drink evil has come into the Moslem communities through them.

Meanest Man—In the opinion of The American Issue the meanest man in the country has been found and it is a safe guess he will hold the championship for a long time to come. This fellow lives in Kansas City and is a whisky dealer. He wrote to all the preachers in Kansas and Missouri for the names of confirmed drinkers in order that he might send them a remedy for drunkenness. Some 2,000 names were sent in and to each of these this whisky dealer sent a bottle of whisky for a Christmas present, together with an advertisement of the various brands of liquor he has for sale.

These are the names of city officials in Chicago. They indicate the growing part in civic and national affairs which is being taken by men of foreign birth. Men with names fully as strange are coming to America by the thousands. There are selfish men ready to exploit them. Is anyone doing anything for their moral good? Their strange speech bars them from American churches. They may be reached best by preachers in their own tongue, and fortunately young men of their own country are willing to preach to them. In fact these students are so eager to preach that most of them are glad to earn their way through college and seminary, doing many different tasks. These leaders must be trained, and Dubuque German College and Seminary is maintained for this peculiar task. Full information concerning this institution will be sent gladly by Dr. C. M. Steffens, President, Dubuque, Iowa.

News Notes from Various Fields

City Churches Gain Most

The religious statistics of Buffalo Presbytery have disclosed a rather startling difference in the effectiveness of church extension work in the populous centers above that in the more rural parts. The gain in population in Erie county (Buffalo) for the past decade has been 21.9 per cent. The growth in the number of Presbyterian church members for the same period has been 22.7 per cent. The rural county of Chautauqua, with a growth in population of 19 per cent in the last decade, has had a growth of Presbyterian members of but .03 per cent. The same condition is shown in Cattaraugus county, which constitutes another rural part of Buffalo Presbytery.

The Buffalo churches have been carrying out a definite recommendation of presbytery by observing the Lenten season by church services. Many of the pastors have trained communicant classes; a number of the churches observed communion on Thursday evening of Passion week and some of the choirs rendered Steiner's "Crucifixion" Friday evening.

Waterville church was damaged to the extent of $1,000 when a broken pipe flooded the church auditorium with steam for a night.

As a result of the introduction of institutional methods in Fourth church, Syracuse, a large number of members were received March 12.

Hitchcock Memorial church at Hartsdale will soon erect a new building. It is encouraged by the prospective pastorate of Rev. George H. Smyth.

The congregation of Seneca church decorated the auditorium beautifully March 9 in honor of their pastor, Asher B. Temple, D. D., who has served that church forty years. It is the longest pastorate in Geneva Presbytery and one of the longest in western New York.

Old First church, Albany, has within the year purchased adjoining property for enlargement purposes at a cost of $15,000. It has welcomed many members during the year, added new pews in all possible places and several families are still on the waiting list. The church was founded 150 years ago and celebrates in October. Governor Sulzer attends there.

Massachusetts

Boston observed the centenary of David Livingstone March 10 by a meeting in historic Park Street church. The building was taxed to its utmost capacity by an ideal audience. There were present literary people of both sexes, college professors, ministers of all shades of theological opinion and large numbers of missionary enthusiasts. Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston of Stamford, Conn., formerly of New York, was the orator. His address was of a high order.

Delaware

Officers and members of West church, Wilmington, gave a reception to the pastor and wife, Rev. and Mrs. U. Franklin Smiley, March 10 in the Sunday school hall. There were about 600 people present, including the mayor and representatives from other churches of the city.

New Jersey

Rev. John McDowell of Park church, Newark, is considering an invitation to Trumbull Avenue church of Detroit, Mich. This is the third time Mr. McDowell has been asked back to Detroit since he left there eight years ago.

Pennsylvania

A mission of three weeks was held by the pastor of Bellefonte church, G. E. Hawes, D. D. The pastor had the assistance of a friend, Dr. W. I. Wishart from the U. P. church, the last week.

Market Square church, Harrisburg, has recently raised $1,200 for the China fund.

The largest communion in history of the church followed services in Second church, Pottsville, March 3-9. Rev. Raymond C. Walker is pastor.

Rev. George S. Rentz was installed pastor of Derry church at Hershey March 15. J. Henry Spicer, Rev. J. N. Waggonhurst, Rev. C. Benjamin Segelken and Dr. J. Ritchie Smith took part in the services.

The Gettysburg boys' club of First church of that historic town on their own suggestion hold a weekly prayer meeting conducted in their club rooms by the boys at the same time that the pastor is conducting the church prayer meeting in the lecture room. These meetings have been well led and excellent in every particular. All present freely take part. Dr. C. B. Stauffer, superintendent of the club, exercises oversight of the meeting. During the present ecclesiastical year this congregation has laid a cement sidewalk about the church, and painted and decorated the manse. A men's organized Bible class and a brotherhood have been established. On July 1 Rev. Franklin E. Taylor will complete his second year as pastor.

Maryland

Want Vacation for Bible Study

A number of churches in the northern part of Baltimore have united in a request to the school board for a half-day holiday. Instead of going to their homes the children will go to their various churches for religious instruction if this request is granted. Dr. Kerr of Northminster church is much interested in this movement.

The China campaign has just closed, or rather just begun, with the visit of the secretaries and missionaries. Their visit has aroused a deep interest, which promises great returns.

The music of the evening services at Brown Memorial church is enriched by a large male chorus sitting in the pews.

Sparrows Point church has just organized a Christian Endeavor society with twenty-one charter members.

Dr. Campbell of Faith church is one of the delegates to the Pan-Presbyterian Council which meets in Aberdeen, Scotland, this summer.

At a recent meeting of the ministers' association Dr. Fleming of Hillsdale church (Southern) gave a resume of the meeting of the Reformed Church Alliance which was held in Canada. Dr. Fleming is president of the American section of the alliance. G. A. B.

Arkansas

Walnut Grove church, Rev. E. M. Freyschlag pastor, has purchased a thirty-acre farm, which will be used to demonstrate the value of intensive and up-to-date farming.

A determined effort is being made to increase the salaries of strong men who have been underpaid, presbytery asking church and board to share in the increase. Nearly every man heretofore following the plow, in order to supplement his too small support from the church, has abandoned all secular labor and is now giving every hour to his great task in this genuinely home mission field. Six men are needed to man as many fields. Dr. C. E. Hayes of Little Rock is looking for them.

The home mission commission of Arkansas Presbytery met in Central church, Fayetteville, recently, having as advisers Dr. Fullerton, field secretary for the South and Southwest, and Dr. C. E. Hayes, superintendent of home missions for the synod. The churches were fairly well represented by ministers and elders. Surprising demands for larger work were made.

FARM MORTGAGES
Yielding 6% and 6½% net

A FARM MORTGAGE is a thoroughly safe investment. The security cannot be destroyed and is not affected by panics, strikes or depressions.

The first mortgages we sell represent loans made with our own funds upon improved farms worth at least two and one-half times the amount loaned. This insures absolute safety to our customers.

The investor in one of our mortgages has possession of all the papers comprising the loan, including the actual mortgage itself, together with the note and Abstract of Title. We guarantee the Title and will collect and remit interest in New York Exchange without charge.

We invite correspondence and will submit lists of mortgages and pamphlet explaining in detail our service to investors.

Let your money make 6 per cent—NET
The three or four per cent the savings bank pays does not fairly represent your money's earning ability. It is simply the small end of the profits. The bank keeps the big share as their fee for re-investment—re-investing your money in mortgages—something you refuse to do for yourself. By investing direct you can at least double the profits of your savings as they now accrue to you. Oklahoma first mortgages—amply secured by two to four times the amount of the loan—make this possible—the same kind banks and insurance companies buy.
Why Insurance Companies Buy Oklahoma Mortgages
Experience showed them that in order to meet competition they must secure as high a rate per dollar as sound business judgment allowed. Investigation proved that Oklahoma offered the best field for investments of this kind. Approximately $415,000,000.00 is now invested by the insurance companies in farm mortgages—and a good share of this in Oklahoma mortgages.
Surely you can't do better than follow the example of these trained buyers of conservative investments. So decide now to give your money a chance to make good for you.

Financial Situation

Easy to Buy Part of a Building—Partial Payment on Mortgages Possible—Farms Fail to Grow as Fast as Railways.

"I bought part of that building last week," remarked an insurance solicitor as he passed a Chicago office building one day recently. In reply to expressions of astonishment that the insurance business should yield such an income as to enable investments in downtown real estate, he explained that his investment was very moderate.

"As fast as I get $100 together I buy a bond from one of the investment houses. This is issued against a mortgage on the building, so I feel I am perfectly secure. The issuing house guarantees the principal and interest."

This particular issue of mortgage bonds pays 6 per cent and the buyer considered himself fortunate to be able to put small amounts at work any time he had accumulated $100. It is true, however, that it is possible to become at least part owner of a bond or mortgage on a comparatively small payment. Some years ago a man had to have $1,000 before he could buy a bond, and most brokers didn't care to deal in one bond. With issues of smaller denominations and by means of certificates based on real estate mortgages a man now may start a substantial fortune with less than $100.

Arrangements can be made with a bank or investment house for the security desired and it is sold to him. If he cannot pay for it all he deposits it with the bank for a loan to finish the payment. The interest on this loan and the income from the bond or mortgage balance, and payments on the loan are permitted frequently. When the first security is paid for it may be used as the basis for borrowing money to purchase another which may in turn be paid for at intervals.

Roads Grow Faster than Farms

The bureau of railway economics, maintained by the various roads to disseminate information about the railway business, has recently compiled some interesting figures comparing the increase in mileage and tonnage of the roads with the increase in farms and their products. For every 100 miles of railway track in 1900 there were 129 in 1910. For every 100 acres of improved land devoted to crops in 1900 there were 110 in 1910. In other words, the railway plant increased at triple the rate of the agricultural plant. For every 100 ton miles of the railways in 1900 there were 180 in 1910 and for every 100 passenger miles 202. For every 100 bushels, bales or pounds of the ten principal crops in 1900 there were only 109 ten years later. The output of the railways thus increased ten times as fast as that of the farms. The increase of work and increase of receipts of the railways has been about the same. But while the production of most crops fell below the increase in population, the increase in farm value of these products was from 34 to 83 per cent.

The official appraisal of the estate of the late E. H. Harriman shows that included in his holdings of $70,000,000 were stocks to the par value of nearly $2,000,000 which are worthless. His holdings were widely distributed among railways and steamship lines which he largely controlled as well as among insurance companies, express companies and other industrial enterprises.

Brief Bits of Business News

—The American Bankers' Association is promoting the idea of school savings banks to encourage children to save.

—A group of U. P. ministers of Pennsylvania who invested in an oil well have found that an investment of $7,000 will not serve to produce oil from a well which previously was worth fifteen barrels a day.

—The trial of Julian Hawthorne and his associates in New York cost the government $70,000. But the public will be protected from more beguiling literature extolling visionary gold mines.

—The higher yield of farm mortgages over the ordinary bond has for many years kept some people from investing in them. Investigation has shown these doubters, however, that the security of a farm mortgage when well placed is equal to the security of any form of investment.

Four fields heretofore having divided time asked for full time, promising to raise in some instances more than twice as much money as before.

Minnesota

Fire recently inflicted $3,000 damage upon First church, Stillwater.

Willmar church, Rev. Lou Wallace Gade pastor, is undergoing repairs to the amount of about $800. The single budget system of church finance has been adopted. Large congregations attend both the morning and evening services.

Following a visit of Pastor-Evangelist T. M. Findley the churches at Wahkon and Onamia have been regularly organized. Rev. Henry E. Glenn is pastor. Special services at Wahkon were continued at Onamia, closing March 9. Additions were made to both churches.

Following a sharp fight over the saloon question in Forada an effort was made to burn the Presbyterian church. Rev. Nathaniel Leavitt and his wife discovered the smoke before all of the kerosene saturated waste material in the church basement had been ignited.

Rev. O. T. Langfitt of Amboy has taken another mission field under his care. Rev. J. M. Bain, Sunday school missionary, organized a Sunday school at Pleasantview last August, which so flourished that they sent a delegation asking the pastor at Amboy church if he could give them a service every other Sabbath, which he readily consented to do. Two weeks ago they asked the Sunday school missionary to come and hold a series of gospel meetings, which resulted in a number of conversions and a general quickening of the spiritual life of the community.

Wisconsin

Rev. Benjamin Thomas has been holding special meetings in Galesville and Ettrick. A number of members have been received into the church of Galesville.

The church in Horicon, Rev. W. B. MacNeil pastor, is encouraged by a vigorous Sunday school. The trustees are considering a new and larger house of worship.

The churches of Buffalo and Greenwood in Marquette county, Rev. Robert O'Neil pastor, have secured a manse, with one acre of land for a garden. They are having larger congregations.

Milwaukee Presbytery at its spring meeting in the new Berean church, Milwaukee, will hear Mrs. Walter Clark, a missionary from India, and Miss Elizabeth Cameron, field secretary of the Woman's Board, who is spending a month in visiting Wisconsin churches.

The Christian Endeavor rally at Assembly church, Beaver Dam, March 4 was a notable event. Beside the societies of Beaver Dam there were sleigh loads of Endeavorers from Fox Lake and Burnett Junction. Rev. Edgar T. Farrill, field secretary of the Wisconsin Christian Endeavor Union, made a stirring address.

Montana

During January the churches of Hamilton were united in evangelistic services under the leadership of Evangelist C. C. Smith of Chicago. Since the close of the meetings over fifty members have been received into the Presbyterian church. A men's club of thirty-eight members has been organized and holds weekly meetings for Bible study. Rev. J. C. Irwin has been there four years, during which time the church has more than doubled in membership and the Sunday school has increased fivefold.

Idaho

Aberdeen church has begun the erection of a manse.

A week's special meetings were recently held in Grace church by Rev. J. K. MacGillivray, pastor-evangelist.

Plans are being considered for the building of a manse for Parma church, Rev. Bruce J. Giffen pastor. The membership of the church has doubled in two years and a new edifice will be needed soon. The contributions of this church to benevolences last year amounted to over $5 a member.

Jerome and Wendell churches will be grouped under the pastoral care of Rev. C. M. Junkin for the coming year.

The ladies' aid society of Soda Springs church recently seated the church with pews. Rev. C. P. Irwin is pastor.

A week's special meetings were recently held in Collister chapel, a mission of Boise First church. Rev. E. N. Murphy is in charge.

Gooding church will be vacant April 1. This town has recently become the county seat of a new county. The Methodists have decided to locate a college there. It is now the seat of the State School for the Deaf, Dumb and Blind.

Detroit Responds for China

The special campaign for China, in connection with the foreign missionary work in Detroit Presbytery, was concluded with a banquet, in which about 500 participated. Dr. Joseph A. Vance has been the chairman of the work. The following ministers made addresses: F. W. Bible of Hangchow, W. T. Locke of Hunan, C. H. Yerkes, H. W. Luce, Dr. W. M. Hayes of Shantung, J. E. Williams of Nanking and J. C. Garrit of Nanking. They addressed meetings at all of the Detroit Presbyterian churches, a number of women's missionary meetings, several gatherings of the young people, besides a number of parlor conferences at various homes that were open to them. It has meant a great awakening of interest in the present crisis and opportunity in China. Early reports showed that $22,000 had been pledged and several young people volunteered for service.

Colorado

It is expected that a new church will be organized at Oxford this spring.

Orchard church under Rev. H. S. McCutcheon is erecting a house of worship to cost $1,800.

A mission station has been opened at Stone City, a new town, by Dr. M. H. MacLeod, pastor-evangelist.

First church, Salida, Dr. Harry Omar Scott pastor, has organized a Children's Church Attendance League, which is getting good results. A stereopticon and reflectoscope is being installed to illustrate occasional sermons with original pictures.

Illinois

A manse to cost $3,000 will be built at Homer.

Joy church, which was organized in 1906, has doubled its membership in the last two years and has recently canceled all indebtedness on the church property. Rev. George D. Adamson is pastor.

One-third of the membership of Washington church belongs to the adult Bible class for women, one of the largest such classes in the state. This church during the year has raised nearly $3,000 for all purposes from a membership of 120. Rev. W. D. Trower is pastor.

California

Rev. Robert Freeman, pastor of Pasadena church, has been ordered to take a vacation of several months on account of ill health.

The weekly rest day league is urging pastors and church workers to bring pressure to bear upon legislators to pass the bill compelling the closing of saloons on Sundays and holidays.

Nebraska

New pews have been installed in Page church, Rev. H. Jacobs pastor.

"The-white-man-who-would-go-on," David Livingstone, was remembered in the annual meeting of the Woman's Box Butte Presbyterial Missionary Society at Scottsbluff March 26-27.

Washington

A new building for Emmanuel church, Spokane, Rev. D. W. Ferry pastor, will soon be under way.

A church was founded at Chelan Falls on Easter. Work has been carried on there in connection with several outstations during the past year by Rev. J. B. Ferguson. The pastor-evangelist, Rev. D. B. McLaughlin, and others assisted in the services.

Rev. Fred Hart, pastor at Okanogan, has gone to Los Angeles for his bride. They expect to be back April 4.

Rev. D. B. McLaughlin, pastor-evangelist, closed a series of evangelistic meetings March 9 at Omak. This church, Rev. David Brown pastor, will assume self-support this spring.

Kansas

The new church at Ellsworth is nearing completion. It will be dedicated in June and the pastor, Rev. C. E. Kircher, hopes it will then be free of debt.

The Woman's Home and Foreign Presbyterial Society of Wichita Presbytery will meet at Harper, April 7-9. The chairman of the entertainment committee is Mrs. A. G. Alexander.

DOUGAN—Thomas Dougan, Ph. D.. D. D., was born Jan. 21, 1843, at Lurganearly, Ireland, and received his advanced education at Royal University, Dublin, McGill College, Londonberry, and Free Church College, Edinburgh. He was licensed to preach in Ireland in 1873 and came to the United States in 1874 and was ordained at Cadott, Wis., in 1874. He was called to the pastorate at Oxford, Wis., in the fall of that year. Afterwards he served in turn the churches of North Bend, Wis., Hillsboro, N. D., Brodhead, Wis., Ashland, Wis., Langdon, N. D., Roseland church, Chicago. and Brodhead, Wis., the second time. The latter pastorate he resigned in 1910 and since then had made his home in Langdon, N. D., where he had been pastor for nine years. He lived in retirement for two and a half years, when the churches at Inkster, Fordville and Belleville, N. D., became vacant and asked him to become their supply, which he did, making long drives through the exceeding cold of this winter. During the last trip he contracted a cold which attacked his head and settled in his ear, but was not considered serious, he being about the house till Thursday night, Feb. 20. During the night a change for the worse occurred. A consultation of physicians was held on Friday, but nothing could be done to relieve his condition, and he soon became unconscious and remained so to the end, which came peacefully at 8:30 o'clock Saturday morning, Feb. 22, the cause of death being septic infection of the brain.

The funeral services were conducted by Rev. F. J. Hibbard, pastor of Langdon church, assisted by Rev. B. A. Fahl of Calvin, N. D., stated clerk of synod; Rev. Donald Finlayson of Park River, N. D., who delivered the principal address; Rev. K. J. McInnes of Forest River, N. D., Rev. D. G. McKay of Park River, N. D., and James Austin, of Hannah, N. D. The large audience room of the church was packed to the doors, which betokens the high esteem in which the departed brother was held by the entire communities with which he was so many years identified. In fact it would be impossible to write a history of Cavalier county without taking large note of the life and work of Dr. Dougan.

During his ministry in North Dakota and while pastor at Langdon, he held at different times the chairmanship of every important committee within the gift of presbytery and synod, and was elected moderator of North Dakota Synod at Casselton in 1898. And now after seventy years of life and forty years of ministerial service he has fallen asleep and been gathered to his fathers, full of years but not old, and he will continue to live in the memory of a very wide circle of friends, and will be sadly missed in Langdon

A TRUE TYPE OF IRISH GENTLEMAN

The Presbyterian Church has lost an able minister of the gospel, a beloved pastor, and an able presbyter. While associating with him in home mission work for Pembina Presbytery for many years and closely associated with him in many ways I discovered something of his true worth and ability. His strong, sturdy, Christian manhood stood the test at all times. No man in presbytery stood higher in council or debate. While of a retiring disposition he never declined to assume any responsibility his brethren placed upon him however difficult the task or severe the test. Whatever he undertook was sure of his very best ability and careful and considerate attention. His was no easy task and yet he was never heard to complain. For many years amid the storms and blizzards of North Dakota he was constant and untiring in his devotion to his high calling for his Master and Lord. While others admire his work and loyalty to the church of his choice and praise him as a worthy minister of the gospel allow me to say a word about the man behind the message.

My friend was first, last and always a true type of a cultured Christian Irish gentleman. In the first place he was very considerate of others and careful not to intrude his views or wishes upon any person. To those who were intimate he was very congenial and his humor and wit sparkled and shone to the admiration and joy of all present While he was in spirit and adoption a true American still he never lost altogether the brogue of his native land Another mark and characteristic of his race showed itself in his natural liberality. Any person in need found in him a friend willing and able to help in every possible way with heart, hand and purse. With all the above mentioned traits he was truly gentle and loving. To know him was to love him. Still no one would have a proper estimate of the man without saying that he stood like a rock against any form of duplicity or wrong doing. When truth was assailed or any attempt to dishonor the church or the cause of righteousness was made another side of his nature was seen, and after all perhaps the strongest side. Then his righteous indignation arose and his positive, virile manhood asserted itself in defense of right and truth as he saw it.

Many will miss the manly form and fine physique from our streets, halls and homes. No more will our courts and assemblies be honored by his presence. Not again shall we hear his pleasant voice in conversation. I have lost a true friend and fellow worker. My life will be the poorer and heaven richer. Dear friend, farewell.

T. DAVIS ACHESON.

What Lafayette Needs

An additional Endowment of $500,000.00

to insure adequate salaries to its professors and provide for their retiring pensions when they have grown old in its service, as well as to provide properly for the increasing number of worthy students seeking its advantages.

Will you let Lafayette go?

Do you want this great educational enterprise to pass from the guidance of the church because you have starved it out? What will you do to help? Will you let the committee send one of its field secretaries to talk to you or your church?

The Reward of the Teacher

(From a sometime member of the class of 1896, Lake Forest College, now a clergyman in Minnesota.)

"Thank you for the beautiful token of Lake Forest's interest in her sons. Really I look back on my stay in Lake Forest with an affection I do not feel for any other institution of my experience, and you know I have been at three others, one college, a university and a divinity school. It was at Lake Forest I learned to study and where I got the inspiration for any work I may do. The classes in Latin and Greek at Lake Forest really fixed any habits of application I now have."

Lake Forest ever seeks to maintain a high standard of teaching, in the hope that her students may continue to pay such tribute.

Around the Shop

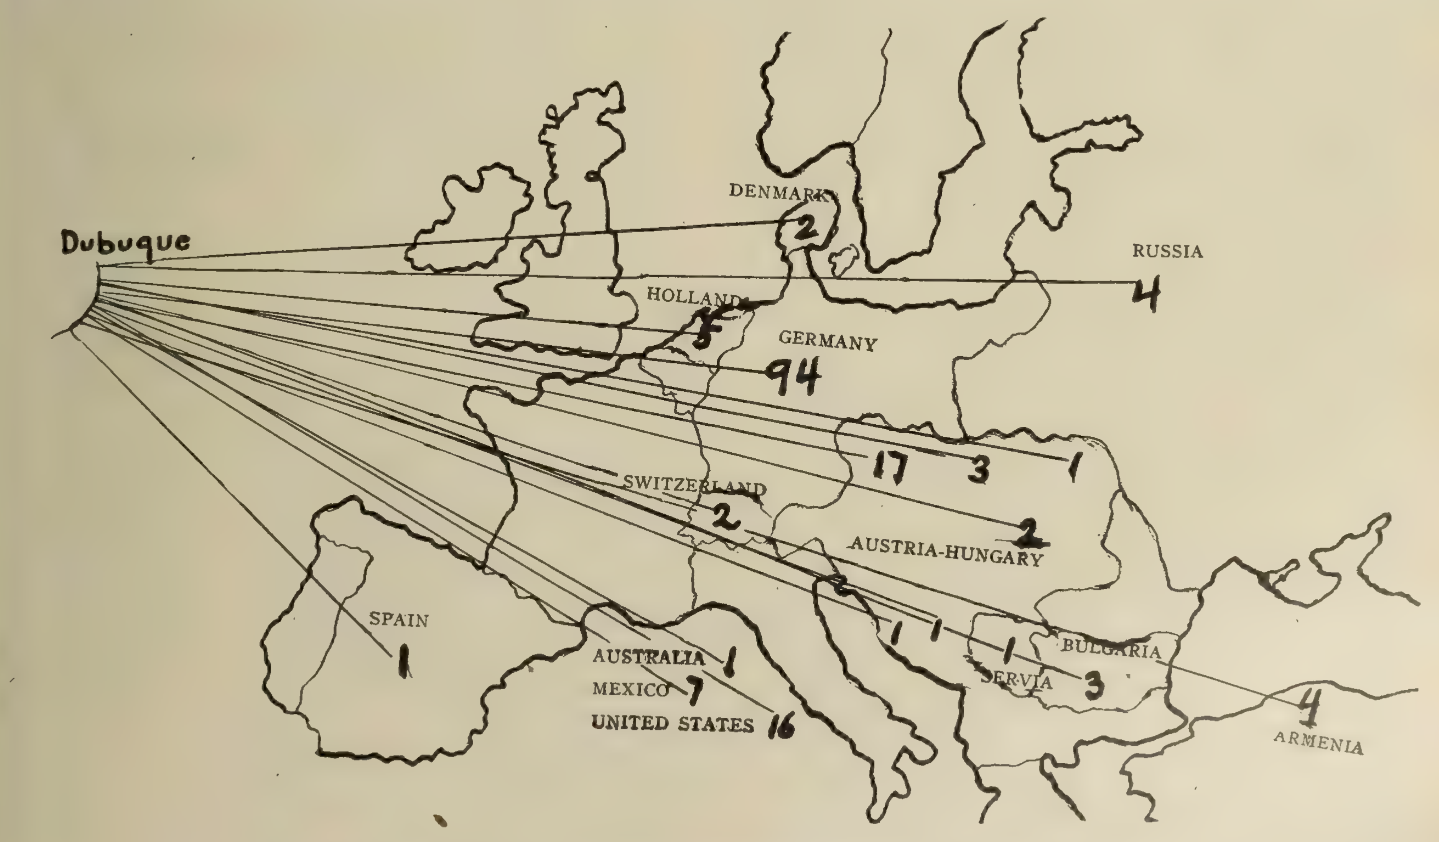
A fleeting shaft of light—a farewell flash from the setting sun—glittered for an instant upon the water as the train swept noisily around a hill overlooking the river.

Presently from the chimney of a little farmhouse silhouetted on the crest of a ridge across the valley there rose briskly the smoke of a wood fire; lights began to glimmer through the windows of other dwellings now scarcely visible. Long after the nearest objects had been hidden by the fallen darkness the traveler gazed through the car window—seeing nothing, and yet seeing more than broad sunlight could have revealed to him.

For when the smoke curled up from the chimney of the distant farmhouse the traveler heard the crackling of a fire that burned years ago, and when the lights appeared he saw a family group that long since has dissolved into dreams. It was Jimmy who filled the woodbox and provided the kindling, but it was only mother who could conjure a few black coals into a snapping fire and have the teakettle singing before pa had got his boots off and put to drying back of the stove. It was sister who brought out the kerosene lamp and who adjusted the dishes on the turkey-red tablecloth. But when grace had been said it was everybody who "pitched in" and did his best to relieve the mother of any embarrassment regarding the acceptability of her cooking.

Then came reading time—first for the "men folks," later for the "women folks," too, with the papers passed around—the county paper, the farm weekly and the religious periodical that we all remember best because it had in it something for everybody. How we——

"Last call for dinner in the dining car!" Ah, the spell is broken. The Around-the-Shop Man wonders what your children will remember to have read in your family circle.



Where Do Dubuque Students Come From?

Among the 174 students at Dubuque German College and Seminary are representatives of many nations. Ten of the countries of Europe contribute young men students to this Presbyterian institution in the Mississippi valley. From Austria-Hungary hail representatives of six different races. Not all of the men credited to Germany came direct from that country; some of them are sons of German farmers of the Middle West. Most of the students found the institution after they had worked in this country a year or more; others came to America to study here to be preachers. All of them expect to do Christian work among their fellow countrymen in America. They will be able to preach in English and German in addition to their native tongue. You will be interested in full details of this tremendously significant home missionary educational enterprise. Address Dubuque College and Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa, Dr. C. M. Steffens, President.

Did you ever see a blind telephone operator?

There was dedicated in New York City not long ago a building called Lighthouse No. 1—located about as far from open water as it is possible to get on Manhattan. It is headquarters for a work which has given life and hope to hundreds of people who must grope their way through streets without the use of their eyes. It is a fully equipped settlement house for the blind, where they are trained for occupations which will enable them to earn their own living. A work started by Miss Winifred Holt is thus given a permanent home. Miss Holt is a daughter of Henry Holt, the publisher. Ada Patterson tells of the beginning of her interest in the blind next week in THE CONTINENT.

In this institution grown men and women who have lost their sight are taught to be stenographers, masseurs, telephone and telegraph operators and basketmakers. Most of those who have come under the guidance of Miss Holt became blind in comparative middle life. Without this help to train their unaccustomed hands they would be forced to spend their lives in quiet inactivity. This is a story of practical kindness which will hold the interest of all readers. Send a friend your copy of next week's issue. Perhaps your public library would be glad for THE CONTINENT each week.

Religion Without Labels

"The gentlemen composing this syndicate are all active Christian men, prominent in religious work in their respective churches."

With some such sentence as this a flamboyant real estate advertisement, printed in certain religious journals lately, came to a climax. The prospectus of the syndicate embodied glowing promises of profit to be expected from its operations in a distant part of the country, and this final statement was manifestly intended to be the compelling argument which should move the hesitating investor to put in his money.

Perhaps the argument prevailed with some guileless souls, but if the author of the advertisement could have counted the total number who turned from that unctuous climax with disgust, he would have had profound doubt of its being good publicity.

He didn't realize evidently what discretion on this subject has been acquired by many at no small cost of money and of trust in their fellow men. By this time it seems a rule pretty well established, with all except the hopelessly gullible, that a business proposition, though otherwise attractive, should be turned down instanter the moment the promoter of it hints that he can be trusted because he is such a good church member.

Indeed, in this very case, the rule appears to have worked effectively—which signifies that the advertisement didn't work. At least, it seems to have lived through only one insertion in any medium that accepted it.

The wisdom of the public on the matter may, therefore, be taken to be so well established that it is needless to spend time warning people against investments that carry this "church member" appeal. There is thus no call for making this editorial a treatise on wise or unwise investments.

But the significant thing behind it all which does invite remark is the reason—the underlying reason—for this now nearly universal prejudice against religious professions in business matters.

Why is it that any attempt to trade on the strength of a man's advertised Christianity always arouses so much distrust?

Of course, it is easy to say that this is only another case of the burnt child dreading the fire. It is a very old trick of the rankest hypocrites—this stratagem of posing as good Christians, too holy to cheat, and then clearing out with all the money they get their hands on, just as they intended to do in the first place. The game has been played that way so often that one can't help being suspicious just as soon as he hears new changes rung on the old tune.

But that is not sufficient explanation. For one can notice that the prejudice holds just the same against sanctimonious methods of getting business even where the promoters are personally known and their Christian professions are believed to be sincere.

Sincerity and good intentions do not save even good men from contempt if they go out and try to get business on the strength of their repute in the church. They are discounted just as quickly and emphatically, if not quite so completely, and the best they can hope for after that is a second or third grade rating in business.

It seems a hard judgment often for an apparently innocent mistake. But the well balanced man of affairs can't put aside the instinctive feeling that promoters who are thoroughly sound stuff all the way through would be incapable of trading on their religion.

This feeling is not simply a sentiment against using religion for money-making. A great many men get their living by work which would be impossible to them if they were not religious, and as long as they seem genuine in their convictions, nobody counts it against them.

But down far deeper than that lies a resentment which nobody can eradicate from a right-thinking mind against religion that advertises itself—that demands trust from people or advantage to itself on the score of its piety.

If religion has any trustworthy qualities that entitle it to confidence from others, the world says it had better present them to public notice by being trustworthy, and not by boasting about it.

And the world is so well grounded in feeling that this is the order natural to true religion—works first and confidence afterwards—that any reversal of the order, with the bid for confidence coming ahead, inevitably suggests a flaw somewhere.

The pure food and label laws enacted to regulate the grocers' trade conspicuously fail to apply to religion. Buying the commodities of the grocery market, customers look at the label first and then taste the goods to see whether flavor and quality correspond with the label.

But whoever expects the world to take Christianity that way, quite misunderstands.

On the contrary, the world does not want its Christianity labeled. It wishes to taste first and see if the ingredients are genuine. Before that a label is questioned; afterwards it is needless.

In consequence, the men who insist on wearing religious labels often find themselves discredited, just because they are so concerned to make the labels show. People think on that very account that they can't be first-class goods.

But on the other hand, servants of Jesus Christ who know no way of advertising themselves, and without consciousness of self are simply intent on living in the world as the Master lived, soon find that the road of self-forgetfulness and service is a road to such influence and trust and confidence as they could never have found by seeking and asking confidence.

It is a common saying that religion must be carried into a man's business, and the saying is yet more true than common. But how shall religion be carried in?

Shall a man tell the public: "This is a Christian store; therefore you may trade here without danger of being swindled"? Shall he hang Scripture texts on his store walls and decorate his signs with the name of Christ?

Certainly not. Duty runs the other way round. He shall deal honestly with everybody and keep the spirit of the Scripture texts and be as brotherly to his employees as Jesus would be—and not say anything about it.

That way not even the sneeringest skeptic will doubt his religion.

And nobody will require information from a tag to tell that it is religion.

Christianity is a great advantage to the Christian, but that does not mean that God ever intended a Christian to use Christianity so as to get advantage by it.

Unprecedented Floods in Ohio and Indiana

Floods covering the states of Indiana and Ohio last week caused disaster almost unparalleled in American history. From 500 to 1,000 lives have been lost, a hundred thousand persons rendered homeless and the direct and indirect property loss runs into hundreds of millions. A deadly tornado which a few days before tore a path through the city of Omaha and across a wide stretch of country was lost sight of in the greater devastation caused by sudden and heavy rains, rising waters and bursting dams, reservoirs and levees, which deluged farms, villages and densely populated cities.

Dayton, Columbus, Chillicothe, Miamisburg, Zanesville, Marietta, Hamilton, Delaware, Troy, Middletown, Tiffin, Piqua—these are only a few of the Ohio cities and towns visited by the fatal floods. In Indiana Terre Haute, Fort Wayne, Logansport, Peru and Indianapolis were among the chief sufferers. Many persons died from the effect of exposure, or were made ill or insane. Disease followed quickly in the wake of the receding waters, caused by the presence of dead animals and by damaged sewerage systems and polluted water supplies. Passenger, mail and freight trains, telephone and telegraph wires and public utilities generally were put out of commission, and for the first time in their lives thousands of people were left without heat, light, food or shelter.

At Dayton, with 117,000 population, the water rose to the second stories of downtown buildings, 50,000 persons were marooned for longer or shorter periods and the money loss was estimated at $25,000,000. The National Cash Register plant was converted into a hospital. Fire added to the flood horrors. The greatest loss of life occurred at Dayton, Columbus and Hamilton, the estimated number of drowned being 100, 64 and 80 respectively. Dayton lies in an "S" curve of the Great Miami river, and the river is here joined by three other streams, all of which suddenly reached flood stage.

At Zanesville half the city was reported under ten feet of water, and the same was true of other points. At Peru, Indiana, 1,300 distracted refugees were huddled on one small island, and 3,000 were reported marooned in the courthouse. This town is the winter headquarters of the Wallace-Hagenbeck circus and the animals of the menagerie were among the victims of the torrential waters.

With the falling of the northern tributaries of the Ohio—the Wabash, the Miami, the Scioto and lesser streams—came a dangerous rising in the levels of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. At Cincinnati on Monday the stage was 69 feet; at Cairo, Illinois, it was 52 feet and rising rapidly. Just how high the crest of the flood will reach and just when it will pass a given point are matters of anxious speculation all the way down the unruly rivers to New Orleans.

Aid for Flood Victims Is General and Generous

The cheering feature of the tale of death and disaster was the quick and generous response of the rest of the country. The federal government and the National Red Cross led in the work of relief, but there were hundreds of lesser official and private organizations which hurried to help. The state of Michigan, for example, sent a train load of tents and supplies across the Ohio border in response to Governor Cox's request, and the commander of the naval cadets at North Chicago did not wait for orders before rushing his boys and his boats to the northern Indiana district. Money and supplies began to pour in from all sides. Chicago subscribed $260,000 inside of four days. Saturday Governor Cox said he had received over $1,000,000 in money, and every hour brought additional aid. Help came from Canada, Alaska and even Hawaii. A prisoner in the Ohio state penitentiary sent a dollar bill—all that he had in the world. Incidents of individual heroism and sacrifice were numerous.

President Wilson dispatched the secretary of war, Mr. Garrison, to the flood districts and expressed his own readiness to follow on an hour's notice, but his presence was not deemed necessary. The war department again proved itself to be a welfare as well as a warfare agency. The treasury department called on the life saving service of the great lakes and the Atlantic seaboard, and the marine hospital service surgeons went to help with preventive measures against epidemic. The interior department scientists are studying means to prevent a recurrence of the calamity—a thought which is uppermost in the minds of the country at large.

The national drainage congress, which meets in St. Louis April 10-12, invited President Wilson to attend. In response, after explaining that he could not be present, he called attention to "the imperative and immediate necessity" of a comprehensive and systematic plan for drainage and flood control. Chairman Edmund T. Perkins promised that the congress would discuss and present a plan to alleviate and prevent future flood destructions—whether by reforestation or by dredging and new levees he did not announce. It is a notable fact that the United States has expended $200,000,000 on improving the Mississippi and its tributaries and yet the flood problem is unsolved.

Death Takes J. Pierpont Morgan

J. Pierpont Morgan of New York, for years recognized as one of the greatest, if not the greatest, financiers in the world, died at Rome on Monday after several days' illness. Mr. Morgan had recently gone to Cairo and from thence to Naples and to Rome in a vain search for health.

The date of Mr. Morgan's birth was April 17, 1837. On his mother's side he was the grandson of Rev. John Pierpont. He was the son of Junius Spencer Morgan, a wealthy banker, who was the head of the famous firm which afterwards became J. P. Morgan and Company, the world's largest private banking institution. The son steadily advanced in financial power and influence over the commanding position attained by his father.

Mr. Morgan's education was gained at Boston and at Goettigen, Germany, and he was noted as an able student, especially in the field of mathematics. His banking career began in 1857. In 1871 he became a member of Drexel, Morgan and Company, and he developed branches and affiliations in every important center. His financial achievements are too numerous to catalogue, but one of the most noteworthy was the flotation of the securities of the United States Steel Corporation. He was generally credited with stopping the threatening Wall street panic of 1907, thereby doing the business interests of the country a tremendous service. At the time of his death he was said to control 50,000 miles of railways and transportation lines.

Aside from his commercial activities he was noted as an art collector and he left a private library and art gallery said to be worth $2,000,000. He made a gift of a million and a half of dollars to the Lying-In hospital of New York and large donations to the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, the Metropolitan museum and other institutions. Mr. Morgan was warden of St. George's Episcopal church, New York.

Last Senators to Be Elected by Legislature

Illinois has just chosen the last United States senators to be elected by state legislatures, provided the pending amendment to the federal constitution for the direct election of senators by the people is ratified by three more states before another vacancy occurs in the upper house at Washington. Thirty-three states have already declared in favor of ending the old method under which senatorial deadlocks, bribery and scandals were too common. While no change in elective methods will in itself produce a millennium, yet the new plan will avoid the possibility of questionable combinations such as the one which landed William Lorimer in the United States senate.

James Hamilton Lewis, a Democrat, is the new Illinois senator for the full term, and Lawrence Y. Sherman, Republican, is senator for the two years of the unexpired Lorimer term. Both men had been indorsed by the people of the state at the primaries last year, and their selection, though long delayed, is generally approved.

Adrianople Falls but War Continues

Adrianople fell last week, but the Turko-Balkan war did not end. Adrianople was the great prize which the Turks vowed they would never surrender and the promise of its abandonment brought on the bloody overthrow of the last Ottoman ministry. The city was the first capital of the Turk in Europe in 1361, and not until ninety years later did Constantinople take its place politically. The siege, which lasted several months, was one of the most remarkable military actions of modern times. The fortress was well provisioned and equipped to withstand the continuous heavy bombardment of the Bulgarians, ably assisted by the Servians. The capture seems to have been effected after the outer defenses had gradually been invested by a series of sudden dashes by the infantry, ending with spirited bayonet charges and heavy loss of life on both sides.

The reported number of troops taken was 52,000, including 1,220 officers. War correspondents estimate that $35,000,000 of war material fell into the hands of the captors. At the last moment the Turks burned and destroyed some of their buildings and stores. General Lavoff, the Bulgarian commander, was the hero of the hour.

Following the fall of Adrianople the Bulgars tried to move on toward Constantinople through the Tchatalja line of defenses, thirty-five miles from the Ottoman empire's heart. The European powers again vainly tried by diplomatic pressure to stop the advance. Russia, indeed, is said to have no real desire to check her smaller "Slav brothers." Little Montenegro, with Servian help, kept pounding away at Scutari on the far northwest in spite of Austrian and Italian warnings.

Cash for China Outside the Six-Power Group

An American syndicate is reported to be ready to finance the republic of China in spite of the withdrawal by the United States government of official participation or support of the much-discussed six-power loan. The syndicate, whose members were not disclosed, informed President Wilson of its readiness to arrange a short term loan of $10,000,000 at once, and to furnish funds up to $100,000,000 later if needed by the government at Peking. From the fact that the information concerning the proposed financing came from administration sources it is believed that the syndicate would not insist on conditions embarrassing to Chinese sovereignty, as was the case with the sextuple loan.

The same day this announcement was made in Washington—Saturday—The London Times printed a statement that the Standard Oil Company had offered to lend China $35,000,000 in return for exclusive control of the Chinese oil field for a term of years.

Cabinet Crisis Comes and Goes in France

When France's energetic premier, Raymond Poincare, "retired" from the head of the cabinet to the presidency he called upon Aristide Briand, noted as the strong man who suppressed a national railway strike, to head a new ministry. One of President Poincare's prominent rivals, who has helped to wreck several ministries, is the redoubtable Georges Clemenceau, whom the president challenged to a duel at the time of the election in January. M. Clemenceau opposed the new administration, focusing his opposition on the government's bill for electoral reform through "proportional" representation. The measure passed the chamber of deputies last July, but encountered a surprising defeat in the senate. When the government bill was defeated in the upper house Premier Briand asked for a vote of confidence, and again the government lost. This is a rare thing in the French senate, although common enough in the lower chamber. Thereupon the cabinet resigned in a body. The senate has of late developed an attitude of opposition to the government, and it is openly hinted that Clemenceau and his allies intend to embarrass the president to the point of forcing him to resign. But President Poincare is a man of determination and diplomacy, and observers do not expect to see him unhorsed.

Jean Barthou, who is possessed of long ministerial experience, accepted the request of the president to form a cabinet. The proportional representation bill, which wrecked the Briand cabinet, will be dropped for the present in favor of army reorganization and enlargement, a question now very much to the fore in the French republic. The chamber of deputies gave the new ministry a vote of confidence, and it seems probable that Premier Barthou will hold his own at least until the three-year army service bill is out of the way.

Naval Training for College Students

A plan to give college students naval training during the summer vacation was evolved by Mr. Meyer, the recent secretary of the navy, and may be put into effect this year. A limited number of students from certain colleges and universities, who have completed at least two years of work, are to be allowed to take training cruises on the battleships of the North Atlantic squadron. Not more than twenty are to be received on any one ship, and due regard will be paid to the physical fitness of the amateur man-o'-war's men. The experiment is regarded as a practicable step toward the formation of an emergency naval reserve of high character in addition to the naval militia companies at many ports. It may serve to make known and popularize the navy in a needed and important quarter, and the result may be of value to the nation in a time of need.

Biggest Missionary Campaign Yet Planned

The utter end of that era in which home missions and foreign missions were supposed to be rival interests of the church of Christ was dramatically demonstrated in a quiet but immensely significant conference held in New York on the centennial of Livingstone's birth, when committees of ten, representing respectively the Foreign Missions Conference and the Home Missions Council of America, met together and formulated plans for a comprehensive interdenominational campaign, nationwide, which shall be prosecuted throughout America during the whole month of March next year. This endeavor will be devoted to the advancement of Christian missions in the broadest sense, including both home and foreign phases. It is described as "a comprehensive and sustained effort, with such developments as may prove necessary, to lead the whole church out into the discharge of its total missionary duty, in this crisis-hour of national and world history."

Although the principal impact upon the mind of the general public is to be made, as stated, within the calendar limits of the month of March, 1914, preparation therefor is to begin immediately, and to be prosecuted steadily up to that time. To this end an extensive series of interdenominational conferences for the purpose of organization will be held in all parts of the country through the remaining months of 1913 and the first two months of 1914. The practical goal of effort is an "every-member canvass" of every evangelical congregation in the United States.

The committee organized to direct this movement includes secretaries of both home and foreign boards. The chairman of the general committee is quite appropriately the missionary president of the one denomination which already combines both of these interests under a single head of organization—Bishop A. S. Lloyd, head of the Protestant Episcopal Board of Foreign and Domestic Missions. Dr. H. C. Herring, secretary of the Congregational Home Mission Society, is vice chairman. Of the executive committee organized under this general committee, S. Earl Taylor, Methodist foreign secretary, is chairman and Dr. Charles R. Watson, United Presbyterian foreign secretary, is vice chairman. Two executive secretaries have been named—William B. Millar, one of the general secretaries of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, and George Innes, the hustling United Presbyterian business man who has given up his secular affairs to devote all his time to missions as a volunteer worker.

Both the Laymen's Missionary Movement and the Missionary Education Movement will cooperate with these committees. The laymen's movement takes general charge of the preliminary conventions of the conference. The education movement will distribute literature. All in all, the combination effected is the biggest working association of denominational executive officers ever yet brought together in America, and it should, corresponding tc the force enlisted, make an unprecedented impression on the churches.

Lack of Young Ministers Felt in Canada

Rev. George E. Ross, the Canadian pastor who three years ago organized in his church at Charlottetown, Prince Albert island, the "Order of Recruits for the Ministry," has been made chairman of a committee of his General Assembly which is commissioned to arouse the church to the necessity of increasing its product of new ministers. Mr. Ross is now pastor at Goderich, Ontario, and from there he is sending out to all the presbyteries a circular letter exposing the seriousness of present poverty in that line. He estimates that the demand for ministers in Canadian Presbyterianism calls for 250 ordinations every year. Failing that, some pulpits must go unsupplied. But last year the theological schools of the denomination graduated for ordination only thirty-nine men. This year they will graduate only fifty.

This 80 per cent deficit presbyteries are requested to make a principal theme of consideration in their spring meetings. It is recommended that on each pastor should be laid an injunction to counsel the boys and young men of his own congregation anew on the claims of the ministry in view of present need. There is also the suggestion that the presbytery should send representatives to visit all high and preparatory schools within its bounds for the purpose of interviewing on the subject the most promising young men. The theological schools themselves are to send visitors on the same errand to the university centers.

Editorial

Judging by One's Experience

TWO LETTERS have recently come to hand. They are from two ministers of equal earnestness and dedication. Yet the letters differ at a very interesting point, and we are sure the writers will not take amiss such guarded quotations as will illustrate the matter now in mind.

One faithful and earnest worker, devoted in his ministry and blessed in his church, writes: "The work of the ministry is growing increasingly difficult, and the pull away from the ministry is growing stronger and stronger. A smaller and smaller proportion of our ministers, I fear, are coming from our manses."

The other minister, consecrated and earnest, also in a hard field, writes: "What a glorious day this is in which to preach the gospel. and how abundant are its rewards! No wonder our sons are all seeking the ministry."

That is a very interesting difference of expression. Moreover, both the expressions are true to experience. In the life of many a man the two points of view are forced upon him at times. He would find it difficult to analyze exactly the reasons for the change. Just now it is important to notice that there is something to say for both of them, and that the ministry is both difficult and delightful. In this it is like all other great work.

There are points of view from which the outlook is not cheering. There are other points of view from which there is too much promise to be overlooked. Former President Northrop of the University of Minnesota recently asked a friend what he thought was the outlook for the church, and when the friend hesitated, answered his own question by saying that to him the outlook seemed dark. So many are turning away from the Bible, the Sabbath, the church. Yet there are men who are constantly being impressed with the bright signs of the times, who carry with them the assurance of such a triumph of righteousness as never has been known. Professor Rauschenbusch closes one of the chapters in his latest book with a paragraph which combines the two feelings in a striking way:

"I confess that my faith falters in the very act of professing it. The possibilities are so vast, so splendid, so far-reaching, so contradictory of all historical precedents, that my hope may be doomed to failure. The American churches may write one more chapter in the long biography of the disappointed Christ, which our sons will read with shame and our enemies with scorn. But for the present the East is aflame with the day of Jehovah, and a thousand voices are calling. If failure comes, may it find our sword broken at the hilt."

That expresses the mood which brave men must have, even though they cannot go farther. It would be well if one could be so sure of God that he could not write "if failure comes." But if the enterprise looks so great that it seems incredible that triumph shall come, it is worth a great deal to determine that one's sword shall be "broken at the hilt" before one gives up.

Every man is sure to feel the pressure of his own experience in all these matters. Yet it is never fair nor safe to take one's own narrower view as final. Everything is not roseate; everything is not dark. The real question is whether we are to consider that the gray of the sky is the gray of the dawn or of the falling night. Benjamin Franklin said that, as he sat in Independence hall in Philadelphia, he often wondered whether the sun that was figured on the back of the president's chair was rising or setting. When the constitution was at last adopted, he knew it for a rising sun. Let any man whose experience makes him see only the gray in the sky challenge his own faith, to be sure that the gray is morning and not evening twilight. And if any man's experience has lifted him higher, so that he catches the rising of the sun, let him rejoice in it, and reflect its light to men who are farther down in the valley.

Something to Do Against Mormonism

The campaign that The Chicago Journal has mapped out against the political phase of Mormonism ought to have far more spirited support from Christian citizens than it has yet received. Support is deserved in part by The Journal's courage. In these days when the commercial and political affiliations of Mormondom run so wide and so deep, fighting it is no child's play, and The Journal is the only daily paper in the eastern half of the country which has shown the nerve to tackle the thing.

But principally the reason for backing up The Journal is the reality of the evil to which it is calling attention. The Continent thoroughly understands why, apart even from the selfishness of business interests, a fight on Mormonism is not popular. The modern American dislikes the idea of making any kind of war on any church, and his tolerant sentiment in that particular is altogether to his credit. But it ought not to render him "an easy mark."

What The Journal calls citizens to is not a war on a church but a war on a cabal of treacherous and criminal bosses in politics, who hide behind a church name because they think religious tolerance will protect them there. The question really up to the contemporary American is whether that kind of hypocrisy can deceive him—whether he is soft enough to let a group of modern despots run a lawbreaking and treasonable conspiracy against the federal government and get away safe with it because they call themselves religious. If Mormonism ever succeeds in carrying out what its leaders have often avowed as its aim—the subjection of the whole national government to the overlordship of the Mormon hierarchy—that slavery won't be any sweeter for the memory that its growth was tolerated because it was supposed to be a religion.

It is certainly high time to do something against the Mormon "prophets" and their slimy, sinuous advance into American politics. And The Journal is proposing something to do—something very practical as a demonstration of public sentiment, although it is no harder than circulating and signing petitions. A triple form has been prepared by The Journal, and anybody who will can typewrite these forms at the top of three sheets of paper and start out to get names attached.

The first of these petitions is addressed to the attorney general of the United States, the second to the postmaster general and the third to the President and members of the senate at Washington. The attorney general is asked to prosecute the Mormon Church under the Sherman act for maintaining combinations in restraint of trade—chiefly in the beet sugar industry. The postmaster general is desired to deny the privilege of the mails to the authorities of the Mormon Church because they continue defiantly to practice and teach the crime of polygamy. And finally, the United States senate is petitioned to reopen the case for the unseating of Senator Smoot, the Mormon apostle, as the case against Senator Lorimer was reopened.

The suggested forms of such petitions are printed in another column of The Continent and can be copied from there. But it will be better for persons interested to address The Daily Journal at Chicago or the International Council for Christian and Patriotic Service in New York City (100 Broad street) for a copy of The Journal's pamphlet, "Crimes and Treason of the Mormon Church Exposed." This reprint of The Journal's own editorials explains in detail the grounds on which are based the three requests to be made of the government. Armed by the facts which the pamphlet recounts, any honest citizen may be an eloquent advocate of the petitions. And if a general movement in this behalf throughout the nation should deluge Washington with these memorials, the exact action prayed for might or might not be accomplished; but enough would happen to make the Mormon hierarchs tremble and disillusion their dream of a time when they can enslave America to their ambition and make polygamy the legal domestic economy of the nation.

Recklessness in Accusation Works Deep Injustice

Even friendly religious papers of sister denominations are today found innocently repeating the accusation that in the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions "it costs $256,000 to spend $381,000." They cannot be expected to know what an atrocious slander it is. But that such a statement should come into general circulation must certainly convince the board's critics that they have blundered colossally and almost unpardonably on the form into which they put their criticism. Taking the complaint thus worded, it can mean nothing else than that the board is criminally dishonest in handling funds committed to its care. Honest men disbursing a benevolent income of $381,000 would never take out $256,000 for their own expenses before applying the money to the objects for which it was given. Yet that is what the American public now thinks that the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions has done. And for such a bitter injustice opponents within its own denomination are responsible—opponents who know and have repeatedly affirmed that the members and secretaries of the board are men against whom it is impossible to breathe a suspicion of unfaithfulness to trust.

Indignation rises higher as one contemplates the cruel vise in which the board is thus pinched. It is so needless. Any reasonable care in framing the complaint which the objectors are pressing would have avoided it all. To be sure, the men who raised this issue never used the words above quoted. But the words quoted are a direct and natural inference from the terms they did use. They said that the board was spending 61 per cent in administration. And they are quite intelligent enough to know that they got that result only by putting on the word "administration" a meaning which it had never had before in the discussion of benevolent finance in the church or elsewhere. But the public does not possess the peculiar vocabulary of these complainants, and outsiders have translated the charge according to the plain terms of the street.

Nobody dares actually to allege that an undue proportion of Presbyterian home mission funds has been used up in expenses. These critics are not, in point of fact, complaining that the money given for home mission work does not reach home mission work, but only that the kind of work which it does reach is not the kind they prefer. Of course it is all work that the General Assembly has ordered. That, however, is no bar to agitation in favor of different policies. An issue of that sort can be discussed calmly at any time when it is properly stated. But when stated so as to impute dishonesty, discussion cannot proceed very well until the men who mixed up the question straighten it out.

Are the originators of this agitation ready to apologize for their loose and fantastic employment of the word "administration"? As soon as they do that they will get a more respectful hearing.

Chester County and the Needed Option Law

The experience of the good citizens of Chester county, Pennsylvania, in regard to the saloon licenses is an argument which ought to bring forth a county option law in Pennsylvania quick. The antilicense people got over 11,000 of the 19,000 voters in the county to sign petitions asking the license court to close—as it has power to close—every liquor selling place in the county. They backed this up with a similar petition from 14,000 women. But in spite of all this demonstration of majority opinion, the judges granted thirty-five licenses. With a county option law in effect, none at all would have got through.

However, there is the comfort that twenty-one saloons have been shut up, and Coatesville, the town that lynching made unhappily famous, will be entirely dry if on one case still under consideration the court acts as it did on the four other liquor stores in the place—for the licenses of all these were refused summarily. All in all, Coatesville in particular, and the rest of the county in only less degree, are to be heartily congratulated on the outcome of their tremendous no license campaign. If the endeavor was not wholly victorious, it at least has valuably stiffened popular feeling for high civic standards in Chester county. It thus affords a basis on which the ideals of the community can be reconstructed in other ways, if the movement so well begun is pushed still with its full initial persistency.

For it is no unfriendly warning to remind Chester county and Coatesville that mere extinction of the saloon business is not all they need to rehabilitate their communal good name. The thing which discredited them most was not so much a hot-blooded lynching as a cold-blooded stolidity about the crime afterwards. This is what argued fundamental indifference to human rights. And this is not a fault chargeable to the saloons altogether, nor will the abolition of saloons remove it. But the conscience which drives out saloons can, if guided right, be readily educated into that larger social nobility which, having destroyed what tears men down, gives itself then to labor for what builds all men up. All towns need that conscience; Coatesville has peculiar opportunity for cultivating it. And any good thing which Coatesville does now is a conspicuous example.

Veteran Editor of The Christian Work Is Gone

The quiet passing on of Dr. Joseph Newton Hallock, editor of The Christian Work of New York, reduces the old guard of religious journalists in this country to two survivors only—Dr. Garrison and Dr. Palmore, both of St. Louis. Of this powerful but never large knighthood of Christian editors Dr. Hallock was a worthy companion. He edited his paper always with steadfast fidelity to its chosen mission. The wholesome combination of geniality and inflexibility characteristic of himself was evidenced also in his editorial product. His interests were broad and under his control The Christian Work has ever been widely sympathetic and irenic.

This journal, which is almost a century old, became the property of Dr. Hallock in 1880, after he had been preaching nearly twenty years in the Congregational ministry. His devotion to the paper from that time forward was the unremitting interest of his life until about two years ago, when physical infirmity confined him to his home in Brooklyn and forbade much of his previous activity. But in spite of his seventy-nine years, his restless mind kept working and his keen enlistment in the affairs of a progressing world went on mentally, even when his bodily powers were at the last extremity. Now he has departed into the other life, one of those tireless souls who compel men to discard the thought of heaven's being a mere place of idleness. Dr. Hallock could not possibly find the world beyond a state of bliss except his Lord should give him something to do.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, who with conspicuous ability has borne the brunt of editorial labor on The Christian Work since the disability of Dr. Hallock, will doubtless succeed to the editorship.

Home Mission Lesson from a Foreign Mission Field

George Shane, the United Presbyterian mission booster, promised, when he set out for a tour of his denomination's stations in Egypt, that he would report his impressions to the church at home by cable messages. Undoubtedly his friends expected to get word from him about foreign missions, seeing that he is on a foreign mission journey. But a man like Shane can't see much difference between home and foreign in missions, and is very liable to get them mixed up. So it is much more interesting than surprising that his first cablegram from foreign mission territory brought a home mission message, applying Egypt's experience as a warning for America. This was the electric flash he sent, and it ought to give all Presbyterians a tingle quite as much as Mr. Shane's own codenominationalists:

"Formalism and sectarian jealousies lost Egypt to Mohammed. Unity, evangelism, home missions must save America for Christ."

Public School Men for Moral Training

The Religious Education Association is making a mighty deep impression on public school men by its leadership for moral instruction in the public schools. At the recent convention of the association in Cleveland Secretary Cope puts up, to a group of some of the strongest normal and high school teachers in the country, the question whether this problem of moral instruction could not now be left to the secular organizations of teachers, the National Education Association. But these experts, although themselves members of the National Education Association, emphatically dissented. They said it could not be thought of; the Religious Education Association has pushed the question to the fore and must stay with it. These men, all of whom are anxious to make the high schools really character-building institutions, said their main encouragement lies with the latter body They acknowledge that they know now there is not going to be any permanent moral force exerted through their schools except it rests on a religious understanding of life.

—The Continent on issues of church policy is not so often in accord with The Herald and Presbyter that the pleasure of being so palls on us. It is a special gratification, therefore, to find that The Herald and Presbyter is against the pending overture for reducing the size of General Assembly by cutting down the representation of the larger presbyteries, which are already under-represented. The Continent votes with The Herald and Presbyter on that proposition for sure. Indeed, the issue is so fundamentally one betwixt justice and injustice that it is well nigh impossible to see how the overture can be defended by anybody when it is understood.

—A friend of The Continent calls our attention to the fact that in the teacher training textbook of the Westminster Press, Oliver's "Preparation for Teaching," there is an enumeration of "places of worship" which does not mention the home as one. Undoubtedly our friend is right in saying that the home is the most important of all places of worship. When a new edition of the book is put out this correction ought to be made; it would count a good deal in emphasizing the importance of daily family prayer in the Christian household, which certainly no Sunday school teacher should neglect to recommend—or practice.

—The expectation that Sun Yat Sen, the great Chinese patriot, father of the republic, would soon visit America is now dissipated. Dr. Sun did set out on a tour which he expected to extend to the United States, but he only got as far as Japan. There news reached him which convinced him that he must return home and attend strictly to his present task of developing railroad communication among the Chinese provinces. His American visit is therefore postponed for at least a year, and probably longer.

DR. JOWETT'S MESSAGE

The Song of Liberty

WHERE IS THERE any literature that can compare with the New Testament in its persistent note of rich and joyful freedom? Everywhere the song of liberty is heard, and enslaved men and women are called into its precious inheritance. When I listen to its manifold music I feel as if I had scarcely entered into its vigorous and exultant life. "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." If my liberty be impoverished, it is because I am limiting the Spirit. If I move in any kind of unholy servitude it is because I do not give freedom to the Lord. Let us contemplate the scriptural offer of freedom, in order that we may see how slightly we have entered into the promised possession.

There is, first of all, freedom from the grip of a violated law. Sin is transgression of the law, and a broken law holds me in its bondage. There is an appalling sequence proclaimed in the word of God, and it is confirmed in human experience. The sequence is this—sin brings forth death. This death is not some penalty of remote judgment to be inflicted when this life is ended, it is a death which begins at the moment of sin. When a man lies he begins to die to truth. John Ruskin said a day's communion with daubs would impair a man's vision of artistic truth. That is to say, the artistic transgression makes the artist begin to die to the artistic ideal. And so it is with moral transgression; sin works benumbment, and the higher powers die downwards with every new iniquity. "Sin and death"; that is a sequence even more sure than the sequence of "gluttony and indigestion." It is a law of the Lord, and it cannot be escaped.

Grace Sufficient to Set the Prisoner Free

But sin not only creates corruption, it leads to alienation from the holy God. And that is so even on the purely human plane; there is nothing so divisive as uncleanness. There can be no true union between husband and wife unless both are pure and true. The intrusion of sin is a wedge in the fellowship. And it is even so with the Lord. There can be no communion where sin abounds.

But cannot the sequence be escaped? Is it not the very glory of the gospel that between sin and death, and between sin and alienation, there can be a gracous interposition, and in an unspeakably glorious way the sequence can be broken? I went to see a prisoner the other day who is serving the sentence of a violated law. Crime and punishment; that is the sequence which has gripped him. But is there no way of dealing with that connecting "and"? Suppose I could interpose and obtain his pardon; or more deeply still, suppose it were possible for me to get behind his bars, and take his place, and set him free! The law would still be honored, and yet he would have obtained deliverance from the sequence. And surely this is the work of grace, and surely this is a faint analogy of the redemptive ministry of Christ. He can deal with the connecting "and"; he can interpose himself; he "died for our sins." We obtain deliverance from "the law of sin and death."

"He breaks the power of canceled sin,
He sets the prisoner free."

Strength to Repel Enslaving Temptations

I turn again to the Scriptures, and I find that another glorious part of the promised inheritance is freedom from sin. There is no need to tell anyone that sin can hold the soul in servitude. The souls of men can be held as chattels just as slave drivers used to hold men's bodies. Lust can own us, and so can drunkenness, and envy, and peevishness, and evil-thinking, and malice. And sin can hold us down as Watts's Minotaur crushes the frail bird beneath its brutal paw. If we are to have power over the sin that is our tyrant it must be by an overwhelming increase of spiritual might.

It is even so with the power of temptation. If we are to meet it with perfect freedom, it must be by a ceaseless invigoration of our moral and spiritual forces. And it is the simple truth to say that in the moments when we seek intimate communion with God we can smile upon our foes. There is a glen near my native town, and often in the deepening twilight I have crept through it in fearful dread. The rustle of every leaf seemed to be the approach of a ghostly foe. But I have gone through in the thick darkness with my father, and I fairly danced along the road.

I was in the zoo the other day. In the lion house a frightened child ran toward the door in fear. The mother came and took the child's hand, and the crouching beasts lost their terror. These are but cloudy analogies of what happens to man when he has the reenforcing presence of the Spirit of God. The Spirit strengthens our moral perceptions. He inflames our holy desires. He nourishes wholesome repulsions. When we come near to temptation we are not imprisoned by our fears. For "where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty."

There is one other type of freedom which is part of our privilege in Christ Jesus; freedom from the yoke of outward ordinances. How easy it is to fall into the bondage of the letter! How easy it is to be fettered by an ordinance that was intended to be the minister of freedom! All sacraments are "means of grace," means for getting grace. They are like subways; we are not intended to live in them but to use them to get somewhere. But we are tempted to make our home in the means, and we never arrive at the ends.

We dwell in mere symbolism; we do not step forth into the glorious riches of our spiritual inheritance. If we could only be taken to the spirit of the thing we should find our destined freedom. The spirit of anything is the home of liberty. It is only when we get into the spirit of music that the statutes become our songs. It is only when we get into the spirit of a poem that we enter into the poet's world. And it is only when we dwell in the secret place of the Most High that we enter into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

Airs of Faith Wherein Care Cannot Live

There is one other freedom I will name, and which is ours in Christ Jesus—freedom from corroding care. Yes, that is the right word; anxiety corrodes the life. Small worries are like beavers, and they eat away at the moral foundations and great structures fall into disaster. If only Christian people could obtain deliverance from fear and worry what released energies there would be in the service of the kingdom of God!

Suppose we could deal with cares as we deal with moths in summer! Our method with moths is to fight them through an appropriate atmosphere. We put our furs into cold storage where the moths cannot breathe. Or we camphorate the atmosphere, and the moths never awake. And surely it is some such ministry that we require for the soul. Anxiety can be fought by a changed spiritual climate. Many things cannot breathe in the rare atmosphere of a spiritual clime. And this is just what is promised to us in the fellowship of the Holy Spirit. Life obtains a new atmosphere, and many of our enemies sleep the sleep of death.

"A heavenly air is breathing round,

Such a survey of our spiritual freedom makes us conscious of our bondage. And yet this is the wealth of the promise, even though we have not claimed its rich fulfillment. There ought to be a wonderful contrast between men and women who are in bondage and Christian believers who have received their freedom. There ought to be a song of liberty from the ransomed hosts of the Lord that would send its music around the whole world. "And at midnight Paul and Silas sang . . . and the prisoners heard them."

French Statesman Assails Alcohol

Georges Clemenceau, former premier of France, who was one of the candidates for the presidency, has surprised Paris by a strong denunciation of the liquor traffic as a peril to the nation. He has written the preface of a pamphlet devoted to a general economic study of alcohol, which has just been laid before the Paris Academy of Medicine. He deplores the fact that the state seems powerless against this "most formidable enemy of social peace and general welfare." The Associated Press thus translates his words:

"Today it is beginning to be understood that the right to poison people cannot properly be regarded as one of the achievements of the French revolution. Universal suffrage would really put itself out of court if it had succeeded in emancipating itself from the yoke of a single tyrant, only to fall under the sway of a league of private interests which are in open warfare with the public interest. All well intentioned men, without distinction of party, ought to join in a common effort for the salvation of our country, which is menaced from so many directions at once."

Where "High Buildings Shut Out the Stars"

BY EDGAR P. HILL

Dr. Hill has been for several years the capable superintendent of the Board of Church Extension of Chicago Presbytery and also holds a professorship in McCormick Seminary. Previous to coming to Chicago he had an important and successful pastorate in Portland, Oregon. He is noted for breadth and clearness of vision in city mission work, a subject with which this article deals in its broad general aspects

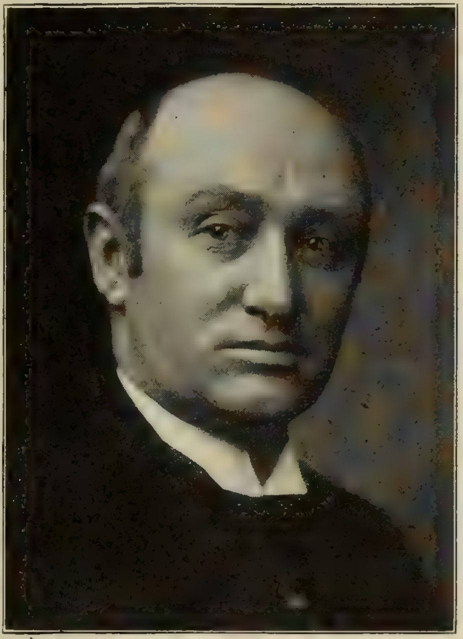
IN THE FIGHT of the Lord's hosts for the supremacy of the world the place where the battle rages with fiercest fury is the city. Here is the strategic point. If this is lost apparently all is lost. To capture it means glorious and far-reaching victory.

The situation is bewildering and at first glance somewhat disheartening. In the city the almost resistless pull is away from things religious. A sense of individual responsibility is easily lost in the crowd. High buildings shut out the stars and God is forgotten. From the congested districts where religion is most needed the churches are fleeing as from a plague, while in the suburbs the denominations scramble for the advantage.

And the foreigners are here. They have been coming at the rate of a million a year, massing in our great cities, displacing our Protestant constituency and forming distinct, unyielding settlements. Thus the Roman Catholics are enabled to erect splendid houses of worship and parochial buildings, by the side of which our enterprises appear mean and unimportant. The Jews push on from one district to another like resistless glaciers, leaving a detritus of dead churches to mark their progress. Surely there is need of wise generalship, loyal cooperation and self-sacrificing effort, if the cities of America are to be won for Jesus Christ.

The plan of campaign will depend largely on the results that are sought. If the objective is the improvement of sanitation, a certain course of action will be adopted. If the intellectual betterment of the people is intended, another plan will be necessary. The winning of a city for Christ assumes certain conditions and demands a pretty definite plan of procedure.

Religious work in our centers of population is being seriously affected by a proposed fundamental principle to the effect that men are naturally good and need only pleasant surroundings to insure perfect manhood. Listen to this from a book just off the press: "We must believe, in the light of the new social philosophy of our time, that human nature is good and not bad. Man's sin, like his disease and poverty, is to be attributed primarily to the social and economic conditions of his environment." Listen again to one of the leading sociologists of the day. "Sin is misery. Misery is poverty. The antidote of poverty is income." All of which sounds almost funny to the ordinary father of an ordinary boy who has learned by hard experience that it takes much more than freedom from financial embarrassment to insure the development of a child into an angel. Even in the face of the emphatic words of Jesus, "Ye must be born again," this sort of philosophy is pervading religious life everywhere and subtly but powerfully affecting its activities. If the only antidote of sin is income, then more and more we shall continue to emphasize physical ministries, pouring our money into social settlements that exhaust their energies in discussing economic questions and caring for men's bodies; more and more we shall ignore those agencies that seek to nourish men's souls.



Edgar P. Hill, D. D.

It's the Church Which Proclaims Brotherhood

If the church is to be a vital factor in the life of the city, its members must be brought to a profound realization of its unique place in the whole work of individual and social salvation. How has the work of social betterment always been done? Notice—the church has always regarded it as its chief business to go out after men one by one and lead them in penitence to the cross, there to be transformed from men of godlessness and selfishness into men of righteousness and love. Then the church has taken these trophies of grace and trained them for efficient and persistent usefulness. Thus the church has been supplying recruits for the ever increasing army of social workers, who, with warm hearts, in unstudied ways, in obscure places, are earnestly seeking to ease the burdens of the weak. It is the church that has unceasingly proclaimed the principles of the kingdom of God, the universal recognition and adoption of which will usher in the day long promised, when the world shall be brought together in brotherhood.

Effective Progress Through Denominational Agencies

But how is it possible for the church to be the large factor in the community it ought to be, unless Christian people by giving to it generously of their time and money help to equip it for its mighty task? And how can anyone hope to strengthen the church in general except by working through that branch of it with which he happens to be connected? It is being assumed by some that the denominations are no longer essential and that the cause of Christ can be pushed ahead more rapidly by allowing distinctive church agencies to perish. A more deplorable misconception could scarcely be imagined. Here is what one of the prophetic leaders of the day has to say on the subject: "It is only by division and subdivision that an army is rendered effective. So it is only by grouping Christians around regimental standards that the church of Christ at the present stage of development becomes manageable and capable of doing its largest work. A soldier does not show disrespect to the army when he is loyal to his regiment. His value to the army is measured by his loyalty to his own division commander." And yet there are multitudes of church members who, while studiously ignoring their own denominational interests, are giving with lavish generosity to various educational and philanthropic agencies which have only a secondary relation to the spread of the gospel. Then perhaps they express the utmost surprise and alarm when the church is criticised for its weakness and inefficiency. Men are not wise who calmly look on while our churches are struggling for existence, explaining their attitude of indifference by saying that they do not believe in sectarianism. Sectarianism which means strife is to be utterly repudiated, but denominationalism which means a division of labor will probably persist until the kingdom has come in its fullness.

It would make a new day in the history of city evangelization if our splendid laymen, instead of exhausting their resources in trying to help every good thing under the sun, would first of all see to it that their own denominational agencies were properly equipped for that work of social betterment which the church and the church alone has been divinely appointed to perform.

One of the chief obstacles in the way of city evangelization is denominational rivalry, resulting in duplication, waste and unseemly strife. Frequently a half dozen empty church buildings are found occupying the same field, where the work could be done far more efficiently by only one. So far as the congested sections of the city are concerned, the denominations seem willing to retire, leaving the religious work to be carried on spasmodically by irresponsible groups that often bring the cause of Christianity into disrepute, while the missionary agents rush into the residence districts and fashionable suburbs to contest fiercely for the advantage. A union of the forces of Christendom is far away. But denominational cooperation ought to and may be effected at once. The various religious bodies through their authorized missionary agencies should engage in a concerted, persistent, comprehensive ministry among the unchurched who live in the slums and tenement house districts.

The Chicago Association of Commerce recently investigated various religious and philanthropic organizations that appeal to business men for assistance and made the discovery that eighteen were pure fakes. If the money Christian men and women are annually pouring into irresponsible enterprises were placed in the hands of a cooperative body representing the various denominations they could rest in the assurance that the money was being conscientiously expended and great good was being done.

As to the residence districts, there should be a working agreement among the missionary societies whereby new churches could be organized only after securing the approval of a committee representing the cooperating bodies. What may be accomplished along this line may be inferred from the splendid work of the Cooperative Council of City Missions of Chicago, which is composed of official representatives appointed by the city missionary societies of the Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists and Disciples. This body is giving a notable demonstration of the value and methods of cooperation in city evangelization. It studies various city problems, canvasses fields, suggests that new churches be organized or that competing enterprises be consolidated. No new work is begun without the approval of the council.

Tactics: Foreign Evangelization

The evangelization of the foreign-speaking people of our cities is the most pressing and difficult missionary task before the church of America at this hour. When one considers the fact that the population of Chicago alone, 60 per cent of which is foreign born or born of foreign parents, is greater than the combined populations of New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, Utah, Alaska and the Hawaiin islands, he begins to realize the magnitude and urgency of the task. What shall be the ministry of the church to these newcomers? The social settlements, for the most part, have adopted the policy of giving religious instruction no place among their activities. They seek to serve all the people of the community, are unwilling to risk antagonizing the Jewish and Catholic portion of their constituency. The church should recognize the splendid work being done by the social settlements just as it should appreciate heartily the ministry of the bureau of charities, the health department and the public schools. But the church has a unique mission to these foreigners which is not fulfilled when they have been taught to love pictures and salute the flag. It must explain to them not only the principles of the constitution but the teachings of the word of God. It is not enough to teach them to know the name and respect the office of the President of the United States. They must be taught to know and love the Lord Jesus Christ.

Our institutional churches seem peculiarly fitted to minister to these strangers. In them the Italian or Jew may learn to read and speak English, find true friends, receive instruction in citizenship, and in the fundamental truths of Christianity. No attempt should be made to proselyte. Physical ministries should never be offered as a bait to catch converts. The church should make plain that it is here to help the people of the community in every possible way, but it should not be ashamed to insist that its very best ministry is being performed when the people are being brought into fellowship with Jesus Christ. The policy of using foreigners to work among foreigners has thus far not been altogether satisfactory. Close observers are convinced that we shall never make very rapid progress in this matter until our young Americans volunteer, just as on the foreign field, learn the language of the people among whom they plan to labor, train for the work and remain in it.

How to Meet the Shifting Population Peril

Most of the religious bodies find their work seriously handicapped if not actually imperiled by reason of the rapid shifting of populations, which leaves churches once strong face to face with possible extinction because of insufficient financial ability to enable them to readjust themselves to the new situation. In order to forestall such tragedies, one of two plans may be adopted. A strong church may affiliate with itself a weaker one to share with it its greater strength of means and workers. Brick church, New York City, is doing its city mission work in this way. An even better plan would be to endow generously the Board of City Missions or Church Extension Board, so that endangered churches might be saved, weak ones fostered and new ones organized. Among the princely gifts of that far-seeing Christian statesman and philanthropist, John S. Kennedy, there was none that showed greater wisdom or a keener sense of a city's need than that of $1,500,000 to the New York church extension committee to be used in just such ways.

Only recently have we come to realize the necessity of making a religious and sociological survey of a field before a church can render its best service to the community. In explanation of his truly remarkable work in New York, Dr. Rainsford said the old St. George's was like a fisherman accustomed to earn his bread at catching herrings. The run of herrings had disappeared. In their place had come a tremendous run of smelts. Although the smelts were better fish, the fisherman was starving because he was using the wrong kind of net. It is the business of a survey to find out the kind of fish that are running in order that the right sort of net be used. Not long ago a district a mile square was carefully surveyed and the results visualized by means of maps and charts. Then some workers were called together and the matter was spread before them. In thirty minutes they got a better idea of their task than would have been possible in weeks of tramping through the neighborhood. At a glance the various uplifting and demoralizing agencies of the community were seen. Then and there an intelligent program of work was enthusiastically adopted, which will probably start a dying church on a career of large usefulness. Before long the city pastor who does not occasionally made a religious and sociological survey of his parish will be looked upon as a back number.

Making the Multitude Listen to the Message

The problem of publicity is one of the most serious that confronts a city church. How can the rushing, thoughtless multitudes be brought to a pause for a moment, that the preacher may proclaim his message? What are the most effective methods of attracting people to the house of God? Some church advertising seems more like the frantic efforts of a discouraged shopkeeper trying to dispose of shelf-worn stock than that of a confident merchant whose superior goods are their own commendation. It is a question whether snappy newspaper articles and brilliant electric signs are special evidences of religious vitality and alertness. The owners of genuine gold mines do not advertise largely. The greater the surgeon the less the need of exploitation. Long ago cities were emptied as crowds hurried into the desert to listen to a man with a real message. Jesus needed no publicity bureau. When at a wellside a solitary woman had her heart laid bare before him, she hurried excitedly back to the village and soon the prophet was addressing a crowd. When the Great Physician opened the eyes of two blind men the twain ran forth with grateful enthusiasm to spread abroad his fame in all that country. That was advertising worth while when men who owed to Jesus the priceless gift of sight hurried everywhere to share with others their glorious secret. And in our great cities when the men who stand in the pulpits shall be men of profound conviction, living in intimate fellowship with the unseen world, expert in declaring the deep things of God, then the churches shall be real sanctuaries where the bewildered multitudes may find genuine fellowship and peace and inspiration.

An all important factor in the evangelization of the city is consecrated and efficient leadership. It is sometimes pathetic to listen to the appeal of a city pastor who has failed, as he begs for better equipment, a different location, or more generous financial backing, when everyone else knows that he himself is the chief obstacle in the way of advancement. A superintendent of missions should take as his motto, "Men for churches, not churches for men," and should decline absolutely to recommend his closest friend to any field, however humble, merely to assist him to a livelihood.

Money will not evangelize a city, neither will buildings, however elaborately equipped; but men who walk with God, are unafraid and resourceful, who love folks and are eager to help them to jobs or to Jesus Christ.

The Court of Peace

O my dear country, thou canst never dare
Deny the court of peace! Thou, who art hope
Of the world's nations; underneath the scope
Of whose broad wings they seek a sheltering care
Like to the care of God! Thou who must share
Christ's saving travail for their sons that grope
Through toil to thee; who in thyself must cope
With all earth's strife, in strength of naught but prayer!

Nay, but thou must be first to own that court
And set her as a crown upon the brow
Of Christ, the King of nations. First must thou
Confess his rule—so shall he judge thy cause,
Whose word is every nation's last resort,
To stablish it in his unchanging laws.

JESSIE WISEMAN GIBBS.

A young woman member of a Brooklyn church choir that is known in the parish for its deficiency in harmony went to the pastor and asked him when he would begin paying salaries to the vocalists, relates The New York Sun. She said she was studying music and a salary would help her along quite a bit.

"Salary!" said the pastor, with a whistle. "Why, I'm thinking of paying the congregation for coming to hear you folks sing."

Advertising a City Free from Its Vice

How Atlanta's Church Men Extinguished the "Red Light" District—A Men and Religion Aftermath—The Knightly Service of Two Laymen

BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS, Editor Afield of The Continent

THE MOST remarkable story known to me in the present religious life of North America is Atlanta's experience with the social evil. In a word, all the houses of professional vice in the city have been advertised out of existence by the churches.

Involved in the record are the stories of two great laymen in a knightly service; of a solidified Christian sentiment in the city; of a ruler of the underworld who has become a matron of a new home for rescued girls; of a tense political battle wherein Christian men showed that strategy and the ability to win are the possession of the righteous; and of an adaptation of Men and Religion methods that alone justifies the great congress of the Men and Religion Movement a year ago. Whether an entirely new method for the church's use in dealing with city problems has been demonstrated remains to be seen.

Atlanta had experienced a successful Men and Religion campaign, and consequently sent a strong delegation to the Men and Religion congress in New York City last spring. There these representative men were caught up into a mount of vision of new service by men for the kingdom. The social service message and the publicity message especially took hold of them, as they did of most of the delegates. These were new notes in Christian work. They were real messages to be wrought out into service. With opened eyes and resolute hearts the delegates returned to Atlanta. The unforgettable address of Jane Addams echoed in their memories above all else.

Straightway these men began to look at Atlanta's local conditions with new eyes. They discovered what may be found in almost every other large city in the country—a "red light" district wherein the social evil was protected, or at least winked at, by city officials. The immensity of the task—if these men had the hardihood to accept it as a task—of healing this sore on the body politic was overwhelming. Even a preliminary investigation revealed how the tentacles of the underworld reached out in many directions to centers of influence and power. Nevertheless, these southern men had not made their vows in vain.

Announcing the Facts of the Social Evil

Without taking the world into their confidence or boasting of what they meant to do, or calling in the counsel of any experts, these men blended the publicity message and the social service message into one agency and began to advertise in all the city papers the facts of the social evil in Atlanta. They contracted for a large amount of advertising space in the daily papers to be paid for at regular rates. They entitled their advertisements, "The Houses in Our Midst," and called them "Men and Religion Bulletins." They were numbered in consecutive order. No. 1, of course, implied that No. 2 was to follow, and No. 10 called up in the minds of the friends of vice the dread possibility of a No. 20 or a No. 30. In truth, the bulletins have now numbered fifty, and there have been frequent extras, sometimes a whole page in extent. Ordinarily the advertisements are two, three and four columns wide, extending the full length of a page.

Of course the advertisements created a sensation. They were conspicuous, and yet they did not rely for their effect upon display type. The method plainly was to be the use of the artillery of facts and principles. Bald, hideous facts about the social evil in Atlanta were cited without qualification or circumlocution. Then to these conditions was applied the clear word of Scripture.

No harm will be done to betray at this day the fact that one of the officials of the Men and Religion congress said, when he saw the first copies of the Atlanta advertisements: "There! those Atlanta men have gone off at half-cock. They have queered the whole idea of Christian publicity. They have not followed the directions in the book. The South will never stand for such a bald statement of social conditions as these men are printing. There will be a reaction against this that will injure the entire work of Christian publicity."

Therein the Men and Religion leader was not as expert as his title credited him with being. The Atlanta men knew their task and their method better than the man at headquarters. They were not taking orders or directions from New York but were working out their own problem in their own way. Actually and officially, the Men and Religion Movement found behind them the united senti- adjournment of the congress. Not so in Atlanta. To this day the advertisements are still appearing with the name of the Men and Religion Forward Movement. Undisturbed by any criticisms from the metropolis, even if they so much as heard them, the Atlanta men kept serenely at their task, with a quiet patience that foreboded ill for the intrenched evil of the city.

Advertisements Stir the City and State

Week by week the advertisements grew stronger and stronger. The entire city of Atlanta and state of Georgia were set to humming with this sensation. Instead of revolting from the brutal truth, the cultivated and Christian people of the South rose to the emergency in soldier fashion. The executive committee of the Men and Religion Movement had gone out of existence with the ment of the churches of Atlanta and the Christian people of the city. Their way grew easier the farther they traveled it.

The advertisements were marvels of effectiveness. Their logic was as straight as a running noose. The style was brilliant, epigrammatic, puncturing. At times it rose to the loftiest heights. These messages were literature. Hysteria and fanaticism never crept into the presentations. There were no muddled generalities. The writer clearly had a knowledge of the world. He not only knew Atlanta but he gathered his ammunition from the capitals of Europe—Berlin, Madrid, London—and from the other great cities in America. He was quick to seize the news of the day and feather his barbs with it. With rare adroitness he took advantage of Jewish and Roman Catholic pronouncements and actions upon the subject, to show the solidarity of moral attack upon this evil.

Most remarkable of all, in this long succession of advertising, was the pertinent application of the words of Jesus. In the serene assurance that this was the court of last appeal, the gospel of Christ was quoted where it fitted. A better blending of the law and the gospel could not be imagined. The tone of the advertisements revealed something of the serene assurance of Scripture itself; they were unhurried and unannoyed. The calm confidence in which they were written was more terrifying than bluster. Evidently the Christian forces of Atlanta, under the direction of the Men and Religion Movement, had laid siege to the citadel of vice, and they possessed the needed guns and ammunition. Even the casual reader could see that there was, behind the written statements, a legal mind and a soldier heart. Here was the Christian crusader down to date. Each of the advertisements, until victory was assured, ended with the confident words, "Atlanta should and will close the houses in our midst."

The men who used these advertisements were speaking to the people of Georgia with a power that no other series of messages had ever possessed, and they were plainly fearless. They went wherever the trail led them. It became necessary to point out the new and unstudied implications in the problem of the social evil. The wages of women workers were set forth in the advertising and a new duty laid upon the city's Christian men. It is true that the world has been blundering along in chaotic fashion amid the new economic and social conditions. Now our prophets are facing the facts—all facts. The really startling appropriateness of the Scripture quotations used by the Atlanta men have stimulated many minds. Thus one advertisement bears the words of Nehemiah, "Some of our daughters are brought into bondage already."

Social Conscience and Property Ownership

A conspicuously Christian city, Atlanta was yet shown to suffer from a sore lack of social conscience. Investigation showed that 50 per cent of the properties used for evil purposes in the city were owned by Christian men. The trails that were followed ran in directions that would have deterred less courageous or less purposeful crusaders. Yet there seemed to be no power in all Atlanta that could balk or make to swerve aside this relentless crusade.

As may be surmised, it was quickly found that it had been the part of wisdom to contract for advertising space. The newspapers of no city could be counted upon to follow editorially and disinterestedly such a path as the Men and Religion committee pur-

Chief Beavers
The New Charter
AND Protected Vice

"The new charter was not framed to destroy Chief Beavers."

True.

"The fight for its adoption is not intended to hurt the Chief."

That is unquestionably so.

But you make a mistake when you say:

"The Men and Religion Forward Movement is opposing the charter."

This Committee neither advocates nor opposes it.

The Committee gives you facts; it asks you to think.

Chief Beavers is secure, whether the charter is adopted or rejected, so long as you are awake, watching and thinking.

But some believe that the Chief is in danger.

Why?

Because he has antagonized the criminal element in Atlanta; he has kept his oath; he has obeyed the law; he has broken the alliance between crime and the city

For this a few h[illegible] him with an undying hatred sued. By the use of advertising space, the message was put in the control of the committee itself. It belonged absolutely to the men who had paid for it. Nobody could censor it. There was no newspaper owner with possible property interests to edit it and no big advertiser to influence it.

This experiment revealed in striking fashion a new instrument of democracy—the paid statement, through advertising columns, of truth that should reach the people. The Men and Religion committee might have conferred until its members were deaf and doddering with public officials and politicians, and not have accomplished one-half that was wrought by direct appeal to the consciences of the people. There was no way of answering, avoiding or diverting the tremendous truths told week by week in these display advertisements, which naturally came to be the first part of the paper to which thousands of readers turned every day.

Contrary to the prediction of the northern wiseacre, the southern people did not revolt from this plain statement of truth. They were stung by it and stirred and stimulated. They quickly revealed "a new conscience" upon "an ancient evil," as Jane Addams's happy phrase has it. The advertisements reached all classes of people—gentlewomen with sisterly hearts who had been sheltered from the knowledge of the sin-seamed side of life; business men with "no time" for sociological conferences or for sermons had the living truth flung into their faces; into the houses where the cry arises, "No man cares for my soul," was carried this message of brotherly solicitude. The underworld turned with a new and growing fear in its eyes to these pages which it knew the whole city was reading. Resourceful and powerful beyond belief as are the cohorts of vice, they had literally no weapons with which to combat this new engine of publicity. The phrase, "Atlanta should and will close the houses in our midst," began to haunt many persons. It penetrated into the innermost consciousness of men who had never been suspected of altruistic or Christian sentiments. Everybody knew that something would happen, and the city was on the qui vive to discover where and how the break would come.

Chief of Police with Power and Will Acts

The outcome was dramatic. The chief of police, by Atlanta's system, has the power to close up all resorts of evil. He does not have to confer with any authorities higher up. Chief of Police Beavers of Atlanta was at heart a better man than the world with which he had dealings ever suspected. He had fallen into a vicious custom. These advertisements "got him"; they found the real man Beavers. He resolved to stand by his parents, by his own early training and by the best life of Atlanta. He publicly pledged the Men and Religion committee that he would close the houses. Of course he knew where they were. Every police department in the world knows the evil resorts of its own city. These dens of vice could not survive a week without the friendly connivance of the police. When Beavers said he would close out all the houses of shame in Atlanta the public knew he could do it if he would. His statement revealed a man moved to the depths, and the Christian people believed it. Their confidence was not misplaced.

At once many persons who had shown no spark of solicitude for the fallen girls in their virtual slavery began to shed maudlin tears in public over their fate at being turned adrift without shelter. This ostentatious sympathy was short-lived, for the advertising campaign was part of a Christian movement. It was bigger and better than politics. Behind it burned the yearning, loving heart of Christ's compassionate servants. The ensuing advertisements were directed to the women in the evil resorts. The word of the committee was pledged that every one of them would be offered shelter and help in a new life. All the arguments that the vested interests of evil might offer to their victims were counteracted by this clear, unequivocal statement which could not be kept from the eyes of anybody who read the daily papers, that there was a door of opportunity open to all who sought a better life. Ministers and their members went two by two through the "red light" district. Every fallen woman in Atlanta was personally offered a chance for a better life. With this message of practical service went the gospel of Christ. The women were told that if ill they would be provided with medical care; if they needed training for a career of honest service, it would be supplied; if there were dependent relatives, they would be cared for; if shelter alone were wanted, that would be provided. Whatever was necessary to help the victims of vice back to respectable life was freely pledged to them.

Here comes the most shining chapter in the long and beautiful story. More than 200 of the women accepted the committee's offer and forsook the old life of shame.

Some Remarkable Consequences of the Crusade

There were striking consequences to this appeal. For example, one of the most notorious proprietresses of evil resorts in Atlanta, when the Christian workers first began to visit the district with their offers of help, scoffed and mocked. Later she capitulated to their patient, loving invitation. Then she broke down and gave her heart to the Master whom these friends represented. In a short time she brought to the committee her entire savings, amounting to about $2,500, and asked them to use it toward the maintenance of a home of refuge for rescued women. Then she gave herself to any Christian service in behalf of these women that the committee might choose to give her. She is today assistant matron of the Martha rescue home.

The campaign was a complete success. Every disreputable house in the district was closed. A law on the statute books was made public whereby any citizen could secure the closing of a house of evil resort. There is not today in all Atlanta a single one of these houses.

Of course the wicked raged. The Men and Religion campaign developed a host of open and secret foes. Politicians tried to divide the Christian forces. The Men and Religion committee practically held the political future of men in its hands, but it steadfastly resisted all enticements to go into partisan politics and adhered resolutely to its one purpose. The weapon of publicity never left its hand. It was able to answer within twelve hours any movement of the allies of vice. Without party affiliations, without alliances or compromises, the Christian men continued single-minded in their one task of dealing directly with the public. Astute politicians did their best to harass the chief of police and to compel

[illegible] city [illegible] where one of the [illegible] unfortunate [illegible] vice [illegible] come for help might [illegible] located within its limits

Christ called: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden."

But with one accord many who name Him Lord today protest:

"Let her GO anywhere to be saved, so long as she does not come near me or mine"

"Alas for the rarity
Of Christian charity
Under the sun!
Oh, it was pitiful!
Near a whole city full,
Home she had none."

If white slavery so transforms a girl that you are unwilling for her even to be saved in your neighborhood, surely you should and will support Chief Beavers in keeping out of Atlanta the dens which for trade purposes demand the making of fallen women—the enslaving of girls.

God help them and you and us!

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE MEN AND RELIGION FORWARD MOVEMENT the removal of the Martha home, but not one of them could withstand the pressure of publicity. Those all-potent advertisements, which had kept faith with the public, had but to appeal to the Christian conscience of Atlanta to effect their purposes.

The advertisements are still appearing. These men are of statesman stuff. They not only condemn the evil but they praise the good. They have upheld the hands of Chief Beavers. They have warned the parents of girls coming to the city. They have been counsel in preventive measures. In season and out they continue to speak directly to the people the word of righteousness.

The Personalities Behind the Great Campaign

Now, every movement is but another name for some man or men. Behind the anonymous signature, "Executive Committee of the Men and Religion Forward Movement," there are personalities. The inner group of the executive committee are a few laymen, chiefly Presbyterians. The heart of hearts of the campaign are two men, Marion Jackson and John J. Eagan. Without them the work would not have been done. Only their worldly wisdom, driven by a deep Christian passion, could have effected the extraordinary and unprecedented results which have been achieved in Atlanta.

The story of these two men is romantic. They are David and Jonathan in their friendship. Young men of the same age, born and bred in Atlanta, they once were peculiarly antipathetic; but when Jackson became a Christian in the Torrey meetings the two found themselves drawn together by the great tie of Christian fellowship. It does not take a psychologist to explain this. The men held the great essentials in common. They were in unity in life's deepest purpose. Marion Jackson is a study in the unexpected consequences of vital religion. He was a born aristocrat, an aristocrat to his finger tips, by birth, tradition and aptitude; but when, in Dr. Torrey's preaching, the gospel gripped him he became a democrat. He now has a New Testament passion for people. The simplicities of the Christian brotherhood shine out in his life and actions.

Marion Jackson is a lawyer, and a good one. That explains why the method of the Men and Religion committee has been bombproof and water-tight. The advertisements were all written by him. Of course there was not money enough in Atlanta to hire professional brains that could write such advertisements as these. They had to be born of a trained mind and a flaming heart. Nobody ever thought of Marion Jackson as a man to write advertisements. Yet today if he cared to abandon his legal practice he could take those advertisements in his hand and secure employment with any advertising agency in the land.

Hand in hand with Marion Jackson has gone John J. Eagan, whom the books write down as a capitalist. A quiet young man who inherited a fortune from his uncle, he had gone on his simple way as in the day when he did not possess wealth. The money that came to him he invested in securities that were in consonance with his Christian beliefs, for he is an earnest Presbyterian. This Atlanta campaign has thus far cost over $12,000, $6,500 of which was for advertising bills. One does not have to be much of a guesser to surmise where the money came from. We may be sure, though, that the giver has had a "run for his money," in the phrase of the street. Judged by any standards, the Atlanta campaign has been more fun than can be got out of a fleet of aeroplanes or a garage full of racing automobiles. One would hunt far to find a happier man than John J. Eagan.

A Business Man and an Apostle

In this Men and Religion Movement he has come to be dominated by a great idea, of which he is the apostle among his fellow business men. That is that business is a ministry, that a man should serve the world by his business. The rights and welfare of his employees and of the larger world which they represent should be the first consideration of business, taking precedence even of dividends. I chanced to sit at luncheon one day with a group of men of whom Eagan was one and another was a large employer of labor. When the talk fell on social service the manufacturer visibly shied. He thought he had been trapped into a company of social reformers, mere impractical theorists, who knew nothing about the weighty problems of the business man. He did not happen to know that Eagan could have bought him out two or three times and then have had money enough left to start him in business again. I shall not soon forget the sweet patience of Eagan as he elaborated his darling idea of service through business, and tactfully let our friend know that he also is an employer. There is no railing in Eagan's speech, and he recognizes the difficulties of the slow, uphill task of making right what is wrong in our social order; but he sees it as the patriotic and Christian duty of the modern man.

What these two laymen have done, with the full and efficient cooperation of the church men of their city, is a revelation and a foregleam of the new era of efficient Christian patriotism which will utilize the most modern methods and the ripest worldly wisdom to bring to pass the reign of the kingdom in this present world.

A Glimpse of the Great Trial at Seoul

This article was written by an American missionary in Japan, who was a spectator of the famous Korean conspiracy trial just concluded, as told by The Continent last week.

The most noteworthy sight in Seoul in January was a group of men, 105 of them. They were the finest looking men I have seen in the country, and as bright and intelligent appearing as might be found in almost any country. They were in handcuffs, watched by spruce, gold-banded police of shorter stature and overbearing manners. Yes, they were prisoners. For a year and a half they had been confined in Oriental jails. There had been more of them, but a few had been released, some had become insane and some had died. They had passed through one trial already and had been convicted of conspiracy to murder the governor general of Korea. One and all had denied the charge. They admitted that they had confessed to it, but they told horrible stories of cruelty by means of which dictated confessions had been extorted from them. The first court credited the confessions and denied the truth of the retractions, and convicted them upon these confessions only, for evidence for the defendants had been refused. And now the case was on trial for the second time.

The room was large, holding perhaps 700 or 800 persons, with a wide platform across the front for the judges and officers of the court. The seats were narrow, close together, with no backs and very uncomfortable; and yet they were occupied day after day by hosts of friends of the prisoners, and by missionaries and other spectators. Court was to meet at 10:30 o'clock in the morning. Earlier than that the prisoners were brought in, Korean friends filled the spectators' seats and the missionaries from Korea and Japan appointed by the mission boards to witness the trial were in their places. All wait as patiently as may be for some forty or fifty minutes. Then the door to the platform opens, the prisoners and all in the room rise and stand, while the three judges, the clerks, interpreters, public prosecutor and assistant enter.

Japanese policemen bring in the witnesses one at a time and lead them up through the long room to its front, where they stand upon the floor facing the presiding judge. He asks them such questions as he chooses. Counsel for the defense occasionally rise and ask the judge to put some particular question, in order to bring out some point. Occasionally, too, a prisoner will rise and break into the proceedings by asking the judge to ask the witness some question. And sometimes the prosecutor will make the same request. But in every case the judge decides whether or not the question shall be put to the witness. No one but the judge is ever permitted to ask any question. There is no jury, and the presiding judge will render his decision at the close of the trial in accordance with what he may consider the law and evidence. Much of the procedure seems strange to Americans, but the Japanese missionaries say that in Japan they think the ends of justice are as well met by it, on the whole, as by the procedure with which we are familiar.

At all events, the whole tone and manner of the court in this trial is far different from that of the first one, and observers who have attended both trials, and criticised the first one as being marked by an evident predetermination to convict, are hopeful that the facts are to be fully shown this time and justice done. It is also strongly hoped that if it shall be established that torture has been used upon these prisoners the government of Japan will take radical measures to prevent any such relapse hereafter.

The effect of this trial upon the minds of the Korean people has been marked, as regards their more serious and earnest attitude to Christianity. Two of the prisoners on trial, who were heathen when arrested, have been converted in the prison, and in their public examination in this present trial so declared themselves to the court.

An Oregonian Who Followed Livingstone

In Portland, Oregon, lives a man who was one of twelve to penetrate Africa shortly after the death of Livingstone to found a mission on Lake Nyassa, which still serves as a monument to the great explorer. This follower of the pioneer is J. A. Patterson, an elder and charter member of Westminster church, Portland. An expedition of twelve men was sent from Scotland in 1878, five years after the death of Livingstone, equipped by the Scottish Free Church with $100,000 to found a mission to be named after the explorer on the banks of the lake which he had discovered. Only three of the original dozen who entered Africa on this trip are now living. Mr. Patterson was the marine engineer with the party, having charge of a steam launch which was sent up the inland waters of the dark continent.

This expedition took with it three coffee plants from the botanical gardens of Glasgow. Two plants died on the trip, but the other is credited with being the progenitor of the bushes which started the present great coffee industry of central eastern Africa. Mr. Patterson in speaking of his trip in the footsteps of Livingstone is quoted in The Portland Oregonian:

"The witch doctors often raised trouble. It was their custom to come into a tribe and start a dance surrounded by a circle of natives. At the conclusion of the dance the learned physician pointed his finger at one of the audience, and this person was then known as bewitched. To clear himself he had to drink poison. If he was not bewitched he would be cleared by vomiting the poison. None of these unfortunate persons ever recovered, yet it is strangely true that the natives looked forward eagerly to the witch dances, and furthermore, when selected to take the poison, they were so sure of their innocence that they drank eagerly. As none ever recovered, the witch doctors were credited with never having made an error in judgment.

"The mission which we established on Lake Nyassa and named Livingstonia is still in existence, but we established another Livingstonia mission at Bandawe on the lake 150 miles away as a substation. This was a more healthful place and now is a thriving town. Steamers are running on Lake Nyassa and the Zambezi river."

BRADFORD HORTON, MAN

BY RICHARD S. HOLMES

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters—Bradford Horton, working his way through Prestonbury Theological Seminary, becomes entangled in a money theft which not only threatens his reputation but also puts him in a false position with regard to his parentage. Two friends remain openly loyal during his trouble. A third, Miss Elmore, though less outspoken in her championship, displays sufficient loyalty to give her father considerable uneasiness. He is, therefore, relieved in mind when, at the beginning of a long foreign tour, he sees that she has won the love of a young Scotchman. His relief is short-lived, however. A hot defense of Horton in a discussion results in an open breach with her father. Mr. Elmore, resenting her defiance of his wishes, collapses under the strain, but after several months' illness he forgives her and reconciliation follows. In the meantime Horton is called to his home to straighten out affairs in the bank founded by his adopted father, which has been wrecked by ventures in Wall street. To aid him in this work, and in a spirit of noblesse oblige, Horton sends for Oren-Toole, through whose jealous machinations his fair name had been smirched. Friendship between the two men results. A sheriff's sale is arranged to satisfy a judgment against the Horton estate. Bradford plans to bid in a house as a home for his mother, from whom he has been estranged because of his determination to enter the ministry. Oren-Toole's services are enlisted in the scheme, which is successfully carried through. Horton finds his chief recreation in rowing on the lake just out of Prestonbury. His boat bears the name Antigone, the name by which, in his heart, he has long called Miss Elmore. He shares his boat with Austin Sleighton.

CHAPTER XXII.

Varying "Sums of Direction"

"SO LUCY JICKERS is going to marry that organist? Well, well! We knew, of course, she would marry a student, but why doesn't she take the singer? He's up there every week, and sometimes oftener, and Joe and the squire think there's no one quite so good as he is. Why didn't they make a match between him and Lucy?"

So Prestonbury talked, as wisely as people commonly do who talk about things of which they know nothing. Even the Shakespeare Club was surprised; not at Sleighton, for his infatuation had been one of the club jokes, but at Lucy. Only a few of the people who discussed the topic saw the real worth of the awkward student. Those few insisted that he was destined for success; as Jack Tappan put it, "Any fellow that can read life into the lines of a drama as he can will make his audience wake up if he has the poorest kind of sermon."

Bradford's congratulations were generous and glad. "That necktie won out, A. S.," he declared. "I was afraid it would be your ruin; it was almost as ridiculous as the horseback riding. But you've made it, and you're lucky, and so's she, as lucky as you are. You're the best fellow up here, old boy."

"Always barring you, Brad."

"Barring nothing and no one. Here's to you, Dr. and Mrs. Austin Sleighton of the by and by."

"Thanks, Brad. But don't forget it's all due to the 'Antigone.' By gracious, I wish you were as sure of the real 'Anti' as I am of Lucy.

Bradford winced, and relapsed into silence. It was only that morning that a letter had come to Mrs. Elmore from the travelers telling of their sojourn in Egypt. Though the young man asked no questions, it was natural that his hostess should share her news with him, but never till this particular day had she seen in him any sign of a more than passing interest in the facts she told him.

As she mentioned that a Scotchman named Stuart was with the Elmores and was very attentive to Eleanor, he had asked, as if involuntarily, "Is Miss Elmore likely to marry him?" She had seen him bite his lips in annoyance at his own words before she answered, "I imagine Father Elmore is very desirous of it."

In his room that night Bradford Horton took from his trunk an envelope in which were three withered white carnations, and held them for a while in the palm of his hand. In his face there was a faraway look, the look of longing that is sometimes worn when no one was with him to detect it. "Oh, well," he said at last, and put the faded keepsakes carefully away. He would never see her again, anyway; she was in Egypt, and when she should return he would be far away. For he did not know as yet the fortune that was even then on its way toward him. It was not until April that he learned of it. For in April the professor of Greek resigned, and the directors of the seminary elected Horton to the vacancy.

The announcement of Bradford's acceptance of the position, with leave of absence till November and an advance of a part of his salary, was made at the annual meeting in May. Maxwell expressed his regret over the matter when he met Horton next day; he had still hoped to secure the young man as part of his permanent force at the bank.

"You and the directors have beaten me," he said. "I'm afraid you're turning a good banker into a dust heap. But I'm glad you're going to stay in Prestonbury, and remember, whenever you get weary of digging among Greek roots we're ready to put you to work in a gold mine."

Perhaps the only person not heartily glad at Bradford's good fortune was old Professor Dragham. That worthy man's soul was filled with fear. Was not the ark in danger once more, if a man who did not believe in "a call" was to become one of the instructors of young men preparing for the ministry? He shook his head and secretly mourned, but would probably have kept his misgivings to himself had not the dean given a dinner in Bradford's honor, at which the members of the faculty and their wives were guests.

Horton and Dragham were seated opposite each other at table, and at the first opportunity the voice of Professor Dragham rose, high, rasping, incisive. "Are you still testing the 'sum of direction,' Mr. Horton? Are you settled as to whether you have a call to the ministry?"

"I must answer no and yes to those questions, professor. I am not testing the 'sum of direction,' and I am settled as to my call."

"Then you think you are called to preach the gospel?"

"No, no, I don't think that. But I know I am called to teach Greek?"

"Do you consider teaching Greek a higher calling than preaching the gospel?"

"No. With me it is not a question of higher or lower, but of simple fact. My friend, Mr. Sleighton, would say without a moment's hesitation that he is called to preach, and I would agree with him. Equally I say I am called to teach, and he will agree with me. But neither his call nor mine is the higher."

"I should like to know what makes you speak with such certainty about Mr. Sleighton."

"'Sum of direction,' professor. Through his seminary life he has been sought by those who wanted a good leader for meetings of

THE HOME COUNCIL

Rests Here and There

BY FRANCES HARMER

A NEW ENGLAND woman, whose sum total of work accomplished was a wonder to her neighbors, and who was always neat and smiling when her husband returned in the evening, always pleasant and cheerful when the children came home from school, admitted once that it resulted largely—both work and pleasantness—from rests by the way.

"As soon as the children have started for school," she told her inquiring friend, "I set to work. I have planned out everything and have got my arrangement of work down to a science. But if in the middle of the morning a peculiar tiredness, which I can tell from laziness, creeps over me, I yield to it at once. I drop right down into an easy chair and pick up the paper or a magazine.

"Many of my good friends would be rather shocked to see me reading, with dishes standing, not yet dried, or, if dry, not put away, beds unmade, parlor unswept, even washing half done. But that rest means a great deal to me. After from fifteen to twenty minutes of it I can go cheerily on with my work. Many a breakdown could be avoided if women knew the value of a short rest between times.

"I remember," she went on, meditatively, "that when my eldest child came my husband and I were very poor. My good doctor knew it would be useless to advise me to hire help, either with the housework or with the care of the baby. But he told me what I could do.

" 'When the baby sleeps,' he said, 'take a little rest. Lie down a few times a day. If the work gets behind—well, that's a pity, but less a pity than if you break down yourself.'

"I took his advice and the little rests by the way. And I think all busy, tired mothers will do well to take both, too."

More About "Refined Speech"

May I add my word to what has already been said in the Home Council about the use of proper English?

Young girls, it seems to me, have a special tendency toward careless or exaggerated speech and because youth is the formative period, they should make a special effort to overcome this fault. Many of us have smiled over the story of the impulsive maiden who, asked if she liked jelly cake, cried: "Jelly cake! Why, I adore it! I'm just wrapped up in jelly cake, that's all!" Most of us have blushed over our mistakes in this direction—mistakes which early self-training would have rendered impossible.

Young girls are seldom tempted toward the grosser verbal sins of profanity and profane ejaculation, though momentary analysis of such exclamations as "Oh, goodness!" "Bother take it!" and so on usually will give the user pause. The rougher sorts of slang also are so generally interdicted by the young girl's natural guardians as to obviate present consideration. But the question of superlatives and exaggeration!

An amused father not long since inquired of his unthinking daughter just how she would explain to him that a neighbor had died.

"Of course you might be able to convey the idea in oratorical terms or poetic quotation," he suggested, "but otherwise I cannot see how you could do it. The words 'death' and 'dying' evidently mean nothing to you. In the past few moments, for instance, you have told me that Annie 'just died' when she learned that she had failed in her examination; that James 'simply expired' on learning that his favorite football team had been defeated; that you yourself are 'absolutely dying' to go to Europe; and that your mother 'all but committed suicide' when her new frock proved disappointing. You 'nearly fainted,' too, I learn, under the pleasant shock of meeting an old schoolmate unexpectedly. You 'fairly howled' with amusement over the mildest of jokes; and you 'actually broke you neck' last Sunday getting to church on time. Your little brother was 'dead to the world' last evening, being absorbed in an adventure story. I am at a loss to know how you would inform me that a real tragedy had occurred."

There are grave reasons to be advanced in deprecation of such habits, Scripture, for one, having something to say about "idle words." But even if there were no other reason, the use of exaggerated and unreasonable speech is foolish. Why not say "revelation" instead of "eye-opener," "I like" instead of "I simply worship," "I am fatigued" or "I am a little weary" instead of "I'm absolutely tired to death!" It is just as easy, and it stamps one with a mark of culture never possible to the user of slang or the otherwise careless speaker.

One on the Doctor

A Scotch lad had his leg injured at a factory and was treated for some time by the doctor without much favorable result. His mother had great faith in a local bone-setter, and wanted her son to go to him; but the boy objected, preferring, as he said, the "reg'lar faculty." Finally, however, he yielded to his mother's persuasions and was taken to the town where the famous bone-setter resided.

The leg was duly examined, and it was found necessary to pull it very severely in order "to get the bone in," as the quack expressed it The patient howled in agony, but at last the bone was "got in" and he was bidden to go home. In a few days he would be all right and could resume work.

"Didn't he do it well?" said the joyous old lady as they started homeward.

"Yes, he did, mother," said the lad; "he pulled it well; but I was na sic a fool as to gie him the sair leg!"

Verses Old and New

THE CARDINAL

In the breezy blue of the April weather,
When each sun ray seemed a golden blade,
I caught the gleam of a crimson feather
Deep in a forest glade.

There was just the hint of the rathe outbreaking
Of beryl buds on the beechen boughs,
And a rosier glint on the maples making
Their whispered vernal vows.

Then sudden the gleam grew a glowing vision
Of shimmering wing and of shining breast,
As though from out of some realm elysian
Had fluttered this feathered guest—

A radiant spirit with song for guerdon,
A plaintive, penetrant, minor strain,
Yet one that bore no quavering burden
Of human want or pain.

Just the voice of the April weather,
With its faint but passionate under-thrill,
That told of the tide of the loosened tether,
And the reawakened will.

Then the bird was gone, with its song and splendor,
Adown a waft of the April wind,
Yet a something stirring, a something tender,
Was left in its flight behind.

Both to eye and to ear had it clearly spoken,
Bidding the heart of a wanderer know
That the bond of beauty is never broken
As the Aprils come and go.

BITS BY THE WAY

HELP IN BIBLE CHAPTER

Better than all man-made remedies for insomnia a writer in The Chicago Tribune finds this way of closing sleepy eyes, which he takes from Proverbs 3: "Trust in the Lord with all thy heart, and lean not upon thine own understanding: In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he will direct thy paths. . . . Then shalt thou walk in thy way securely, and thy foot shall not stumble. When thou liest down, thou shalt not be afraid: Yea, thou shalt lie down, and thy sleep shall be sweet."

A second man, a broker, has found this third chapter a strength in a business way. Confessedly a failure, and racked almost beyond endurance with anxiety, in desperation he finally turned to his Bible for help and stumbled on to this chapter. "I adopted it and fairly lived it," he says, "largely because it relieved my taut nervous and mental condition. Within sixty days I had made $1,300 in commissions. I have prospered bountifully ever since, am free from worry, and when the Salvation Army girls or other charity workers approach I always throw some change into their cups with pleasure, because I know where to go for more, and the source is plentiful and unfailing."

ART OF LISTENING

Are you a good listener? Or are you too busy creating epigrams of your own and developing your own points of view to pay attention to what anyone else is saying? If you don't know how to listen well, you are being a decided wet blanket on that most delightful of arts—the art of conversation.

Think back a moment to your own experience one time when you were trying to relate something, and to tell it through to its conclusion. Was there someone who sat on the edge of his chair with the air of merely waiting for you to swallow a period in order to snatch your next sentence? Or was there someone who hadn't the patience to wait even for the period, but rushed in at the comma and snatched the conversation from you bodily? Or perhaps the annoyer, reminded by your story of something more thrilling that happened to him or to a friend of his, plunged immediately into his own experience and left yours dangling unfinished in midair.

If you have suffered in any way from the interrupter, the poor listener, you can form some sort of idea what effect your own inattention has on the conversation of your friends.

It is surprising that more people do not realize the advantage of listening well, for the charm it possesses is indisputable. The good listener is universally popular. He is looked upon as charming and comprehending, and eventually wins for himself a reputation for real cleverness.

"I CAN'T AFFORD——"

Mrs. Marshall, the wife of our new Vice-President, is showing a spirit of independence which should encourage her sister women to throw off the vicious thraldom of "keeping up appearances." For Mrs. Marshall has frankly declared that she will not keep a social secretary, because she "can't afford one." And she has further declared that, though she likes clothes, she is very certain that she will not buy clothes which lie beyond her means. "We shall live within our salary," she says. "We always have. I dare say I shall not have so much to spend as many women here have, but I don't believe that will make me unhappy."

Furthermore, the vice-presidential household has made the decision to live within its means unanimous. Here's what Mr. Marshall himself has to say about it: "I'm going to keep what I have and live within my income here. I can do it, I think, with economy. I think a little economy won't hurt the American people—including me."

The American people need this fine example of economy in high places, and of the fearless courage which says frankly "I can't afford." Many people are more afraid of being thought poor than of actually being so, and consequently plunge into useless extravagances which not only flatten the pocketbook but often destroy character itself. When every good American citizen is straightforward enough to declare "I can't afford," a long step will be taken toward solving the problem of the high cost of living—styled somewhat cynically, by some, the cost of high living.

How Toggles Made It Rain

BY FREDERICK HALL

"SHALL I PLAY on the piano?" asked mother. "No," answered Mabel. "Or tell stories?" "No." "Would you like me to play my drum—just softly?" asked Toggles. "No."

It sounded a bit fretful; but when it is a hot summer day and when a little girl is only 6 years old and just getting over the measles, and has to stay in a dark room with a bandage over her eyes, there is some excuse for fretfulness.

"I'll tell you," said mother, "brother will stay here with you while I get your lunch. After that maybe a nap will come."

Toggles began right away to tell Mabel all the interesting things he could think of, but by the time mother returned he was almost at the very last one.

"Mother," exclaimed Mabel, as she was being propped up in bed, "I know! I'd like to have it rain."

"Well, little daughter," said mother, kissing her, "I'm afraid that is something brother and I can't arrange."

She motioned that Toggles need not stay any longer and he walked out and looked up at the sky. Not a cloud in sight! It really did seem too bad, when rain was the only thing Mabel had asked for.

Mother tiptoed out after a while and nodded that Mabel was asleep.

"I think it's too bad it won't rain for Mabel, when she wants it to," he said. "Don't you suppose——"

But just at that moment the street sprinkler came around the corner and Toggles leaped up so suddenly that mother had to put her finger to her lips.

"Mother," he exclaimed, "I know!"

Then he told his plan.

"May I?" he asked.

"I don't see any reason why you shouldn't," said mother thoughtfully, "but I wouldn't just yet. I'll tell you when."

In about half an hour she came out to nod to him and off he raced. A moment later, inside the darkened room, Mabel lifted her head.

"Mother," she cried, "it's raining!"

Mother listened.

"It sounds exactly like it," she said.

"And isn't it a lot cooler, mother?"

"It does seem so."

Nearly all the afternoon the sound of the falling rain continued. The next afternoon there was another "shower," and the next day another; and the fourth day Mabel was so much better that they let her come out, with the bandage tight over her eyes, and hold her hands in the falling water as it dripped from the edge of the porch, which was great fun.

Next evening Uncle Ruyter came in to see the little sick girl, who was well enough now to leave off her bandage. She was telling him all about the measles.

"And the very best," she exclaimed, "were the rains!"

"The rains!" he said.

"It was such fun to hear them patter, patter on the porch roof."

"Why——"

But he stopped, for he saw that mother was making signals to him.

Toggles skipped out of the room, and almost as soon as he was back Uncle Ruyter exclaimed:

"Hark! Why, I declare, it's raining now!"

They all listened and there was the patter, patter on the porch roof.

"It's done that 'most every day," declared Mabel.

Uncle Ruyter looked straight at mother, who was smiling oddly.

"See here," he demanded, "is this magic? It hasn't rained for a week at our house."

"Toggles is our magician," said mother.

"Shall I tell, mother?" asked Toggles, eagerly.

"I think so," she answered.

"Well," explained Toggles, "it isn't magic; but Mabel wanted to hear the rain, and I turned the hose so the water would fall on top of the porch. Even mother couldn't tell the difference, and," he added, "that's what you hear now. It isn't a real rain."

But it answered just as well as if it were.

A Song of the Woods

The rippling mountain brooklet
Goes winding down the hill,
It speaks of spring and sunshine,
And is never, never still.

The birds they sing their carols,
With a thrill and with a peep,
And the sunshine and the shadows
Are playing at hide and seek.

Oh, the woods are full of beauty,
Beauty, beauty everywhere,
In the trees and in the flowers
There is beauty, beauty rare!

A Year with Mother Partridge

IF YOU WERE to ask little Mother Partridge what has been the very happiest time of her life thus far she would probably say, in her own language, "Last spring, my dears. For it was then that I made my first nest, and laid my first eggs, and hatched my first chicks."

Mother Partridge was only a year old herself when all these wonderful things happened. But to be one year old is to be quite grown up—for a partridge. That is what Mr. Partridge thought about it—and when he saw Miss Partridge with her bright, black eyes and her soft brownish body he decided at once that she must become his mate. He began to pay court to the little Partridge lady long before the snow was gone entirely from the ground; and presently she began to roost by his side and to hunt food with him; and soon they were planning for a home.

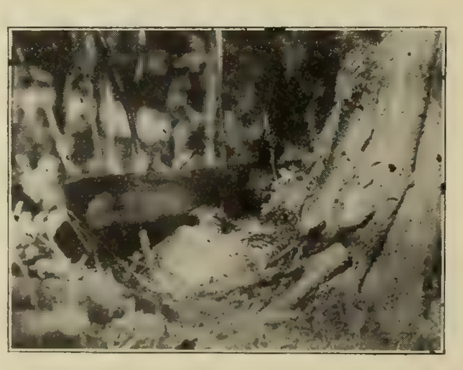
Mr. Partridge was very fond of his little bride, but with the commencement of househunting trouble began. Mrs. Partridge preferred to settle in the open meadow, where the rich grass would be full of the insects for food. Mr. Partridge, on the other hand, feared that the nest, if made there, might be destroyed by the plow or the mowing machine of the farmer. And so they chose finally the root of an old tree by the roadside.

"You will be exposed to attacks by boys and dogs," Mr. Partridge said doubtfully. But Mrs. Partridge reminded him that the dust of the road would be nice for the babies to bathe in, and that, since it was both dry and sunny, the tender chicks would not take cold there.

They scraped a shallow circular hollow over the root, and there Mrs. Partridge began to lay her little drab eggs. The first egg she laid about an hour before noon, the second a bit later, the next a bit later still, and so on, until fourteen tiny eggs lay cozily in the nest.

"I might lay more, I suppose," said Mrs. Partridge—"perhaps as many as twenty-one. But I think fourteen babies are enough for any mother to look after." And Mr. Partridge agreed.

Mrs. Partridge kept the eggs carefully covered with leaves and grass till all were laid, partly to hide them and partly to protect them from frost. For sometimes frosts come even as late as May, and Mrs. Partridge had no idea of losing her entire family in advance. Then when the last tiny drab egg was in place Mr. and Mrs. Partridge both fell to work making the nest ready for the hatching time, placing leaves and grass under the eggs and then arranging them neatly in circles. It took them two days to do this, and if while they were thus engaged anyone had interfered with them in any way Mr. and Mrs. Partridge would have deserted the nest altogether, and this picture of Mrs. Partridge would never have been taken.



Mrs. Partridge Never Wearied

When all was ready Mrs. Partridge stepped into the nest and settled gently down upon the eggs to warm them into life with her soft breast. It was three weeks before little sounds beneath her feathers told Mrs. Partridge that her sitting was nearly over. But she never wearied, nor did Mr. Partridge ever get very far away from his little mate. When the eggs broke open at last Mr. Partridge came to the nest and, sitting close beside it, took the tiny chicks under his own wing, one by one, as they left their shells.

They were queer looking little things, those Partridge chicks—morsels of grayish-brown down, with black markings on their heads and stripes down their backs.

Those first days were anxious ones. Both father and mother knew that a sudden thunderstorm, or a succession of chill, sunless days would bring death to the wee Partridges. But nothing happened to the babies. The bright June sun quickly dried them after they left the eggs, and Mother Partridge, with father close at hand, soon led their children to a patch of clover near by.

Here they lived happily, catching ants and other insects for food, and eating ants' eggs when they could find them. There were plenty of insects, brought by the warm showers just before the little Partridges were hatched. But even now father and mother were not entirely without anxiety, for there was danger of colds from wet grass and earth; and if there should be no rain the supply of insects would fail and the chicks would starve. Moreover, if the earth became very dry it was likely to open in cracks and the chicks would fall into the fissures. But again nothing serious happened.

When they were only a few days old, and no bigger than sparrows, the young Partridges could fly. It was at this time, too, that they became too large for all of them to be comfortably sheltered under their mother's wing, and so Mr. Partridge shared the care of them at night. Soon they learned to follow the low clucking call of their mother and to answer her with a little chirp of their own. Mr. Partridge's call was more harsh. His chief duty those days was to look after the safety of the family—or covey—when they hunted food, running ahead and, if all was well, giving a low note of encouragement. Occasionally he and Mrs. Partridge would both be badly frightened by the approach of some person, or perhaps of an animal. At such a time they pretended to have a broken wing, hoping in this way to draw the attention of the intruder from their babies to themselves. Sometimes, though ordinarily very timid, they even fearlessly attacked such enemies as dogs and crows to protect their little ones.

Until they were a month old the Partridge children ate only insects and ants' eggs; then, as the corn ripened in the fields, their parents took them in among the grain—not for the corn

NEW BOOKS

Philosophy in a Forest

The Crock of Gold, by James Stephens. Applied to a book by an unknown author this title would paralyze a discriminating reader's curiosity; he would have a dread of chaff and emptiness, and decline to take the risk of realizing them. But James Stephens is well known among lovers of real poetry, and in selecting a title for his book of prose he could not make an important mistake, so far as his rapidly increasing number of readers is concerned. They would accept it in faith. "The Crock of Gold" is a happy choice; it is beautifully justified.

With his little volume of poems, published in 1909 under the title of "Insurrections," this young and compelling Irish artist effected a triumphant entrance into the small circle of the foremost contemporary men of letters. A hospitable reception awaited his next performance, which was another collection of poems, and now that he has turned his hand to prose he is sure to extend the reach of his vital literary power. His new book is unlike anything in English; it is unique without eccentricity. It is literature of the highest quality.
